Now what you can do is to become aware that all that it is, it's a particular pattern in your mind it's a particular way in which your mind works and so it's a, you could call it a sub-personality but what it really is, it's a mind pattern that operates in you and when you bring awareness to it you can recognize it as a mind pattern in you in other words you no longer believe every thought that arises that it says you recognize it's an old pattern that says the same thing that it said five years ago or ten years ago and it says that all the time and you recognize it so in other words you're not trapped in the thoughts anymore, this is again the whole thing we are talking about you're not, you don't believe in every thought that comes into your head, what that really means is there's an awareness beyond the thought and you realize there's a voice in my head saying this again that's all it is and when you don't energize it with your identification it begins to subside and in this way you become free of the of this dreadful burden of having that thing in your head talking to you and making your life miserable but what matters is the awareness needs to be there that frees you because then you become the awareness rather than being the thought or being trapped in the thought or possessed by the thought again there's a movie that many of you have probably seen called A Beautiful Mind it's about a scientist actually based on a real person, what happened to him quite a genius in his field but he developed delusions he saw people that weren't there whatever it's called clinically schizophrenia or whatever and the great thing about the movie is the viewer up to the point where the protagonist realizes that these things are illusions and the viewer of the movie doesn't know it either, the viewer participates in the illusions of the protagonist he believes these people are real too until suddenly the protagonist realizes, oh my god I'm seeing things that are not there and then he continues to see these things but suddenly there's an awareness in him and so although these people still appear to him that are not really there there's an awareness in him there that he's no longer totally reactive to them, he doesn't feed them with his reaction and gradually they subside over years it takes years for them to subside but the decisive point is, although the word is never mentioned, the decisive point is the awareness, wow and that's the same thing that applies to any any pattern in the human mind, not just a totally totally insane pattern, bring awareness to it so that you're not tortured by that and really and real compassion always arises out of awareness anyway

my childhood violin teacher used to shake his finger at me and say, you hear but you don't listen and he didn't mean it as a compliment, but it seems like this may be the technique for dealing with the inner critic.

Oh yes very good, yes

laughter yes Hi, thank you first Eckhart for coming tip the microphone I wanted to ask you it seems like the state that you're talking about of being at peace and being in the moment it's a very appealing state you feel more in touch and I'm wondering why society or people why is there this attraction to distraction and what is it about us that leads us to develop these systems that take us away from that well distractions

excitement stimulus are kinds of drugs or substitutes for the true feeling of aliveness within yourself so in the absence of that true feeling of aliveness within yourself, which we could call connectedness with being connectedness with source you have to look to the outside for something to make you feel more alive because when you're totally trapped in your thinking mind there's a lack of aliveness there's a sense that something fundamental is missing in my life it's an unconscious sense for many people but that is the basis for many people's lives is actually a sense of lack and that's an amazing thing if you really look at that the basis for your life is there's something missing and there are millions of people on the planet who live their lives on that basis without even fully recognizing it as if continuously they were telling themselves and certainly feeling something missing here so they're always how can I fill that thing that's missing they don't know what's missing but there's something it may sound familiar to some of you because it's such a prevalent mind pattern something missing I need something and of course what's missing is the true sense of connectedness with being, with aliveness and then of course you look for okay what's the next fix that I can get because and then you kind of become a little bit greedy and addictive for some, for stimulus that's why the movies the bad movies they need to, they produce more and more things that stimulate it more and more into violence and so because at least it's a substitute feeling of aliveness and then you look for the next fix. Some people get it in drugs or alcohol it's as if you it's almost like needing to suck up something to fill that thing that's missing or you're looking to another human being to fill it sex where's my next the next or even the the the next affair the excitement that comes from you just starting a new love affair wow now it's really happening of course and then you start living together and then it goes downhill from there so that doesn't work and so always looking for something and not knowing that what you've been looking for is actually already within it's in you and just it's a taking attention instead of out there looking for it going there this is where I start in the power of now giving the parable about a beggar sitting on an old box holding his baseball cap and can you spare a dime for years he sits on this box can you spare a dime and until finally somebody comes along and he doesn't give him a dime and says what's in that box you're sitting on I'm telling that parable in the book nothing I've been sitting on it for years it's just an old box and the man says well look inside and he finally gets ok and it's full of gold he's been sitting on it for years begging it's just a little parable cause the real thing is not even close to you it's essentially part of who you are so that's the reason why people they even look for stimulus in drama in relationships because it makes them feel well at least we are still alive we are fighting we must be alive

I think we'll have time just for one more question

my name is Alex I am an equipment maintenance tech so I keep rooms like this operational so you gave us some very practical things to try to rid ourselves of distraction I'm curious about another issue really strong emotion for example like right now I'm like nervous there's no reason to be nervous nothing bad could possibly happen how do you overcome emotions like that jealousy hatred any strong emotion do you have any practical tips that we could try for that

well first it's helpful to see the connection which is usually the case between the particular thoughts that you are thinking and the emotion that you feel most of the time the emotions are caused by particular patterns in your mind for example anxiety is caused by thinking about possible future things that may happen or things that you want to happen but they may not happen you may not get what you want you may not get what you need you may lose what you already have these things are all mind patterns that create fear so very often it is the thought that creates the emotion and the thought creates the emotion because you totally believe in the thought in other words you are totally identified with the thought then the body responds as if the thought were reality I might lose my job if you think that you wake up in the middle of the night and then you start thinking more thoughts on those lines the body can't tell the difference the body kind of responds to the thoughts that go through your mind they affect the physiology of the body I mean if you doubt that you might think of biting into a lemon and you find saliva accumulating in your mouth so what you think affects the body the body believes your thoughts to be real so when you think that you might lose your job you've lost your job already according to the body and you're destitute and that's how the body reacts and that's how the emotion is created so it's often then by looking seeing a thought as untrue that you actually begin to become free you can only see it as untrue if there's an awareness there that is aware that there is a thought without the awareness there's only the thought the thought then swallows up your entire consciousness and there's nothing else you can do then but with awareness here's the awareness and here's the thought and then the thought may still operate for a while but it's not empowered anymore and the emotion then is also going to weaken there may be times when there's not much thought as in this one you just said when you came up to the microphone you felt nervous perhaps you didn't have any particular thought on this occasion you just came nervous because many people when they go up to a microphone and speak in public feel nervous and again in these cases it's a question of simply allowing, acknowledging the emotion and allowing it to be there as I sometimes put it you become the space for it you allow it to be there so you could step up to the microphone actually what you said is very helpful when you go to the microphone you start by saying I feel nervous my hands palms of my hands are sweaty because I'm here it's the beginning of allowing it to be there without feeling that I shouldn't be feeling nervous then you feel even more nervous but if you allow the emotion to be there there comes a little space around it and there's an aware space yes there's nervousness but there is an awareness around it so you're not totally in the nervousness you allow it and when you share it with others it's a lovely thing when you share an emotion in that way with others rather than inflicting your emotion on them and saying you did that to me but when you say when you said that this is what I felt there's an awareness there rather than you made me feel this you can say when you said that this is what I felt or at this moment this is what I feel everybody loves that and there's an honesty with that rather than coming out to the microphone and pretending not to be nervous it's actually much more powerful and you connect more deeply if you're ever going to public speaking perhaps you will you connect much more deeply to the audience when instead of hiding the fact that you're nervous you start off by saying I feel really nervous then you connect with everybody if you're pretending you don't connect so again just a brief summary see what thoughts are causing the emotion which is often the case or in other cases if an emotion just arises allow it to be be the space for it and it's part of your experience of the present moment and you might as well say yes to it because whatever arises in the present moment is as it is already whether you argue with it or not the present moment is always as it is that's the is-ness and when you become friendly with the is-ness that in itself is a transformation of consciousness

[Speaker 2] (1:30:02 - 1:30:35)

so there's a lot of people to thank I want to start by thanking those that tuned in on the webcast I want to thank all of you Googlers who chose to take your afternoon and spend it here with us I want to thank Rich and the learning and development team here at Google who make events like this possible and of course I want to thank Eckhart on behalf of all of us thank you for your wisdom thank you for your being and also your doing in the world your choice to share this knowledge with us you've given us a lot to think about and more importantly the ability not to think at all

thank you

Eckhart Tolle - The I that is Eternally Present 1

It doesn't happen very often that I talk at a university. It's happened a few times, though. And every time, it feels a little strange, because universities are places whose purpose is the cultivation of thought, to train the mind, to add things to the mind, to improve your ability to think, to analyze, to absorb information, to regurgitate information, to dissect information.

So universities are to do with the cultivation of mind. And when I'm at a university, I ask myself, do they realize who they let in here? Subversive activity.

Because the very essence of what we talk about, and the essence of the teaching, if it can be called that, for lack of a better word, is that it's possible to go beyond mind, beyond thought. It's not to deny the validity and the importance of thought. Without thought, no words would be coming out of my mouth.

And thought is very helpful. But the essence of the teaching is, and it's not just this teaching, if you look deeply, you will see it's also the essence of all, ultimately, all spiritual teachings. Although it's never said so openly, the possibility for humans to go to a level of consciousness that includes thought, but is not reduced to thought.

But the realization that the realm of consciousness is much vaster than we thought through thought. So that consciousness is not, as most people would think, is not synonymous with the production of noise in the head, which is thought. That consciousness is much vaster than the human mind.

It does not exclude the human mind. The human mind is, of course, an essential part. It is one of many possible ways in which consciousness can express itself.

But the human dilemma is, and has been for a long, long time, that they identify almost exclusively with mind activity. First of all, if you look at the nature of the human mind in a very basic way, the first thing that strikes you is that it's extremely active. It goes on and on.

It hardly ever stops. It's a continuous stream of thought that goes through one's head. It's a noise that you can't really switch off.

And even psychologists who are not perhaps interested in, those psychologists who are not interested in going beyond thought or cannot see anything further than thought, they examined the nature of thought and came up with the conclusion, yes, that 98% of it is repetitive, completely repetitive. And a large percentage of that is also unnecessary. It does not address anything specific that needs to be done now.

Thought is not being applied specifically to a particular purpose. It just is there. And whether you want it or whether you need it or not, you are condemned to living with a noise machine in the head.

And it's so normal that hardly anybody ever questions that, that you can't stop thinking. And some thoughts are fine, there may be a few nice thoughts, and then many thoughts are problematic. You can look at your own mind to see how often thought is concerned with problems.

And very often, or in most cases, it is not a problem that is here now, that is actual, true actuality, true reality here now. It is a problem that is generated in and through mental noise. This, for example, is the case when you worry.

You are in bed, very warm, protected. It's all quiet and you're breathing, but you're worried. Mental noise is in a state of hyperactivity.

All this is very normal. And if that were all, that would be bad enough to be continuously trapped, not being able to get out, not being able to get out of that mental noise. Except very rarely, almost by accident.

But then there's more to it than that. Because after a while, because mental noise these days starts at a very early age. After a while, your whole sense of who you are, your sense of self, of identity, your essential sense of me, is bound up with thought activity.

You tell yourself who you are. A mental image comes into being, that is, who I think I am, a me. And you will find that a lot of the thought activity that goes on is to do with me.

It's the me. The me in the head. The image that who I think I am.

Me and my problems. A lot of thought focuses on me and my problems and how I'm going to get out of them. How I'm going to solve them.

Thought does not realise that its activity itself, to a large extent, creates the problems. It says, no, I'm thinking so hard and I'm boring about this because I need to be responsible for my life if I don't worry anymore, if I don't continuously think about me and my problems and what's going to happen to me, my life will collapse. So, seeking one's identity in and through thought is normal.

So, when one speaks the word I, which is perhaps the most frequently used word in the language, when you speak the word I, it usually refers to me, the mind-based sense of self. The me that I think I am. Me and my story, which I dwell on almost continuously.

So, to get your... And this is what in ancient spiritual traditions has been called the self. In Buddhism, in some traditions, it's called the false self.

The sense of self. And even in Christianity, Jesus said, straight statement, deny yourself.

And perhaps the meaning goes deeper than what we usually believe, how we usually interpret that sentence.

Perhaps it's even not a good translation of what he really said.

So, self is to do with really who you are, what the essence of your identity is. Is the essence of your identity thought, mind activity?

Is the essence of your identity of who you are the content of your mind? And the corresponding emotions that accompany or reflect in the body the content of your mind. Is that the essence of who you are?

And that's of course the famous statement by the philosopher Descartes, who wanted to examine, to find out what the most fundamental truth of human existence is. And he said, I think, therefore I am. That is the one statement that expresses the fundamental truth.

So he equated thought with being.

And that was, even at his time, already normal to equate who you are with mind activity.

[Speaker 2] (12:12 - 12:28)

And this evening, we are here to perhaps explore whether there is something deeper to who you are than thought.

[Speaker 1] (12:31 - 13:30)

We are not just here to address it intellectually, in other words, through thought, or formulate some new belief, which is also thought, that, oh, there is more to me than thought. I believe that. And I can have an argument with you if you don't believe that.

And if I can have an argument with you, the sense of self that I derive from thought, from my mind, will become strengthened, because I'm fighting with someone. I'm engaged in the process of being right, which means I identify my sense of self, of who I am, with a mental position. I say, this mental position, this opinion, this belief, this theory, and who I am, are one.

This is identity. Identify with means to make the same as. And when you identify with, you make it the same as yourself.

That's what identification means.

So you identify with a mental position, my opinion, my belief. So your sense of who you are is derived from that. And anybody who questions this belief, or this mental position, will be questioning and attacking your very sense of self.

That's why people get so worked up when you start doubting them or questioning that they are right. To be wrong is extremely threatening to a mind-based sense of self.

It's the worst thing. So it needs to defend itself. It's not defending the thought, the belief, or the position.

It's defending the illusion of that self, of being as if it were fighting for my life. And so the mind-based sense of self needs to be right.

It needs also, it loves also somebody else to be wrong. Because then my sense of self becomes strengthened. I can prove that you are wrong.

I have removed identity from who you are in the mad belief of this egoic self. I have removed identity essence from you and I've added it to me. I'm bigger now than you.

[Speaker 2] (15:26 - 15:30)

So we are not here to create a new belief.

But we are not here to add to thought. It may look at first as if they were. We are not here to add to the content of the mind, the accumulated content of the mind, which is already huge in everyone.

It's not a passing insult. The very fact that you live at this time in this world means that you have already a lot of accumulated content. I read recently that every day the New York Times contains more information and more data than the average person living in the 17th century would come across in a lifetime.

Let alone the weekend edition of the New York Times. Now, but there is also, because for most people their sense of self and mind are one, there is also a great need, a compulsion almost, to add more to the mind. There is a kind of greed one could say.

The mind wants more.

More information, more knowledge, more of this, add something to itself, because it strengthens the always unsatisfying sense of self that is derived from the mind.

What I'm saying now, one or two of you, if you are completely in the mind, they even sound frightening or you may get angry.

That's all right.

To observe that the mind looks for more and there is nothing wrong with learning new things, but it is looking for more in order to strengthen its sense of self.

[Speaker 2] (17:52 - 18:05)

And here, the essence of this gathering is not, normally it would be, anywhere else in this building I'm sure, people get together to add.

And here we are getting together not to add to the content of the mind, but to become aware of the content of your mind and of mental noise and see it as for what it is, which is mental noise. Thought. Helpful, very useful for many practical purposes.

Essential to survive in this world. Of course, your knowledge also, you couldn't do without it. What we are addressing here is your sense of self.

The moment your sense of self becomes equated with mind and thought, that is where the mind becomes very problematic and where your life becomes very problematic and where there is a heaviness to it or to the self, the mind-based sense of self or the self as they call it in Buddhism. And as Buddhism, I'm not a Buddhist, I'm not anything and you don't need to be anything, but if you are, it doesn't matter. We are not here to change your beliefs in any way.

To become aware of beliefs as beliefs. They are fine. We are not here to create a new belief, but we are here to enable a level of consciousness to arise and in most of you it's arising already, otherwise you wouldn't even have come here unless somebody dragged you here against your will.

We are here to become aware within ourselves of a dimension that is deeper than mental noise, that's all, where you are still very awake and very conscious, but there is a realm of vibrantly alive stillness within yourself in which thought activity subsides and we'll be going into that. So it's equating who you are with a mental image, that is the illusion of the self. You may have heard of the Buddhist master who when asked to define the essence of Buddhism said, that's very simple, the essence of Buddhism is no self, no problem.

He was talking of a mind-based sense of self. And that is to do with me and my story, the story of my life. And it begins in childhood.

It begins for a child at the age one and a half or two, whenever they start to speak, the first thing, one of the first things they learn is to speak their name. And the question that the parents ask the child is, who are you? Equate the name with who they are.

And then the child repeats his or her name. That sounds pretty harmless, and of course it's inevitable, I'm not saying don't tell the child the name, but you can see there's a transition there from a stage of the one year old, in whom the mind has not started up yet, but who is already conscious of you, and conscious of surroundings, and conscious of sense perceptions, but thought processes, conceptual thought, has not yet started. It has not yet accumulated words in the mind, noise.

So the mental accumulations haven't started, and you can look into the eyes of a one year old, and see something that is of such purity, and there's such aliveness and light, there is consciousness looking through those eyes at you. It is amazing when you look into the eyes of a child in whom the mind hasn't started up yet, and that child looks back at you, and there's complete openness, and aliveness, and trust, and joy, and the child is probably smiling at you, and you know you're not being judged by the child, because it hasn't yet got the instrument that would enable it to judge. There is simply aliveness, consciousness, light coming out of the eyes, so to speak.

And then the mind begins, your name, you learn what your name is, and that's the beginning of a mind-based sense of self. It looks fairly harmless, but from then onwards, you are such and such, that you tell yourself, that's me. Now the name is not enough, the name now needs to accumulate.

If you look at your name as a receptacle, or a basket, that provides the receptacle for further content with which you identify as yourself, experiences, opinions, your parents' opinions of who you are. That becomes very important content, and you ask, your parents tell you you are stupid, then you have already mental content accumulated in this basket that is your name, and it will be very hard to get rid of that. And other experiences, knowledge, sufferings, people that you know, cultural backgrounds, many things, they form the content of your mind, and around it, there is the name that holds it all together.

And that is the content, and that is added to, and the strange thing is, after a few years of accumulating content, then you think you know who you are, but it's never quite enough yet. And not only for a young person, as you grow older, you will find your sense of self is never, very rarely, and only for brief moments, really feels complete, that you are fully yourself. There's always, no, I am not enough yet, is the essential belief of a mind-based sense of self.

And on the level of doing, of course it's true, because there's always so much more that you could do. You would never be, there are innumerable things that you could do, but there just isn't enough time, and even if you lived for a thousand years, you couldn't explore all the possible things that you could do. So eventually you choose one course of action or one activity, and then suddenly you exclude so many others.

Or you're trying to get to some projected goal, the pinnacle of my profession, or whatever it is, and I need to get there to be myself, I need the recognition, I need, and for years you've worked towards that, and maybe you get there, and maybe you don't. Many don't, because not everybody can triumph. To make it, you can only make it, in other words, enhance your sense of self in the eyes of the world through making it, if many others don't make it.

Otherwise it doesn't make sense, making it becomes meaningless. So for anybody who makes it in the eyes of the world, in whatever field, you need at least a thousand others who don't make it, otherwise it will no longer serve your sense of identity, you don't feel special anymore. If everybody makes it, well, then I have to think of something else.

Maybe then I'll try not to make it, and then I can be a failure, and poor, and very special in that. And that's not as funny as it sounds, because quite a few people develop that as part of their sense of self. The sense of self needs to feel special in some way, if you can't make it and derive, and then of course you're telling that yourself in the mind, that you have made it, and others will confirm it to you, perhaps that you've made it.

But if you can't make it, then you can gain a specialness through failing. Poor me, who failed, who didn't make it because the world treated me unfairly, and life circumstances were hostile, and I had a bad start in life, or whatever, and an image forms of somebody who has been wronged, perhaps that's one of many possibilities, that you've been wronged by the world, or by a particular person, or your parents, and that can be a very strong sense of self too, a sense of having failed. I have failed in the eyes of the world.

I had a few chances, but somehow it didn't work out, and I didn't make it. These are perhaps two extremes, one person who thinks he or she made it, for most they fluctuate between one day, for a few days you think you're fine, and then suddenly some critical remark by somebody destroys your sense of self. So it's forming some image of who you are.

So it doesn't really matter to that sense of self whether you make it or not. If you have a very unhappy sense of self, a miserable sense of self, that works too. It gives you an identity.

You can talk to others about why you are miserable, and what the world has done to you, or whatever it is, and you can strengthen it, and others will confirm, they will listen and say, yes, you're right. Great, it works. And everybody knows the great reluctance in people, once a particular sense of self has established itself in the mind, a great reluctance to let go of that, and every therapist knows how strong the compulsion is to sabotage awareness.

How strong the compulsion is to hang on to the sense of self. I had a, I worked, when I saw people individually, a woman would come and see me, and her main story was how unhappy her marriage was, and she was continuously thinking about how difficult her husband was to live with, and how irritating he was, and continuously reacting, whatever he did was irritating to her, and that became, her sense of self was based on that reactive irritation, and all the mind activity around it, and after a little while, after a few months, I pointed out to her that she can either leave him, or she can observe that particular mindset, that mind pattern with which she was identified, the reactive pattern, and you can actually allow him to be, instead of reacting. She saw the possibility of freedom, there was a moment when she saw it, of stepping out of that mind-based sense of self, and then she said suddenly, but if I let go of that, what have I got left? If I let go of that, what have I got left?

Who am I then? A pattern that I've been identified with in the mind for 10, 20, or 30 years, if I let go of that, who am I? My sad story, if I let go of my sad story, and this applies to quite a few people, who am I without that?

That is now to see that no matter how successful you've been in the eyes of the world, the sense of self that is mind-derived, thought-derived, is never at ease and fulfilled for long. It's in its nature to feel a sense of lack and unfulfillment. That is the mind-based sense of self.

And everybody's story somehow didn't quite go the way it should have gone. Me and my story, it should have gone differently. I imagined it was going to be different.

It didn't quite work out, at least not yet. But I have future. I have enough future for it to work out.

In other words, my sense of self, of who I am, can become complete. I can be in a state of ease and fully myself. The belief is all I need is more future to add certain things to who I am.

And this is, now, this is very essential to add the belief that through adding certain things with which you identify content of the mind, image, whatever it may be, you identify with a car, this is an image, you identify with knowledge, I have accumulated knowledge, you become bigger, anything, the compulsion to add things, to have more, and through that, believing that your sense of self at some point will complete itself, then I will have arrived. The story will have found its happy ending. So it's seeking self, self-seeking through adding further content through future.

I'm not saying that your life, that you shouldn't add more knowledge or more expertise to your life. That's all wonderful. And for all that, of course, you need future to learn new things, to acquire new knowledge.

For all that, you need future. But seeking an enhanced or strengthened or more complete sense of self through that is futile. It's frustrating.

You never arrive at that sense of self even if you add in endless content. It's never enough. It may feel enough for a little while.

And then again, oh, and what, that wasn't quite it. That's being, and you try the material realm and add, identify with things that you call a mental image of successful in material terms. And after a while, that feels good for a little while.

And you have the car, the big house, and then you sit in your big car and it feels good. And then after a while, it's just you're sitting in this thing. It has four wheels and it takes you from A to B.

Yes, it is more comfortable than others. And then you need others to notice you. That's a relative rudimentary way of strengthening your sense of self.

And then it becomes more subtle adding then perhaps to knowledge through finding the person that's going to make you happy. Adding, I need to add, so then it becomes, you desperately need the future. And you desperately need whatever activity you're engaged in, you need desperately the result.

You become dependent on the outcome is all important, whether you make it or not. So you can't really enjoy the doing so much because you're so obsessed with getting there. So it's a compulsion to add in order to complete yourself.

Without that compulsion, learning new things, engaging in certain activities is very enjoyable. Wonderful joy of doing and learning. But if you're looking for yourself, that's always, that spoils the potential for great joy and aliveness while you do.

Because the result becomes all important, the outcome, I must get there. I need to become, so to see the fallacy of self-seeking in the future. So if it's not there, if you cannot find the essence of your being which is far beyond mental noise as the mind could tell you, if you cannot find it through adding more things to who you think you are, if you cannot find it through more future, where is it?

How can one go beyond the mind-made sense of self? How to step out of that? And the mind will be very interested in this.

The mind will say, well, I'd like to get out of that. Let me know what I have to do and how to get there. Let me know the steps I need to take.

In other words, the deep-seated mindset that needs future will operate again. Even if you now go into spiritual, because everybody is seeking for him or herself. That's why they are all rushing about needing to get to the future.

Why is everybody rushing about where are they all going to? Stop anybody and of course if you ask them, where are you going to? Where are you rushing to?

And they're all rushing even if they're not running, even at home, that stress, where are you going to? But ultimately, if you take away the particular, you will arrive at the general, which is they're all trying to get to the future as quickly as possible. I need to get to that future point.

And this is on a minor scale. It could be just the next moment when I have completed this task that I'm doing. Or it could be on a larger scale.

I need to get to that point in three years' time when I will have finally finished what I'm working at now. Finally. So everybody is on my way to the future, of course, that's where I'm going.

And then you say, yeah, but what about here? What about this moment? Well, this moment doesn't really fit into my story.

It shouldn't be the way it is. That's why I'm trying to get away from it. I don't want that.

I want the mentally projected next moment because the next moment is going to fit into my story. And that's why I'm in such a hurry to get away from this moment. This moment, of course, it's important because it's the stepping stone that enables me to get to the next one, which is so much more important.

So when you look, there's an enormous compulsion towards future and needing to not look at this moment, not, no. And when you observe people and you can see in their expression and the way they move and the way they speak, it's a denial of this moment in my story. And children learn that early on at school, how important, you need to get there.

So remember, we are not denying that you need future to get from A to B. We're not denying that you need future to learn a language or to learn how to cook or to learn how to use the computer or to look at your watch and it works well. You can meet somebody at five o'clock.

It's helpful, otherwise life would become difficult. We'll meet at some point. There's no problem with that level of time and future, but not talking about that.

We are talking about self-seeking in future. Trying to become happy in the future, but you're not. And that is an amazing thing if you see that most people live in that their whole life and then unless something happens and they get a dreadful shock and there's a moment of awakening.

You awaken out of a conditioned mindset and if spiritual awakening, which is a term that's been used for a long time in spirituality and ancient eastern traditions, awakening, if it has any meaning, awakening is not to be equated with suddenly having new ideas about spirituality or God in your head or suddenly reinterpret the universe and true awakening is far deeper than that. It's not exchanging one set of ideas for another set of ideas. Awakening is to awaken out of

Eckhart Tolle - The Light Behind the Unheard and the Unseen

The bells returned to the manifested realm. Refreshed. The ringing of the bells traditionally is a spiritual wake-up call, preceded usually by the alarm clock.

That's another kind of waking up. As we are speaking of waking up, I hope the people in Austin and Hollyhock are fully awake also. They are over there where the camera is.

I'm sorry you have to get up so early, but you're here. This is the day that we spend in silence, except for this person up here. Well, not really.

Although the words are there, there's still the dimension of silence, of stillness, is present. More important than the words. So if you can be attentive to both the words, and more importantly that which is between the words, which to the mind is nothing.

And indeed it is no thing. And yet it's an energy field. The wonderful thing is, you cannot become attentive to that without the same field of stillness being activated within you.

The very fact that you notice the silent gaps in between words, or in between sentences, means the very same silence, the very same stillness at that moment, is in you also. Otherwise you wouldn't even notice it. And you may also be surprised to find that in the moment of noticing the silent gap, you are not thinking.

You may also find if the gaps become too long, you notice it at first, and then you start thinking again. That's okay. Or you may not.

But that is the most significant thing that can happen to you in this lifetime, on this planet, where you've taken temporary form as a so-called person. Of course you are consciousness. The most significant thing is this cessation of thinking without loss of consciousness.

From our normal perspective, the perspective of the normal everyday mind, the perspective of thought, it looks like there's nothing there. There's nothing there that can be grasped or understood. And yet it's the ground of all being, the very ground of your existence.

Existence is the manifested. Being, the way I use these words, is the unmanifested life that you are, underneath the form, the background, we can also call it. So to be aware here continuously of the background to all this, the field of stillness, the field of aware presence, of self-aware stillness.

And also be aware of that which arises in the stillness. Words, sense perceptions, bodily sensations. But to have your roots, to be grounded in the stillness.

And here, all you have to do is be aware of the gaps between the words. Now there's something that cannot be manufactured, something that needs already to be there in you, a readiness, the ability even to be aware of the gaps. We could call that ability alertness.

And that's the true meaning of waking up out of the dream of thought, of being identified with a continuous stream of thought. So most of you, or almost everyone here has this ability already. There's enough presence in you so that you can notice, be aware of the silent spaces.

And in that awareness, the awareness of the silent space, really, what is a silent space? It's the absence of something. Where before there was a word, the word has returned, the sound has returned into nothingness.

Before there was something, now there is nothing. So what is the silent space? It's the absence of something, of the thingness of life.

So when we say you are aware of the silent space, it's a strange way of putting it. It works as a pointer. But what does that really mean?

You are aware, first you are aware of a word, your attention is on the word, then the word disappears. And it is not replaced by inner words arising in you, because attention remains, the word disappears. And so when we say you are now aware of the gap, what's really happening is you have become self-aware.

Awareness or consciousness has become, has recognized itself. Without, the object is gone, just the field of bare attention remains. And that's, that is a realm of, also of great peace, the silent peace that's always there in the background.

And as you realize that, it seems to become stronger. It seems to grow inside you. That's probably a perspective only, but it seems to grow and become stronger.

So as you sit here, you don't grow in knowledge very much, except a few Zen stories, but you grow in awareness. However, any words that we use to describe it are already somewhat misleading. Perhaps a better way of putting it is to say that as you sit here, you shrink.

The person shrinks. The personal sense of self that's identified with thought diminishes and something else emerges. And so I've pointed out before, maybe not here, this is not a personal development group.

Sometimes I say that when I arrive at the airport and the immigration officer says, what are you going to do here? What, what do you, what do you teach? In order to reach him at all, I sometimes say personal development and know that it's not true.

But if I said personal shrinkage, he wouldn't let me in. Now the person remains, but what gradually happens is there comes a shift. The transcendent dimension in you becomes stronger than the personal.

The personal can still be used, your name, the conventions that are to do with the way interacting with others. But more and more something, something else flows into that. And we could call that stillness, but not stillness as just an absence of noise, but stillness as a, an alive presence.

So stillness flows into your sense perceptions. It flows into your looking. That's why you've been looking at things in nature and realize that it becomes so much more alive when you don't label or interpret it.

So it flows into your looking. So the stillness is also attention. It's a stream.

A, one could call it a current of awareness, where before there was thought, very different energy frequency, thought. When you approach anything or perceive anything through thought, very different frequency. You can see when you look at a person, whether he or she is perceiving you through thought or through stillness, or when a person is looking at something, you can see whether they are classifying it, interpreting it, finding some kind of personal relationship to it.

People do that with trees and flowers too. Some people have the compulsion to pick flowers because they need to enter into a personal relationship with a flower, not realizing that they could be in a much deeper relationship if they went beyond the personal that says, I would like to have that. Or even if you don't pick it, you might think, how would that look in my garden, in my backyard?

Or have some kind of comparison to it. Put it in some kind of comparative category. It's not even necessarily to do with yourself, but it's still, I overheard a man saying, he was looking at the sun, at the sky after sunset, or was it after sunrise?

And he said to his companion, look at that Turner sky. Turner is a British artist who lived, I believe, in the 19th century, who painted beautiful paintings of light, sky, just light. And finally, yes, he was looking, but it also had to be compared to something.

You can look more deeply if you don't classify and compare it to anything. And it is likely that Turner himself looked at the sky in the state of complete open presence, with reference to nothing else, not to another word, to a word, or anything else. And sometimes you find people who are walking in nature, and it's beautiful, and lush.

But the mind comes in, and for a moment they look, and then they say to you, yeah, oh, you should go to Hawaii. It's even more lush there. And then they start telling you about Hawaii while you carry on walking.

So this current of awareness flowing through you into your sense perceptions, your seeing, your hearing, but it also flows as a kind of emanation, because every human being has a certain emanation. Now, most humans have the emanation of mind. And many humans, in addition, have the emanation frequently of pain body.

And many humans have a very nervous emanation, tense. Where is the next thing? They want to get to the next thing, and at the same time feel threatened by the next thing that's going to come.

So that's what they emanate with their being. And that's the entire civilization. To a large extent, big cities have that energy field that's generated by millions of people.

There are certain other countries where at first it feels, ah, there's less nervousness here. But then you realize that actually the energy field, although it may not be nervous, is a little sleepy. Instead of going beyond thought, they are drifting below thought.

And so you tend to see lots of people sitting or lying around street corners in a state of semi-sleep. And yes, it feels, I've just arrived from New York, it feels great for a while. And you also sometimes find human beings who seem to be more peaceful.

And you yourself may find that in certain situations or conditions, you're not as nervous after a few drinks, after taking this or that substance. And it's great, it's a glimpse of what it means not to be thinking. That's how alive you can feel.

But in many of these cases when you've taken a few drinks, yes, you're beginning to step out of thought and you feel better. Oh, that feels good, I must have another drink. Oh, let's have another.

And before you know it, you're going towards unconsciousness and sleep. Yes, you have stepped out of the stream of thinking, but have stepped, as one could say, in evolutionary terms, you're stepping back. That too can be a relief.

But this is not what's happening here. We, from the stream of thinking, we are stepping beyond. And we do not go back to sleep when the mind no longer thinks.

We are more alert, far more awake than when we were immersed in thinking. So there comes that quality, that's the way we are going. Yes, we are transcending thought, not back to where we came from, but rising above thought.

Now that state of rising above thought, where you can still use thought beautifully, powerfully when it's needed, but you are no longer possessed by thought or consumed by thought. Thought, useless thinking, burning up a lot of your life energy. Not going anywhere, just going around, just like the car is in neutral, you're pressing, pushing down the accelerator, not going anywhere, just for hours and hours and hours.

So going, stepping beyond thought into that clarity and alertness that is both gentle and fierce, that has two aspects seemingly contradictory. It's very gentle, that energy field of alert presence, but also has a fierceness. It needs to have a fierceness because it needs to cut through thought, that substance that, and thought is heavy, dense.

So to cut through that density of thought, coupled with the density of the emotional field that goes with the thoughts, you have the two layers, the density of thought, the density of that emotional field, pain body, and they cling together as two layers of density. And then comes presence. And in this case here, it comes from two directions.

That's why it's possible for this to happen. From within you, that dimension of presence emerges, pushes forward. But it might not have enough in the absence of extreme and agonizing suffering that cracks it open from above.

It may not have enough power to cut through the density. So all you feel then is an extreme restlessness, something wanting to happen, and there may be searching and something wants to be almost be born here, but it can't be born. It's not because the shell is not cracking.

But here it's being also pierced from here, from this, the energy field that is here in this room that comes through this teaching, which is more than the words, so that the presence is cutting through from within you and from without. So it's just the way they built the channel tunnel from two ways. They started in England and in France digging, and finally they met in the middle, and they had cut through these layers of seemingly impenetrable rock.

So if it were not already happening from within you, it would be meaningless, and it wouldn't work for you to be here. So the layer of thought that stream is being cut through, and when you leave here, there will, we trust, be enough presence in you so that it can happen without the external help, although occasionally it's still helpful to listen, to be reminded, to open a book and read just a few lines that have come out of presence. That's helpful as long as you need it.

But there is enough presence in you now so that you can use it as a sword. And I'm now talking about the active side of presence, because presence is both fierce and gentle. It has an active aspect and a passive aspect.

It depends from what perspective you look on it. So when we say that allow this moment to be, in that there is an arising. There's surrender and presence go together.

Surrender to what is is one side of presence, and that looks passive, but that is not the full picture. You cannot surrender to what is, it would not work if there were not also a fierce aspect to presence, an active, very active aspect to presence. So on the one hand, it's very gentle and allowing, but it is also, it acts like a sword that cuts through accumulations collective of the collective human mind and pain body.

So there comes this attention. When the Zen master raises his finger and looks at you, there's a fierce look on his face. We see it in old drawings of Zen masters.

You wouldn't want to meet them in a dark street, eyes come bulging out of their heads. So they represent the fierce aspect of presence. Underneath it, if you look closely, if the artist who draw this drawing of the Zen master was in tune with the Zen master's inner state, if you look closely, you will find also hidden there underneath the fierceness, the gentle aspect of presence.

It's hidden. If you look into the eyes, they both are present there. So allowing what is to be needs to come together with a sword-like aspect, almost what seems the mind would say irreconcilable, but they're not irreconcilable, perhaps only from the point of view of the mind.

So how does that work? This moment, something arises. This moment takes form as an event that appears in front of you, a person or an event.

Now, allowing this moment to be as it is in whatever form it arises requires you to face fully what is, not opposing, facing in an open way, not facing as if you were fighting a battle against something. You face it in an open way, like this, to have your arms extended like this. So this is the gentle, and yet at the same time you look it straight in the eye, so to speak, whatever it is.

This is the gentle, the receptive, and the attention is the fierce. So you welcome what is, but there's a fierce attention that flows through you onto whatever it is that's happening, not fighting anything, just its fierce alertness, and that cuts through the old reactions that otherwise would, that are all accumulations in the reactive mind. They can then not operate anymore, and intelligence itself, which is attention, attention is great intelligence, but very different from the accumulated so-called intelligence of the human mind.

That is a limited aspect of the greater intelligence, a limited form that this greater intelligence can take, which is fine too. It's only not fine anymore if that is all you know, and all you think you are. If you are good at solving IQ tests, well, that is an aspect of the limited intelligence, and that's fine if you are good at that.

If you get your identity from that, it becomes problematic. I'm a member of, I think it's in England, they have Mensa, which is all the people who have very high IQs can become members of that. And some people let that flow into a conversation just casually.

Now, if I'm offending one or two people here, I'm sorry. That is beautiful. Why not?

If you can use your mind in such a way, it's a beautiful thing to do. If that becomes an important part of your sense of self, then you get trapped in an illusory identity, and you probably have a few more things to add to it. And that is part of identifying with the realm of content.

I don't qualify to become a member of Mensa, unfortunately. The mind doesn't work in that way anymore, or I think it never did. I could never solve mathematical problems, and I always admired people who could.

I can't even see where the problem is. When I was at school, after the age of 13, I stopped going to school. I couldn't stand it anymore.

But I still had, they had all these problems that you had to solve. I couldn't even, my mind would go blank after reading the first few lines. A man has five sacks of potatoes, and then he takes two away and takes half of that content out and puts it into another sack.

How much is left? And that's okay for a problem to solve if there actually is a man. So we are conditioned to create problems for ourselves.

That lies in the conditioning of the mind. And so often, when you think you have a problem, really, your mind is creating a problem for yourself. If it isn't happening at this moment, if there's no action you can take right now, and so comes the fierce aspect of presence.

Oh, I've got so much on my mind, so much, what is the expression, so much on my plate. And so you need to remember the sort of presence. What's the problem at this moment?

Can't find any. Yeah, but it's not this norm, but tomorrow when I get there, what's going to happen when I, when this or that, when the moment comes, there's more than enough power in you to face it and to take right action when right action is called for, because you will face the challenge when it's true in that state of welcoming attention and look it straight in the face. And in that moment, there is no thought.

When you face a challenge, truly, there is no thought. There is just the looking, and it may be an actual looking or metaphorically speaking, you're looking at the situation, the totality of what has arisen at this moment. What needs to be solved, responded to, dealt with at this moment.

And you look. And in that looking, that is fierce and gentle at the same time, there is an activation of a greater intelligence than what you have learned, whatever you may have learned. Now, what you have learned may eventually come into play also, because eventually perhaps you will take action, part of which is to do with certain things that you have learned to do.

Or you will speak words, which is to do with using language that you learned in the past. But that will be only an instrument of the, it will be inspired use of whatever form comes into play when you deal with it. But there's always, there's the moment of alert, aware sessions in which there's no thought and there's just the looking.

And any master does that in any field, has the ability to look for a moment and then respond out of that, the greater intelligence responds out of that. You just, in the same way that great sportsmen play their sports, no tennis player, great tennis player thinks, well, I think the ball is going to come there next, so I'll better move to the left now. Now, now better, now I've got to get ready for the other side to jump to there.

Now I have to two meters forward quickly. It would be impossible through conceptual thinking in the mind, there's no thought. And if thought interferes, they're not playing well today.

And they all have days when they're not playing well. And very great sportsmen actually enjoy tremendously the flow of energy and realize that they are not doing it, but there's the ability to just be there. So this is the non-conceptual intelligence in you, the non-conditioned, unconditioned intelligence in you that becomes activated.

And that deals with problems beautifully, true problems, or rather true challenges, because there are no problems. Problem arises when you are either imagining something happening to you now, it is not happening, you're somewhere else, it's not happening now. You're dwelling mentally on some possible situation, because even if you had an illness that is very problematic, you don't know the outcome.

Will I survive or will I not survive? Of course, eventually, nobody here survives as the form. How much longer will I survive?

Is that now some people, to some people, that becomes a dreadful burden, to know that you have a condition that you may not survive, which of course, everybody is suffering from it in a wider sense. It's called, it's an incurable disease called mortality. The diagnosis is fatal.

Mortality apparently always ends in death. So some people who see their lifespan, they cannot, they don't know how much future they have. It can become an enormous problem, because you think, I have not fully lived my life.

If you're 90 and the doctor tells you, you only have two years, maybe that's not so bad. But even then, some people say, oh no, I need a bit more time. But if you are 30, it seems more problematic, or if you're 20, and the doctor says, you may not have much time left.

And then comes panic, and then comes a sense of unfulfillment, in some sense, I haven't even started yet. I haven't fulfilled what I've come here to do. All the things that I potentially could do, I won't be able to do them.

It's, you become a huge problem suddenly, your enormous suffering arises. But in some cases, it happens that the uncertainty about how much future you have, or seeing that you have very little future left, future is removed from you, forces you more deeply into the present moment. So I have, I know some people who have a so-called serious, life, so-called life-threatening illness.

Of course, life is eternal, but it threatens the form that you are. A so-called life-threatening illness. And they have become enormously present, because they have no future to escape to anymore.

It's just always, they live totally in the now. The future is so uncertain, there may be nothing there, so there's no point in even projecting anything, it's just... And some have become spiritual teachers, and become transparent through this enormous current of awareness that goes through them.

And they smile, and they... Occasionally, waves of fear may still come even to them, and then it passes, and they're back in presence. And they realize, no matter what they could have achieved in or through time, because that has its place.

As long as you have what looks like time, why not do things in time? Of course, you learn a skill, you learn a language, you learn to do this or that, you travel here or there, see new places, have new experiences, all these things time is good for. Well, nothing helps you if you're always in the future, no matter what you experience.

So that is where usually you seek fulfillment of your life, by adding more things that only time can give you, because more implies more time. I need to add more to me to be fully myself. On the level of form, that is true.

If you are 20, you haven't started living, you haven't learned anything, perhaps you're just learning to become a pianist or great computer expert or whatever, and you suddenly get interrupted. On that level, it seems your life has come to nothing. But your life is not your life.

There isn't even you and life. There's only life of which you are a temporary expression. There's only the one consciousness of which you are a temporary expression.

And if that flowers, when you are 20, and the true flowering is not the achievement of this or that, sometimes a flowering happens indirectly through an achievement, which doesn't help the person either if they still identify with as a formal achievement. But the true flowering is the arising of presence in you, when you become transparent. And that can happen at any age.

And it doesn't matter where you are in your life situation. It doesn't matter whether, because there are some people here who have succeeded in the world, and others who in the eyes of the world have not succeeded. There are others here who have succeeded years ago and then failed.

And others who have failed miserably up to this point, and in a year from now, they'll be rich and famous. It all happens. I was a failure in the eyes of the world 10 years ago, 8 years ago.

Now the world thinks I'm a success. Completely meaningless. Completely meaningless.

But it doesn't matter where you are at or what life situation you're in at the present time. The ultimate purpose of your existence is for this form to manifest that which is beyond manifestation. To become an opening for the unconditioned, for the stillness, the awareness, that energy stream, that frequency, so to speak.

I believe it was Ramana Maharshi who sometimes used the expression, a current of awareness that flows through you that is non-conceptual intelligence. And intelligence, even that's a limitation. It's more than that.

It's love too. The first time I'm using this word here, because some words you have to be careful with. Words like God.

Words like love. Because the reality to which these words point is so far greater than the word that it's usually misleading to even say it. But now I've said it.

What flows through you, when we call it intelligence or great power that deals with any problem, any challenge, there is no problem, that arises, it's not just that. That which flows through you is also love, that energy stream that is there when that openness is there. And it doesn't matter what your life situation is or how much future you have left.

If that is there even an hour before you die, that is the flowering of your life. There's no thing as your life, we're just using it as an expression. It's the flowering of consciousness through this form.

It's the birth of that into this world. And then the mind comes, okay, then what happens after that? It wants to know what comes next.

What comes after it has flowered? Maybe there's a question in the basket about it. Let it flower first and then see what happens.

Extreme challenges have the ability potentially to push you into the state of presence, to force you into the state of presence. Little challenges, which are the majority of challenges, usually pull you into unconsciousness. Unless you now know that you can actually use whatever, so to speak, goes wrong in your life as your spiritual practice.

Ah, great, here's another one. And then you bring the allowing to it and the attention.

And you look.

You look at the cold soup. You look at the lost bell that was here. Oh, my bells, I've had them for years.

A friend of mine gave them to me, and the Dalai Lama gave them to my friend. And they are gone. Somebody must have taken them.

Oh, no, it can't be. And instead, you look where the bells were before. There's now an empty space.

Well, now they are back, but there was an empty space. Now, there's something deeply significant about the empty spaces that are left behind by any kind of loss. For example, these are the bells.

You may get back to your car or where your car once was. And in the parking lot, there's only an empty space. And here it is vital, if you can stop and face that empty space without running away from it or cursing the empty space or immediately going into reactive.

This is very strange. And this is one example. The empty space can also be left by relationships, the wife, the partner, the husband.

One day you get home and there's a letter which says, I'm gone. I'm out of here. And if you can, again, at that moment, the form that this moment takes, we use that expression here, and here we come to something very significant.

The form that this moment takes sometimes is an absence of the form that was there a moment before. And because suddenly there is a no form where there was a form before, that is an enormous opening into the deeper awareness of the formless consciousness, unconditioned formless that you are. If you can not run away from it, if you can face this death, because the loss of anything is a small death.

The loss of the bells that you've had for years is a small death because the form is gone. The loss of your BMW is a death. The Rolls Royce, an even bigger death.

And of course there may be an actual death, and this is an amazing thing. The person that was here every day in this room used to sit in this chair. That's the armchair.

That's where the desk where they sat. And one day the message comes, they're gone. Passed away.

And then you look at the empty chair. The person was so, it was so real, it seemed so permanent to have that personality sitting in that armchair doing its thing, its work, talking, having its opinions, being there. How is it, it's inconceivable that suddenly it's, that person is, where is he?

Dissolved. Just dissolved, like a soap bubble. Gone.

And so most people, this is the empty space that is left behind by death. Whenever a form dissolves in your life, it may be an actual death, it may be the loss of something that had been important to you. If you can face that hole that is left behind by the form that is no longer there, it's a temporary hole into the dimension of the formless.

Now, one could almost say, God, we're using that word again, the formless one life, the formless, timeless, one consciousness that underlies all manifestation momentarily shines through whenever there is a hole in the tapestry of physical existence. It's kind of the tapestry of forms. And in this tapestry of forms, which is gigantic, regularly, or all the time, holes appear.

If you were watching, let's just use the metaphor and say, the entire physical universe, sense-perceived universe, imagine it as an extremely complex tapestry, woven, huge, of course. And you look at it, and then you see, continuously, here and there, little things suddenly disappearing, and temporary holes being there, opening up in the tapestry. Then suddenly there and there.

So part of this tapestry, it's a continuously coming and going out and into form. No form in this tapestry remains for long. And so holes open up continuously in it, and then are replaced by something else.

But if you can be aware of the holes, the openings, something shines through them that is not to do with form, but it's the essence of all form. And that is enormously peaceful. There's enormous peace and aliveness there.

And that is the grace that lies concealed in any kind of death, accidental death, seemingly premature death, any kind of death, and any kind of loss. There is a grace there, potentially, but it does not help you if you deny it or run away from it. You say, no, I don't want to see that hole.

And you cover up the hole with reactions immediately, so that you don't have to face the emptiness. So when emptiness comes in your life, that is a beautiful, potentially, a beautiful opening in which you can actually find yourself. You find yourself by not resisting that.

And so you begin to welcome death when it comes, because it is an inseparable part of this world of form. And when we look at death, we judge it from the point of view of an identity, a sense of self that is identified with form. And from there, death looks horrible.

It looks dreadful. That's why nobody dares speak about it in Western culture, which is the most identified with egoic forms. Nobody dares.

Maybe one of the few countries left where death is still natural is India, where it's in the street. You can go to the bonfires where they burn the dead bodies every day. You can watch the very deep meditation.

If you can be there in a state of complete openness and just watch, that's the destiny of every form, is to dissolve again quickly. And when you watch, contemplate the dissolving of forms, that which is beyond form arises in you. You are in touch then with the formless in you.

That's the grace of death. Which is not the opposite of life. It's only the opposite of birth.

People think life and death, it's a question of life and death. No, it's a question of birth and death. Life is eternal.

Life cannot be destroyed. Forms, yes. Even physicists know that no energy is destroyed ever.

And in a wider sense, as you live in the present more and more, it's a continuous dying. As the expression goes, you die to the past every moment. You let go.

And this moment is always fresh. You can, of course, you remember what you need to remember, but you let go of any personalized attachment to a memory. There's nothing wrong with memories.

You need it. You wouldn't be able find your way back to your street, your house. Memory, of course, you need.

But self-identification with memory, you don't. So, as you live in presence, there's a continuous dying to this continuity of me, which is an accumulation of more and more things that I identify with. The continuity.

And that could be anything. You die to the past. When the bell is gone, it is gone.

It has disappeared. It is the past. And this moment remains fresh.

Oh, there is a freshness even in when something has dissolved. One could go so far as to say there is a breath of fresh air, metaphorically speaking, comes into this world of space-time, this world of physicality. Whenever a form dissolves, ah, ah, there's a lightness.

Ah. And with that, you welcome death. Stillness wanted to last a little longer.

Stillness is the death that you enter voluntarily, if you're ready for it. To relinquish your attachment to the structures of thought, to step out of the stream of thinking, is death, because thinking is form, primordial form. To step out of that is death.

The arising of stillness is your death, the death of the little me. Of course it is. And there are still many humans on the planet who are not ready for that.

They want to stay entangled in form. They want a continuation of the drama of form. They don't want an end to the drama.

There are humans, many humans still on the planet, who are not ready for the end of suffering. Even if the possibility were presented to them, they would run away in fear. It would seem like, no, the end of suffering would seem like a kind of death, the end of my drama.

I don't want that. But there are many humans also who are ready to stop suffering, to come to the end of suffering. It's an evolutionary development.

Now for this to, this shift to happen to you, there is one requirement, and we can put it in simple language. You need to be fed up with suffering. Not run away from it, not avoid it, but be fed up with it.

You've had enough. I've had enough. And if you are in psychological suffering, and all suffering is psychological suffering, the rest may be pain, toothache, whatever it may be, you can ask yourself at any moment, when you can see that you are in suffering, is that what I want?

Is that what I'm choosing at this moment? Is that what I'm creating at this moment? Humanity as a whole is coming to the point where the suffering is just too much.

It's been going on for so long. And for most of you, it is true, you have suffered enough. But it needs to be true for you.

That realization needs to come to you. So that no situation, nothing that happens to you, is converted into drama and suffering anymore. And the quickest way out of that, out of converting events, situations, interactions with people into drama and suffering, is to be present moment-centered, not story-centered, not thought-centered, not imposing interpretations and stories on the present moment, but allowing the moment to be as it is.

I gave a simple example of what is, what the mechanism that makes up the manufacture of drama and suffering in people's lives, the mental mechanism, the mechanicalness behind it. I gave a brief example in this little book, Stillness Speaks, where in one entry, one entry starts with three statements. One statement says, what a miserable day.

The other statement says, he didn't have the decency to return my call. The other statement says, she let me down. Then the text explains a little bit that these are stories that you impose on situations, events, and people in your life.

And those are simple, very simple examples, but even the complicated drama basically works according to that same principle. It's just that the stories that you impose become more complex. But this is where they start.

And the stories are imposed, in many cases, one of their main reasons for being there is to enhance your egoic, mind-made sense of self, to be right. Because if you are right, if you can complain about this miserable weather, unconsciously, the mechanism behind it is you've made the weather wrong and yourself right. You're in a superior position because you're complaining about it.

What this dreadful weather is just dreadful. If you can say, he didn't have the decency to return my call, it implies, this is unconscious, that you, of course, are morally superior in every way to this person. This is the position that you are coming from and identify with.

I'm not saying you do not see that certain people do very unconscious things. You see it, but the story then personalizes it, you find a reactive and personalized relationship to somebody's, perhaps, unconsciousness, and then use it to enhance your mind-made sense of self. This doesn't mean you don't see dysfunctional behavior for what it is, but you do not have a personalized reactive relationship to it anymore.

You allow that to be also. There's no person there. There's only human unconsciousness.

You don't enter into that personalized relationship that is story-based. She let me down. She wasn't there.

I was there. She was not. That's the event without the story.

It's raining. That's the miserable day without the story. He didn't call.

That's the event without the story. He didn't have the decency to return my call. It's amazing how simple things go.

If you take away the story, the simplicity of what is without the personalized story around it, how simple life then becomes. How simple this moment always is without imposing a story on it, which is, in any case, only there in the service of being right, in the service of feeling superior to the situation or the person, in the service of enhancing your always deficient mind-made egoic sense of self. This is all madness, dysfunction.

If you look and see how people complicate their lives for nothing, for an illusory identity. Then what is left then is things are as they are at this moment. People do what they do at this moment.

Beautifully illustrated in the story that you may have heard perhaps through this mouth before, in the story of the Zen master. Some of you probably don't know it, but it's such a beautiful story. The Zen master, who had an excellent reputation as a great teacher in a town in Japan, and one day was accused by the 17-year-old girl next door of being the father to her child that had just been born.

The parents asked, who is the father? They were shocked that she was giving birth to a baby. And she finally said, it was the master next door.

I went to see him nine months ago for a spiritual counseling session and then that's when he did it to me. And so the parents got extremely angry and started telling everybody about it. And they ran to the Zen master with the baby and put it there on his floor and said, we know what you did.

You are responsible. Now you look after the baby. We don't want anything to do with this baby anymore.

You take it. You are the father. We know it all now.

The Zen master looked and listened. And when they said, you are the father of this baby, he said, is that so? And then they said, yes, and we are leaving this baby here.

You can look after him. Is that so? Then they left.

The Zen master lost his reputation. Nobody came to him for counseling sessions anymore. Nobody wanted to hear him anymore.

All he had there was the baby. So that was the present moment. He picked up the baby and started getting some food, sent off somebody to get some food and spent one year mostly looking after the baby that was there.

A year later, the girl was a little bit more mature and cuddly confessed to her parents that the Zen master was actually not the father. It was the son of the butcher next door was the father. So, oh my God, they ran to the Zen master and said, please forgive us.

That is all a big mistake. We've just realized that you are not the father. The Zen master looked and said, is that so?

And they said, oh, can we have the baby back now, please? We now want the baby. We'll look after it.

So we want the baby back. Is that so? Okay.

And off they went. This is an extreme example of the good that comes. Only good is when no story, even stories that other people try to impose on you, is accepted.

No story is taken on. And this Zen is an extreme example of, it's a teaching story. It's an extreme example of non-reactive relationship to life and a non-story imposing relationship on life.

They had their story. They had to do, they had to make the Zen master wrong. The Zen master refused any kind of story, any kind of, he wasn't a victim of circumstance.

He didn't say, I can't look after this baby. What do I do? I can't have spent my time.

No, he did what was there to do at that moment. So the baby had the best possible start in life, because for one year grew up in this energy field of great peace with the Zen master. But then the Zen master did not cling, did not have a clinging relationship to that.

He was able to, in the moment, let go of the past and relinquished the baby and responded to this moment. The parents now, he so genuinely wanted the baby back. He, she was going to marry the butcher's son.

So this is an example of the simplicity. It may be a little bit extreme. You can, you can of course say, no, I am not the father.

There would be another possibility that is still not a story. No, I'm not the father. But if that is what you believe, I cannot help it.

Again, you are not buying into the story. But if you had your own, then people, you have a, you have a story to, to counteract their story, and so on, and so on, the stuff out of which drama is made. So look at your life and see, are you facing situations as they are?

Are you, or are you imposing and mixing up something here? Stories on simple, the simplicity that is always there in this moment. So that is, it's good to know that because the mind will always try to manufacture stories.

And the biggest one, of course, the most intriguing story, is the story of me, me and my life. That's so interesting. And if you can't tell anybody else about me and my life, then you can tell yourself about me and my, much about my life.

The story of me, the most fascinating story. And the story of me is part of the ego, the egoic sense of self. Not saying that you do not remember what happened to you.

Of course you remember what happened to you. Not saying don't have the photo albums anymore. You still have the photo albums, but to derive your identity from a story.

And when you look at the story of me, they can see that a lot of the identity that is derived from the story of me is to do, very often, with making other people wrong. And see how right you have been in that situation. And how wrong those people have been to you compared to, or situations, or God, him, her, or itself.

God itself has done something to you. And so attached to the story are certain emotions. Resentments, the story is enormously energized by resentments and anger, sadness, what they did to me, what they did to me.

Kinds of things. Can you look through the story and die to the story? Not lose your memory, but die to the story as a self-reference, as giving you your sense of self.

So where does your sense of self come from, then, if you let go of that? If you die to that, and see that's not who you are, and you die to the unconsciousness of manufacturing further stories. Even complaining, let's go back to the example of the cold soup.

Complaining about the cold soup is another story. The moment you complain about it, I'm not saying heat it up, please. That's not complaining.

But the inner complaining, or the outer verbal complaining, which implies making something or someone wrong, that's the story. So drama, unconscious people are waiting just for the next thing out of which they can manufacture drama. The egoic identity in conjunction with the pain body is just looking out for the next thing out of which to manufacture their next dramatic episode.

Now the kind of dramas that people are drawn into vary a little. Some people have the victim drama, somebody's always doing it to me. Other people have other kinds of drama.

They get very angry with situations and people. Others, they get very sad. Poor me.

Well, that's the victim. I can't remember what else. There's quite a few.

And then you see how they use the tiniest events to add a little bit to incorporate into their dramatic story. So if you can see that in others, that's already great. If you can see it in yourself, it's even greater when it happens.

See it. And so you see what that is. Some people have a greater amount of, a denser ego and a denser pain body than others.

But the basic principle is there in everyone to some extent, greater or lesser. But it ceases to operate the more you step into presence. Then there's still only remnants of that that occasionally come in.

And then your life becomes simplified. So simple. Simplify, simplify, said one famous writer.

Thoreau, I think it was. Simplify, simplify. Now people talk about simplifying their lives and think it's to do with not indulging in excessive consumption and so on, which of course is good too.

But that happens naturally. The true simplification happens on the inner level. Let go of the stories.

Pay more attention to this moment than anything else. This is the day that we spend in silence. The day that we spend listening.

Always just this moment. It sounds like a big thing if we say we'll spend the whole day listening, watching, being alert, attentive, alert to your surroundings and alert on the inner level. The more alert you are to sense perceptions, the more alertness you will also have within.

Stay for a little while with the empty chair.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle - The Transformation Of Consciousness

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 1:18:05)

Eckhart Tolle, The Transformation of Consciousness, released by Pagoo, so let's look at some of the great mysteries of human existence. Things that adults don't look at anymore, don't ask questions about anymore, only children still do. But while we sit here and listen to the words, realize there is another dimension than the words.

And what is that dimension? One could say, simply to notice the silent spaces. While the words happen, you hear the words, but some of your attention is also on the silent spaces, or the silent background.

It's very simple, it's simple to notice that there is, apart from the words, that there is also a stillness here. And a strange thing happens when you notice silence, which means pay attention to silence, a strange thing happens inside you at that moment, and that is, in that act of noticing silence, thought activity, the stream of thinking, stops during that moment when you notice silence. Und für einen Moment kommt der Fluss von Gedanken zum Ende, während man lauscht, der Stille lauscht.

So this is accessing a new dimension of consciousness that most people are not aware of. The possibility for the stream of thinking to come to an end without any loss of consciousness. And in the moment of noticing or listening to that dimension of silence, you're also completely present here in this moment, completely inhabiting this moment, being in it totally.

And this is the reason why we are here, to access that dimension in ourselves, to go beyond the continuous stream of thinking that most people are completely identified with as themselves, me. The self, the me, is in every thought, no distance. And that is the state of absence.

And here we are entering the state of presence. Otherwise you're completely trapped in the conditioning of the thinking mind with all its patterns, with its accumulated knowledge, experiences, past. You are simply acting out a script in the mind when you're totally one with that.

This is no freedom in that whatsoever. So the possibility arises of living in a different state of consciousness from the normal state. So you will have noticed already that here, in this talk, your mind, thinking mind, is not being fed or stimulated.

And if you sit here, and you are still completely identified with the stream of thinking, you will already notice restlessness, impatience, and discontent arising. And the thinking mind says, what's he talking about? I can't figure out.

He's not really saying anything. Because the thinking mind and the sense of self that comes with identification with the conditioned mind, a mind made sense of me, that sense of self is always looking for more to add to itself. So here it will be looking for some new ideas to put in here.

Oh, that's interesting. New beliefs. Now I know what I believe in.

Or maybe some new emotional experiences. And it's not being satisfied here because the thinking mind is not getting the food that it wants. That it wants to add to itself and then feel a little bit bigger when you leave here.

Added something to me. That's because the sense of self that is based on me and my story, my past, everybody's sense of identity, really, is what is it that people tell you when you ask them, who are you? Their identity.

They will give you the name. And they completely believe that that's who they are. They say it with great conviction.

This fact cannot be doubted that I am John Smith. Yes, I am. And then they will tell you what they do in relation to society, for a living.

And then if there's enough time left, they will tell you a little story. Or a long story. And that's the story of me.

And so the person will be talking about perhaps the roles that he or she plays in this world. And believing that that's who he or she is. I'm a mother of three.

I'm an accountant. I'm such and such. I'm unemployed.

I'm successful. I'm unemployed. They're little conceptual identities.

Concept in the head. Of course, everybody has certain roles to play in this life. But to believe that that's who you are, to be identified with that, that's a terrible prison, bondage.

You can honor the roles without believing that that's who you are. You can honor being a mother without this concept occupying your mind totally. Otherwise you will be a mother for the rest of your life, and your children will remain children to you.

And you always know better, and you'll tell them what to do. You are trapped in the role. And so the world is full of people who are trapped in the roles that society has given them, their conditioned roles.

Which is mindforms. That's what a role is, certain mindforms. Mental formations, thoughts.

So this is another aspect of being identified with the content of your mind. And that sense of self, identity, me, that is derived from identification with that, is never at ease, or fulfilled, at peace, for very long. Not for long.

So that self lives in a condition of not enough. And there is a feeling attached to it that is, I am not complete yet. I haven't made it yet.

I haven't arrived home yet. I need to be more. I need to grow in my sense of self.

And everybody, even if on the surface it looks as if the story of me had completed itself, and sometimes this culture tells you that the famous people, or the wealthy people, they have made it on the surface. So there is the illusion that you can arrive at a state of completion of your sense of self that is based on a story. The happy ending.

And if you meet the famous people, or wealthy people, you realize their state is the same as everybody else's. They don't feel that they have arrived. There is fear, there is discontent, a sense of lack.

And they have everything. So this sounds like bad news. As if you couldn't possibly make it in this life.

Now if you have enough time left, then that sense of self will still feel, OK, I have enough time to complete myself. I surely have another 40, 50 years ahead of me, and surely that is enough time to complete the story of me, and make it into a happy one that ends happily. So it's not realized that the discontent, unhappiness, that problematic me that everybody knows at first hand, people don't realize that this is not their personal problem, but it is built into the very structure of the mind.

It is a structural dysfunction, not a dysfunction based on content. And every sense of self, with its story, knows that the story didn't quite work out the way it should have up to this point. Things along the way did not go the way they were supposed to go.

And so, at this moment, and there is the belief that through future I can still complete myself. And then as you get older, you realize it never seems, that moment of completion never comes. And then future shrinks as you get older.

And so what many old people do, as the future shrinks, more and more they look to the past. At least I can hang on to that. And they keep that going through thinking and talking about it.

Just keep it going. And if the identity is an unhappy one, the mind-made identity, because life has done such dreadful things to you, treated you so unfairly, that you have an identity that is based on complaining, that's fine, it's better than no identity at all. I have to keep that going.

So there are many people who are trapped in a very unhappy sense of self, with continuous complaining in the mind about life, people around me, what they are doing to me, God, if there is a God, they believe in God. Or they say there can't possibly be a God, look at what he did. And once you are trapped in an identity, it becomes rigid, and you don't want to let go.

Through thinking and talking about yourself, to yourself and to others, you don't want to let go of the me. It doesn't matter how unhappy the me is. So if you have enough time, there is the search for more to complete me.

More possessions perhaps, maybe that would make me feel a little bit more secure, a little bit bigger, the bigger the car, maybe that would do it, it's bigger than other people's. And so the car becomes a thought form, it's not the car that really matters, because it's only metal, and in a few years it will be rust. It's not the car, it's the thought form of car that contains the self, and the me is in the thought form that identifies with the thought form of car, me, car, thought form.

And that is very normal. And if it's a big car, the me, the illusion of me has become a little bit bigger, through the thought form, for a little while. And after a little while, it doesn't work so well anymore as to satisfy the sense of self, it only works for a short period of time, and then you have to look for the next thing, that's the more.

And you look for the next thing, and this continuous looking for the next thing to complete me, is the psychological need, built into me, for the next moment, future. And everybody is looking for that, if you observe people, how they live, there's a need for the next moment, because it will enable me to get what I need to complete me. And then comes maybe the house, a big house, bigger than the car, and that's the thought form again arises, the me, the self is the thought form of my house, my.

My is a very interesting story, to say, mine. Children learn that very early on, one of the first things they learn, this is the beginning of the self, egoic self, that's mine. And so, an idea develops, and the whole civilization is based on that, the idea of owning something, ownership.

If you look at it clearly, you can see that to say, I own this, this table, whatever, this house, this car, it is mine, what does that mean? What? It's a story, you are telling yourself a story about this, it becomes a thought form.

Now, if you were mad, you might be telling yourself the story that, I own this huge office block, I own this 20 story office block, you walk past every day, and you say, that's mine. Now, and then it's possible that the rest of society may agree with your story, and they give you a piece of paper to show you that they agree with your story. So if you believe that you own something, and nobody else agrees with you, you're mad.

If everybody agrees with you, you're wealthy. Wealthy. And that wealthy is important because it makes the story bigger, until it becomes unhappy again.

So to see how important the concepts are in the head, and so people live in and through a conceptualized sense of self, mental concepts, and the moment you inhabit a conceptualized sense of self, then you also inhabit a conceptualized reality, because everything that you perceive is interpreted according through the eyes of the mind-made self, the me. So that is the compulsion to immediately interpret and label every experience, every perception. And those people who are very good at that, those people who can quickly label things, analyze things, store information, regurgitate information, cut things into tiny pieces to examine, they're good with concepts, that is called intelligent.

And if you're very good at cutting the tiniest piece of knowledge into even smaller pieces, then you get a PhD. If you have been to universities, you know how tiny the segments are that people do their research on. So that is the human condition.

And the need for more is not only a personal need, because that sense of self becomes a collective sense of self, through companies, corporations, nations, tribes, organizations. They are all created by that conceptual self, and they are an expression of that, a collective expression of that. So it's easy to say you look at a huge corporation and see how greedy that corporation is.

Only recently, the famous collapse of Enron Corporation in the United States, huge. And then you see the entire corporation was dominated by the greed for more, more it wanted to grow, grow. They would do anything to grow.

So it's easy to say look at this evil corporation, it's just a magnified ego. And so this, the self, the entity, the self, when it moves through life, the me, has two important things that it is concerned about. One is the wanting movement, wanting more.

And the other is the protective movement of I don't want to lose anything that I already have, the little that I have. So those two movements are wanting and fearing, desire, fear. And human beings move between these two.

Whatever, any action undertaken by the egoic self is either desire, the need for more, or fear, the need for protecting me. And every human being that you meet in that state, the little self, looks to see what can I get, it's unconscious of course, what can I get from him or her to add to me? And then it looks, is this person a threat to me?

So it looks through the eyes of fear and desire at each person you meet. And so this is how human beings live. And one more thing that makes it even worse, that self, the mind-made self, needs to have a clear boundary, which is also thought of course, a boundary between me and the rest of the world and others.

And with that comes the need, unconscious again, for that sense of self to define itself more strongly through opposition. The little self needs enemies somewhere, because without enemies, its sense of identity would no longer be rigid enough, it would become fluid. Collectively you can see it, how religions, nations, or different churches within the religions, tribes, how they love their enemies, they love them, not in the way that Jesus talks about it, they need their enemies because they define their sense of self, through that it becomes stronger.

Christians did this for a long, long time, some still do it. Muslims do it a lot these days, to define your sense of identity through having an enemy. This is not particular to any one religion, any religion lends itself to that.

Nations do it. Who would you be without the enemy that strengthens the illusory self enormously, to have, and on a personal level, that means the need for problems. So that's, again, it's unconscious, it's built into the structure of the mind.

So, we all know people who are attached to their problems, because it's always easier to see it in others than in oneself. And so many people's story-based self is mainly a collection of problems and conflict in my life. And when you ask them about their life, they will tell you their problems.

So if that is the human condition, personally, collectively, we can see why human history looks so insane, mad. Read 20th century history. It's a nightmare.

And if you watch TV tonight, the news, it's a continuation of that. So the world that human beings have created is an expression, a manifestation of their state of consciousness, rather unconsciousness. So now we can see why history is the way it's been ever since we started recording history.

So there is such a very strong element of dysfunction or madness in the human psyche. And all the great teachers, they saw that. Buddha, Jesus, Indian teachers from India, Hindu, they all saw that in the human condition there is an enormous dysfunction.

Buddhas called it suffering. The human condition is one of suffering, that's what he said. Jesus called it sin.

Of course it's been misinterpreted a lot. In India they call it illusion. So they saw that, and they also saw that there is a way beyond.

And a different state of consciousness is possible for humanity. Buddha calls it the end of suffering. Jesus calls it salvation or the kingdom of heaven.

Or in Indian teachings it may be called liberation or enlightenment. So at last we come to the good news. But you may have noticed sitting here and seeing the human condition, seeing it, just seeing it for what it is.

It is necessary because if there is no change in the human state of consciousness, the planet and humanity would probably not survive another 100 years. Because the dysfunction is now being magnified by the means of science and technology. And so for the first time humanity is faced with the possibility of bringing about its own extinction.

And so now a new state of consciousness has to arise in humans. And this is why it is arising. Now am I putting another idea into your head?

I don't want to put any ideas into your head. And some of you may ask, how do you know that a true change is happening? How do you know that?

This gathering here is part of that transformation of human consciousness. So this is what we are looking at now. The transformation of consciousness that is possible and is happening here.

Why? How? How do we get out of thousands and thousands of years of conditioning?

And the little self says, oh, this sounds very interesting. I want to become transformed. Yes.

And it says, tell me more and tell me how to get there. How do I get from here to there? In other words, another image forms in the mind of me attaining a state of consciousness, an ideal.

And so, okay, the big car didn't work, the big house didn't work, status in society didn't complete me, marriages didn't complete me, experiences, traveling, knowledge, Ph.D. But now, there's a possibility of attaining, of adding to me the ultimate attainment. And so you become a spiritual seeker. And don't realize that the same mindset with its need for more and need for future to complete me still operates.

And so after 20 years of seeking, you get a little tired. A few times you actually thought you found it, the great experience. And suddenly, it receded into the past.

And then you became somebody who once had a great experience. Better than nothing. You can talk about it, think about it, and feel unhappy about it.

And after a few years, that feels very familiar. So the self, the mind made self says, okay, well, tell me how to get there, no matter how much time it takes. In fact, give me time, and I'll get there.

And in some teachings, you get it, it feels good. The teachings say, there are 12 steps, and then you know exactly where you are. I'm at 4, where are you?

So in some teachings, you may have the 12 steps, and the only one who has attained 13 is the leader of the group. So the mind made self lives through time. Time is past, gives it its identity.

Future holds the possibility of completion, so it's time bound. And this is why that sense of self and time go together, that's why time is so important to us in this civilization. And time is a strange thing, it goes on and on, and yet the most common expression you hear about time is, I don't have it, not enough.

And there's so much everywhere, time. And time is a very strange mystery, a great mystery. On the one hand, it seems so real, nobody could deny it, because we are spending time here, you spend time coming here, and then very soon this will be over because time is passing.

And then, before you know it, you're going home again, time is passing. And you can't stop the thing, it drags you along, it's like you're sitting on an express train and it never stops, you see the landscape. Even our gathering here, for a long time it was a future event, there it was coming.

Another three days, two days, one day, and then it's here, and it goes... Was that it? The express train is gone, it's gone into the past, the future approaches slowly, the more distant the more slowly, just like space.

The more distant, the slower, and then suddenly it comes, and before you know it, it's gone. It's so fleeting, before you know it, it's gone. It's strange.

There was a, I believe a poet, talked about time as a fire that consumes us all. And, in a way, this is true, because what fire leaves behind is ashes, and that will remain of these bodies, burnt by time. At Christmas I visited old friends I hadn't seen in many, many years, and when I saw them at first, I thought they must be ill.

And then I realized, no, it's time did that. This is terrible, time did that to you, I didn't say that. So it's a very strange thing, time.

It seems we can't get out of it, but on the other hand we never have enough of it. It consumes us, okay. But then there's something else, and that's strange.

Time really is past and future. That's time. That's time.

Now the strange thing is, you never actually really encounter past or future, ever. So the strange thing is, all there ever is, is now. It's always now.

And the strange thing is that nothing ever happened to you, you never did anything or experienced anything in the past. Whatever ever happened to you must have happened in the now. And as the future never comes, of course, because when it comes, it's now.

And so we can see even when we remember the past. What you remember is a memory trace that you are giving attention to now. You can only remember it now.

And what you remember, the event, the thought form that happened in the now. So the memory must have happened in the now and you can only remember it now, so you can't get away from now. And so we realize the strange thing that actually there is, ultimately, there is no past and no future in your life.

The future is what you project now. So there is no life apart from now. So it's strange that on the one hand, time seems to be so powerful, but on the other hand, this is not philosophy, it's too simple.

Philosophy would be more complicated. We'll keep it simple. Time seems so real and seems to do things to us.

And yet, if you look closely, you can't find it. You can't find it. All you ever find is this moment.

So what it does to the body, if time is ultimately not real, maybe the body is ultimately not real. Maybe both are aspects of the same illusion. But this we will now put aside.

To realize that your entire life unfolds in the space of now, never was not now, never will be not now. And the strange thing is, when people are trapped in their egoic, mind-made identity, all they are interested in is past and future. In other words, they're interested in everything except what is real.

And they miss this almost continuously. And so the present moment, at best, becomes a stepping stone that enables me to get to the next moment. And very often, I'm trying to get away from this now.

I resist it, I don't like it. I'm on my way to somewhere much more important. It's the next moment where I'm going to find myself.

So we come to the, there's a little, an opening now. At first it seems very small. The opening is out of the conditioned mind.

Freedom from thousands of years of conditioning through accessing the power that lies hidden in the present moment. The transformation of consciousness that is happening is simply, one could say, finding a new relationship towards now. A new relationship with now.

And a new... Eine neue innere Einstellung. Zum jetzt.

It is somewhere. Somewhere. I mentioned the need of the mind-made self for problems and enemies.

And one could say the greatest enemy of the mind-made self is the now. People don't realize that they have made the now into an enemy. And the transformation of consciousness is not something that could happen to you at some point in the future.

The transformation of consciousness is simply aligning yourself internally with this moment. And you can only do that now. Is it possible to live in such a way so that you welcome this moment, the only moment there ever is.

It's always this moment. There's only one ever. It's this one.

You welcome this now, no matter what form this now takes. Now the little me in the head says, No. I don't even like this now.

I want to get away from it. It's not completing me. It's actually stopping me.

It's an obstacle to where I want to get to. An obstacle to the story of me. That's what the now is.

This now, the little me says, is actually sabotaging my life, my story. That's why I need to get to the next moment. And that is a structural dysfunction to live in such a way that the now is continuously resisted.

The possibility now arises to bring a yes to this moment. Because it is. Because it always is as it is.

And you can scream and shout and complain, but it still is as it is. Now the little self says, yes, but I want to improve the world. I want to make the world a better place.

But this moment is dreadful. I don't want to accept this dreadful thing. And so you run away.

Run away from this. What happens? What happens?

It's enormous to recognize that the form that this moment takes, the form that it takes, of course, changes continuously. There's the field of now, and there's a form that appears in it. And then it disappears.

But really, it remains as the field of now. It disappears, the mind projects past to accommodate what's just happened. But really, everything is in this place of now.

It comes into the now. So there's only one moment, one now. It never leaves you.

Not many moments. Many forms that this moment can take. And what form this moment takes, whatever happens, is not a separate event.

There are no separate events. We know from ancient teachings and from modern physics that everything is interconnected. There are no separate entities or events.

And that means what appears in the now, what happens in the now, is an expression of the totality. And that means it could not be otherwise. The entire cosmos has brought this about.

So that is the inevitability of the form that this moment takes. When you recognize the inevitability of is, then you see the madness of resisting that. And what the resistance does, it strengthens the me entity.

It strengthens the illusion. And that's why the little me loves to make the now into its enemy. When you see that, the possibility of living in a different way arises.

And internally, you align yourself with now. And that means you allow this moment to be as it is. The Buddha used the word suchness, the suchness of things.

And the little me says, no, nothing is ever going to change. You will get stuck in this dreadful now for the rest of your life. And it doesn't realize that it's been stuck in its own mind patterns all your life.

When you allow this moment to be, you say yes to it. Yes. That yes is the end of thousands and thousands of years of collective conditioning.

The no to now, the reaction, the reactive no to this moment, to the form that this moment takes, strengthens the psychological form of me. And with a yes, no matter what form this takes, you bring a yes to it. And a strange thing happens.

There's suddenly, one could say, a space around what happens. And also inner space arises, a sense of spaciousness. And that is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness.

And there is vast intelligence in that unconditioned consciousness. The conditioned consciousness is the human mind. Which is a small aspect of that vast one intelligence.

So, something happens. It may be a challenge that comes into your life. Life does that.

It happens in the field of now. And it is not resisted, but simply given attention. You look at it.

And it arises, and you simply allow a flow of attention. You look. And this is an enormous change, the ability to simply be there with what is, in that state of alert attention.

And in that state of alert attention, enormous intelligence operates. And if action is needed, action will happen. And it will come not out of resistance, but out of the intelligence that is that state of alert awareness.

It often happens also that suddenly an external factor may come in to do what is required in that situation. A synchronistic event, for example. You are connected now with the one intelligence which is not confined to your brain.

So you can meet life in that state of welcoming whatever happens. Even if on the surface it looks bad. It could not be otherwise.

You cannot argue with is, so you might as well welcome it. But are there not everywhere dreadful situations in life, injustices, violence, people doing dreadful things to other people? Are you asking me not to do anything about it?

See what happens if you are there as the space of unconditioned intelligence. Go into a situation as not a little entity that is fighting and unhappy and angry and wants to create a better world out of its anger. And what see, the true transformed world can only arise out of the transformed state of consciousness.

So this is the only thing for us here to realize as we sit here, the possibility of meeting whatever happens in now in a state of yes. Yes. And that suddenly the portal is open and the unconditioned intelligence moves through you and begins to operate in your life.

You are now being lived by life. And then you can walk around, you can look at something and allow it to be so completely that the compulsion to label it mentally isn't there anymore. So you are not trapped anymore in the labels, concepts, thoughts.

This is the awakening out of the dream of thought. Not that thought does not happen anymore, but it is recognized as thought. You see it for what it is.

The seeing is the unconditioned consciousness. We can point to it here through words, but the true teaching is to sense the space out of which the words come. Some of you have studied Zen.

What is Zen all about? This. An uncompromising refusal to leave now, except for practical matters.

Tomorrow I will meet at such and such a time. Okay. Back now.

There was a Zen teacher who when asked what is the meaning of Zen, some teachers would hit you or some teachers give nonsensical explanations, but there was one teacher who became famous because all he would ever do was raise his finger when he was asked, Can you explain Zen to us, please? Yes. Oh, now the last secret.

The secret of now is to sense the now directly. Not as what happens in it, but as the underlying field. And then you realize that the now isn't really separate from who you are.

Because you are that field of aware presence. And some people have used different words to describe it. It is simply beingness, presence, I am, I am, but no longer this or that.

And that's God's self-definition in the Bible somewhere. They ask, Who are you? What's your name?

God says, I am as I am. I am that I am. So that, this is the essence of being.

So your identity is no longer the little story, but that field. So your spiritual practice is simply to bring a yes to this, to the now. And many times the old no will come back, the wave of resistance to what is.

What do you do then? You notice it and say, oh, there's a no. As a space of alert, aware presence.

And you still remember your roles and your past. After this, it's just a continuous stepping out when you get drawn back into the concepts, this conceptual self. And you notice it, you become unhappy, suffering.

And you become unhappy, you've lost the now. Oh, where's the now? My past, my future.

And then suddenly your attention goes, phew. Oh. And there isn't actually a problem here, is there?

And then you lose yourself again and it sucks up your attention, that thing here. So it's a continuous back and that, oh. And so increasingly you walk on this narrow, this edge of now.

Beautiful.

Eckhart Tolle - Waking Up to the Reality of Ones True Nature

If you've been to a talk or retreat before, you know that I often point out at this stage that you should check within to see if you are waiting for something to happen, waiting for the talk to start. What does that mean, waiting? It means there's a little bit of inner strain, a slight, very tiny inner stress that pulls you away from here and now.

Expressed facially, it could be like, and when you notice that, then you know something about your relationship with the present moment. You lost it. The end of the relationship.

Now, did he or she leave you, or did you leave him or her? He or she doesn't leave you, you left. The waiting is so subtle and so all-pervasive as one's normal state of consciousness that most people don't even know that they're in an almost continuous state of waiting.

That's how normal it is. Once you detect it in yourself, it's a slight tension, strain, stress. Sometimes there's a little bit of irritation mixed in, a thought mixed in.

Come on, let's get on with it. We only have a couple of hours this morning, come on. But if you notice it in yourself as a mental energy field, and even some emotion may go with it.

Irritation is an emotion. Thoughts go with it occasionally. The moment you notice it, something has arisen that is not part of that deeply conditioned mind pattern.

The seeing of it is not part of it. The seeing of it, and that's the seeing of any pattern in yourself, is not part of the pattern. And the seeing, the recognizing of it, requires you to be present, aware at this moment, awake.

So when you see a pattern in yourself, mental, emotional, conditioned, of course. Now the waiting is a collective pattern, almost everybody has that. There may be other patterns in you that you detect that are to do with your personal life.

It doesn't matter what it is, it could be the simplest thing. When you see a man with a beard and dark hair, you feel anxious, and then you realize that maybe he looks like your father, and you didn't have a good relationship with him. Any pattern, collective or personal, when you detect it, there's something more at that moment than that which you see.

There is the seeing of it. Before, the pattern absorbed your consciousness completely. You wear it, you become it.

You are the waiting, anxious, somewhat irritated person. There's no space around the irritation, around the stress of that moment. There's no space around it, you are in it.

And then suddenly you see it. And one could say it is a stepping back, perhaps the deeper meaning of retreat. Because you are retreating not only from the world that you usually move in, you have to retreat also from the world in your head.

You step back. And something arises that is not conditioned, and that is pure, simple, pure, miraculous consciousness, awareness, presence, whatever you want to call it. And that is the part in you that is not conditioned.

Everything else is conditioned. The seeing, that is an energy field, I'm using seeing metaphorically, it's not necessarily with your eyes. The noticing, the seeing, you may feel it, but there is the presence in which it is felt, which means suddenly there is space around that.

And so it could be anything that you notice in yourself. It could be compulsive behavior, this or that, compulsive reaction. Almost everything is compulsive.

Well, everything is compulsive when you are not there as the witnessing presence. Your entire movement of thought is compulsive. You can't stop, or you think you can't stop.

And the mind loves to tell you that you cannot stop, and make a problem out of that, which leads to further thinking. Why can't I stop my mind? What's wrong with me?

I've been doing meditation for years. And I still can't do it. There's no point in going on, is there?

And then you believe in every thought. There's no point in going on. I might as well chuck it all in.

And then suddenly you step back and you watch those thoughts. So this is the arising of something new in you. New in the sense that you hadn't noticed that dimension in yourself before.

It was there all along, waiting underneath all the conditioned mind movements. But you didn't know it was there. And suddenly it arises.

It kind of, at this time in the evolution of the planet and of humanity, that is pushing through from underneath all the conditioned collective stuff that people carry and identify with as themselves. Something else is pushing forward from deeper, a deeper dimension within you. It's almost like the eggshell needing to break.

Something wants to come out of there. And so there comes a time when the shell, which is really the shell of that egoic sense of self that consists of identification with thought, needs to break. There is an evolutionary impulse in the universe towards consciousness.

And that has been playing itself out on the planet for millions of years. Consciousness expressing itself in ever-changing forms. And through humans, consciousness now wants to come to a flowering that hasn't happened before, never on a large scale, only to a few isolated individuals.

And what humans did to them, well, either they ignored them completely, or they killed them, or they made them into gods to be worshipped. And those were only the few individuals in whom this came through almost prematurely, but they were necessary precursors of what was to come, a deeper change. Now, I'm not telling you, of course, to wait for some change to happen on the planet.

You know, there are many, many, many times in the history, groups of people have waited for the end or some drastic change. We are not waiting. I'm just pointing out that this gathering here is already part of this transformation, this flowering of consciousness.

And anybody who in a so-called future moment, which doesn't exist, listens to this, it will be in the now, nobody could ever listen to this anywhere else except in the now, is also part of that transformation of consciousness, because as you listen, something new arises. There is more here than the words. There is that which the words point to, which is here as an alive presence in you, an inner arising.

There's more here than the words. If there were only the words, it wouldn't be that much. So consciousness then wants to flower through the human form.

Whether it fully will do that on a large scale, we don't know yet. Although it is happening here, there's also the dysfunction of the old form, which is no longer working, similar to a caterpillar that comes to the end of its lifespan as a caterpillar. And the closer it comes to the end of its lifespan as a caterpillar, the more difficult it gets to continue to...

Suddenly the crawling doesn't work anymore. Things don't work anymore. The caterpillar existence becomes dysfunctional.

It was fine before, because something new is destined to emerge out of this thing that is bound by gravity, can't even lift itself up one inch. And now the evolutionary transformation, when it happens, is not a progressive thing of getting better and better at doing something in a certain way, but a complete leap to another dimension. So in the case of the caterpillar, it doesn't mean that he gets better at crawling, faster and faster.

No, that is left behind completely, and something emerges that is a different being. Suddenly something comes out of it, and it has the most beautiful wings, and it flies off, has almost no weight at all. It has completely transcended the gravity of the planet.

And in the case of humans, what does that mean? Humans have been immersed in thinking for thousands and thousands and hundreds of thousands of years. The arising of thought was a necessary stage in the evolution.

Of course, it had wonderful sides too, to be able to think and speak, which is connected with thinking, words, form words and concepts. And yet gradually, humans lost through that, became totally entangled in it, and they lost their connectedness with something deeper than thought. They perhaps once had it, a deep connection with life, not life of form, the formless one life that is the essence of who you are, the one formless life.

But that connection humans had in the way that everything natural still has that, but they didn't even know it. It was so natural, they couldn't imagine anything else. They had that deep connectedness in which there's no fear of death, because there's a deep knowing that there is no death, only the form dissolving.

The leaf, all the millions or billions of leaves that we see around us now are all dying. And there's such beauty in their death even. And they are not afraid of death, they just die beautifully.

So in humans, thought gradually captured their consciousness, so that their whole sense of self became entangled in thought. And then gradually thought itself became more dysfunctional. It created a dysfunctional world.

From the beginning of recorded history, if you read history and are alert, if you had just come here from another planet and you are reading human history for the first time, you can see that a large part of the human suffering, that is history, is inflicted on humans by other humans. All the wars and murder and cruelties, continuous warfare, except brief interludes, because they got exhausted for a while. And then the most dysfunctional century, the 20th.

A hundred million dead, killed by other humans. And this is a continuation, the 21st century. So on that level, the old continues.

The caterpillar is still trying to have its way. And it's getting more and more difficult. Similarly, we could compare it to the flowering of plants, this incredible beauty that has arisen on the planet through flowers.

Consciousness expressing itself through this ethereal form of flowers that humans have always recognized as very special. And all flowers have had a significance. Well, perhaps the first thing in humanity that was not utilitarian, that you couldn't really eat or do anything with it.

And yet they valued that beyond anything that they could do with it. Because deep down, in a very, very deep, distantly, they recognized perhaps beauty there for the first time, when the first human discovered beauty. Ah!

But flowers came much later than plants. There were 100 million or 200 million years of plants before the first flower ever opened. I'm told that was about 230 million years ago, the first flower opened on the planet.

But many millions of years before that, plants already covered the planet. Now plants, certain plants flowered, others chose not to flower. And perhaps it will be the same with humanity.

Perhaps only part of humanity will go through this inner shift and the other part will say, no, we're okay as we are. But it only requires part of humanity to go through this flowering for the entire energy field of the planet to be transformed. So what humans then are not doing is to continue perfecting the old way, the caterpillar trying to crawl faster and faster.

If we use this metaphor for humans, then that would mean humans develop the thinking mind more and more. This is what, of course, they've been trying to do. Let's analyze this, more and more analysis, more and more getting facts and thinking.

Okay, how can we solve the problems that we've got, seem to have a proliferation of problems on the planet. They seem to get more and more, I don't know. Let's get together and think and see how we can solve this and analyze this problem, cut it into bits and pieces.

This is what they do at universities. They cut the subject matters into tinier and tinier pieces. 100 or 200 years ago, it was more satisfying still to be engaged in intellectual endeavors because you had a wide field.

Everybody at university had a huge amount of knowledge. Even the scientists had great knowledge. They knew Latin and Greek and had knowledge of classical culture and everything.

And nowadays, they have knowledge of a tiny segment of their speciality. They can't afford to study anything else. So it's not all that interesting anymore.

You can write a PhD on the leaves of the tree, the leaf of the oak tree. It's this wonderful phenomenon, of course, the leaf, but to see it in isolation. So everything, the mind cuts it up and it doesn't solve anything.

Any solution that it comes up with creates more problems. Okay, now we'll invent a medicine to combat the side effects of this medicine. And then another one to combat the side effects.

So humanity has really come to the end of the road as far as one particular line of growth or development is concerned. And now the shift needs to happen and is happening to something entirely different, which means thinking will become no longer primary but secondary. You can still think beautifully, but you're no longer trapped in thought.

Something arises that is deeper than thought, and that is the butterfly. It's like something suddenly emerging that's so different from what was there before. And some of you have already experienced that in yourself, that shift.

From there was once this anxious, depressed, whatever, angry, stressful little me. Something else has come and there's been an opening. And a spaciousness that wasn't there before, or was there, but had been obscured continuously.

That is the new. And it's from there that you see the old in you, which of course still has its momentum. It has its momentum both on the external level, when you see the news and read the newspapers, then you can see how strong the momentum of the dysfunctional consciousness in humanity still is.

And you can see it in yourself occasionally, that the old reactivity, the old reactions, or the waiting for the next thing, the denial of what is, in various ways of running away from the present moment, all these old movements also still periodically come as wave movements. And sometimes even the seeing is lost. Even in those in whom the new is already arising, sometimes they get lost totally in the old, deeply conditioned, collective, personal mind movement.

And wake up a few hours later, a few days later, you might even be lost a few weeks. I've heard of people who got lost for a whole year, and then they couldn't stand the suffering anymore, and finally, through the suffering, they got woken up again. It's like being in a nightmare, when it gets so bad that you can't stand it anymore, suddenly you go...

and realize that you're in a bed, a warm bed. And this is a very significant term, waking up. And of course it has been used for thousands of years in spiritual teachings.

Awaken. Because everybody knows what awakens means on one level, because everybody wakes up every morning out of sleep. And you know what that is.

So there's dream, sleep, and dream. And then they go... So it's used as a kind of metaphor to describe something that is similar to waking up from sleep.

But of course it's not that, because in spiritual terms, ordinary human consciousness is a kind of sleep also. To be identified completely with one's conditioned thinking and emotion, that movement, to be totally identified with that is a kind of dream. Conditioned.

And so most humans are still in it, but many, many more than ever before are now waking up out of that. But to see in yourself, to verify it in yourself that it is a kind of dream to be in that. Because, and it creates a certain reality that corresponds to your conditioning.

You interpret through the veil of this dream, through the old interpretations and reactions, you interpret the events and people and situations around you. So everything, it gets incorporated into the dream world. So you see nothing then as it is, because you impose your dream on it.

Human beings that come into your life, situations that you are in, you don't see it as it is. You only see your story about it. And so, and then a moment comes when you wake up and you see the possibility of relating, of being and relating without the otherwise compulsive mental interpretations that you have.

Sometimes when we speak of allowing this moment to be as it is, which is the essential spiritual practice, people think what we are talking about is allowing their interpretation of this moment. They cannot distinguish between this moment and the way in which they interpret this moment, how they personalize it. So you could be sitting on a park bench and you may have heard this teaching that says allow this moment to be as it is.

And then you think, okay, I'm a former CEO of that company who lost his position due to evil people around him and then soon later was left by his wife. His children don't like him. So this man is saying, okay, this moment, what I need to accept is that my life is in ruins.

It's come to nothing. Here I sit penniless on this bench, 30 years of hard work, nothing to show for it. It's all gone.

So what I need to accept now is that my life is a complete mess and totally in ruins. That's a story. So the man is confusing a story with this moment and he is imposing a story on this moment.

That's one story. There are many other possible stories. The reality is always much more simple than the story.

The story is this bench, this energy field sitting here, sensing the aliveness in the inner body, the trees, the birds, the clouds, the air, the sound of the leaves in the wind, the aliveness of it all, vibrant, without needing to tell yourself anything, you sense that, you see it. This moment is the simplicity of sitting here on the park bench and watching the aliveness all around. What do you need to interpret?

You accept this moment as it is and then you put your hand in your pocket and you pull out two dollars. That's what I have here, two dollars. All right.

You accept that. What else can you do? That's what is.

So the whole story of ruined and all come to nothing and we're never going to make it anymore, all that mind movement is not really part, is not part of the simplicity of now. So don't confuse when we speak of accept what is don't confuse a story with the simplicity of what is. What is, is just this here, sense perceptions, feeling the inner body and most importantly, something that's usually ignored, to be aware of, it's very hard to use words here, to be aware and as I speak, there's the possibility that this is now seen, experienced by you here.

As you sit here, what is the reality of this moment? You let go of the stories in your head about who you are or what your life is. That's your life situation, not your life.

That's past. So what's, and it's all a story. It's the story of me in the head that you tell yourself.

I'm not talking, if it's memories are fine, but to identify with memories, then you personalize, it becomes a me. Your memories become a self. What's the reality of this moment?

Here, sitting here, there are sense perceptions, auditory, the humming sound and the voice, visual sense perceptions of the room, the person sitting up here, other people in the room, the ceiling, the lights, sunlight coming in, flowers up here, and you can feel perhaps your inner body also, the aliveness that is there in your inner energy field. And underlying all that, even deeper than anything that you experience or notice at this moment, is the alert attention, the field of alert attention in which this seeing, this hearing, this sensing is happening. One could also call it a field of stillness.

There's a field, an alert stillness in which your sense perceptions happen. That alert stillness is always there. Otherwise, there would be nothing for anything to be.

There needs to be consciousness in which the experience or the thought or the perception happens. So that alert underlying field is consciousness itself. And it is a revolutionary thing for a human to become aware of that, but it is also very, very subtle.

It is not something that you can grasp. The mind will try to make it into some new object, and the danger, of course, is there when we talk about it. We make it into an object of consciousness because we put it into words.

We make a thought out of it, out of something that is far beyond thought. So the mind thinks there is something here to grasp and hang on to or to achieve or to hold, but there isn't. It is all-pervasive, the only real power in the universe, and at the same time, it is so subtle that most humans miss it entirely.

They don't know that dimension. They only know that which arises in consciousness. They know it, but they identify with it.

They react to it. What arises in your field of consciousness are sense perceptions, experiences, thoughts and emotions. Sense perceptions, experiences, things happen, situations, which is also really sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions.

And so they are identified with the objects that arise in consciousness, completely identified, never knowing that deeper level that is the very condition for the arising of anything comes out of that. And one could describe that as stillness. The word limits it somewhat, but it's a pointer.

So one could say there is in you the dimension of stillness. Has never not been there. Is not something that you need to acquire or achieve, that you could achieve in the future, in time.

If you're looking to the future to achieve that dimension, enlightenment, whatever you want to call it, if you look to the future to achieve that dimension, that very looking to the future prevents you from seeing that it's already the very essence of your being now. So many humans are looking to the future to look for fulfillment or enlightenment or liberation in whatever way, through a million dollars or through spiritual enlightenment. They look to the future for that.

And the moment you move away and look to the future for it as if it were something that you could get, from someone or through some experience, you've gone away from it. Mentally, you've gone into the old conditioned mind movement which is looking to the next thing. This is why I spoke yesterday of the vertical dimension that we are going into here.

So the dimension of stillness, let's for a moment use that pointer, and let's never get attached too much to one single pointer because then you make it into some kind of belief. And the concept satisfies you for a moment. And then you could even say, I believe in stillness.

You don't believe in stillness? You're wrong. And then somebody else says, No, no, it's presence, it's not stillness.

There is in you that already, the stillness underneath all the mental noise and the emotional fluctuations, there is that realm of the unconditioned pure awareness, pure consciousness. And that is, on the one hand, you could call it, it is the non-personal dimension of you. It is where you transcend the personal sense of self.

And then you might say, Ah, no, I don't want to lose myself. Ah, but what you hadn't realized is, you think that yourself is the story of yourself. But that is no more than thoughts.

If you look very deeply and closely into what you mean when you say, I don't want to lose myself. I can feel there is something precious here that I do not want to lose. And you think, that sense of something precious that I am, I cannot imagine that I am going to die.

The world, me dead, and the world without me, can't be. So there is something, one feels there is something precious, and people, the fear of death comes, because people believe this is going to be lost. That sense of precious, if you look closely at what that really is, you see that it is something that has become mixed up with the story that you tell yourself about who you are.

About the name, the psychological form of me, all the things associated with that, the story of me, the beliefs. And something has become mixed up with that, and that is the sense of I, a deeper sense of beingness, that got mixed up with the story. And when you touch, even touch the realm of stillness in yourself, that is the deepest fulfillment that could be, and you realize who you truly are, is that, that is the essence of your sense of I, I, I, I am.

It has nothing to do with the story, it just got confused with the story. Sometimes people discover that whose story is destroyed by life. Life does something to you, that you cannot, the story becomes totally unbearable, everything collapses around you, so you cannot uphold the story anymore of me, as somebody who has done this or has done that, or has achieved that, it has all left you.

Maybe the body has become ill, is collapsing, things around you are collapsing, there is nothing left that you can claim anything about, make any claim about, possession, this or that, it is all gone. I don't know who I am anymore. Some people experience that realization in prison, when they are stripped of everything.

Everything has left them, the story has collapsed, I don't understand anything. Some people experience it when there is a usual, a sudden great disaster in their life. Suddenly, all their explanations don't work anymore, the way they had explained, they had all figured it all out, how the universe works, and my place in the universe, and the importance of my life, my work, what I have achieved and done.

And suddenly, your whole career suddenly crumbles, maybe something crumbles around you, and with it, that. And in the last moments of this physical form, suddenly all that leaves you, your story collapses at the same time as the world around you collapses, you might be on a sinking ship, or building collapsing, and at that moment, there is a corresponding inner collapse of the mental edifice of the story of me. And what is left, when that collapses, is what was always there, you touch the stillness, and you touch the deepest sense of being of I am.

That has nothing to do with your physical form or your psychological form of me. Nothing to do with form. And there is a moment of peace and stillness.

And many people who have touched death and survived miraculously, many tell the story of suddenly encountering a realm of great serenity and peace. All fear leaves them. And then they come back, and many of them have never feared death again, because they have already faced death.

And so death is when the structures crumble, not only around you, but the inner structures. One way is through disaster, and another way is through, the more gentle way, is through sitting here. And you have chosen that one.

Other people choose the disaster, and that works very well too. And even if there was only a moment before death comes and that is realized, that is the flowering. Your life has flowered.

Consciousness has flowered through this form and realized itself through this form. For the first time, well, not the very first, but on this planet, it's still a very rare phenomenon for this to happen. Consciousness, one could say, no, it is only a little, almost a parable, that consciousness itself is dreaming the dream of form and enjoying the dream.

The entire universe is. Look at the planet of the billions of life forms. Any form, whatever you could imagine, exists or has existed at some point as a life form.

Look at the oceans, how many incredible life forms live in the oceans alone. Every form that the wildest imagination could come up with, it will be somewhere in the ocean. The most, wow, this comes out of somebody's dream, maybe they're on acid.

So am I saying that the universe is on acid? Well, something like that. Because there is obviously some wild creation going on, some incredible dream of most gigantic proportions, and that's only in one ocean on one planet.

And then on land, millions of insects, different forms of different plants, and then on the level that you cannot see, the microorganisms, it's just unbelievable. And that's only one tiny planet of trillions, trillions, the vastness of the universe, and everywhere there is the game of form. What a gigantic dream.

But built into that dream, because what is in each human is a microcosmic version of the entire universe, so the awakening of humans is also the awakening of the universe, because you cannot separate the human from the entire universe. They need each other. They are totally one.

There would not even be a universe without the perceiving consciousness. The one consciousness that comes through humans creates the universe as perceived by humans. Other forms perceive a different universe.

It's all the same, and yet it's different. The one consciousness dreaming innumerable dreams. Impossible to understand.

But what we see when we look at humans, they are immersed in a kind of dream also, when you're totally in, totally identified with your reactions, and you play out the drama of your life in relationships, at work, and you go, oh, oh, oh. And you get elated. Oh, it's great, I made it.

And a few months later, you go down, you lost it again. Oh, it's a stage. All the world's a stage.

Shakespeare saw that. And all men and women are merely players. And this is the stuff that dreams are made on.

So humans can wake up out of that dreamlike existence that they are otherwise immersed in, where there is no sense of who they are apart from the script that they act out, the inner script. Complete identification. And then there's the possibility of awakening, becoming aware of that which underlies the script, without which there would be no script, there would be nothing.

There's a vast realm of still, aware presence from where you can see the dream world without being immersed in it. The body is still in it, but there is a seeing. You can see your own drama.

You can see yourself playing out your own script. And gradually, the awakening is, ah, something arises that is not part of the play of form, but that can see the play of form. And if that can arise in you, it means it is a universal movement.

So through you, the universe not only wants to experience this gigantic dream, there's something else built into the dream, and that is the need of the universe to awaken out of the dream. It loves that even more than the dream. And that is, so what we cannot even begin to conceive of the magnitude of what looks only like some people in a room, sitting, listening, speaking, that this is part of a much larger movement that's connected to even the most distant galaxy is part of something that is happening in the universe.

It is an event created by the one life that is the universe. So you think on a personal level, it's good to sit here because your life becomes lighter, free. So you feel a relief on a personal level, suffering, less and less suffering, clarity arising, stillness arising, a sense of connectedness, of beingness, a deeper sense of I, I.

But that is all a huge event of cosmic proportions. So the awakening is the awakening of the totality through this form. That is the purpose of your life, to be that.

So you align yourself with the larger purpose. The secondary purpose is whatever you do in your life, and you can bring the opening into anything that you do, almost anything. If you can't, you leave it.

Some things have to be left, and other things are fine. It happens wherever you are. So this is what we temporarily call stillness in you, becoming aware that that dimension is already there, coming to the end of identification with thinking, and realizing that you are more fully yourself when you do not think.

Without trying not to think, there are many here who already experience the state of being free of thinking without even knowing it. You may be walking and looking at a tree and seeing the magnificence of that spectacle of the dying leaves and all their beauty, and you are perceiving that in and through stillness. And perhaps a minute later you might say something to a person next to you and say, isn't that wonderful?

And you may not realize that for a minute or ten seconds or five seconds you have looked at that, and there was a deep sense of response, of oneness even with it, but no interpretation. And then you notice something strange. Whenever you look at something for the first time, if you are very alert you will notice that, when you glance at something for the first time, whatever it is, your head shifts, your vision, your field of vision shifts, it goes, shhhh, and it is, here there is a lot of nature around here, it may be a tree, a flower, the sky, or it may be something man-made, whatever it is, but nature particularly is helpful in this practice at first.

You notice the first moment of looking at something, there is always a space of no thought. It may be one second. It may be two seconds.

Now most human beings are not aware of that, and with some human beings the space of no thought is so brief that they can't capture it, because immediately thought comes in after half a second. But there was half a second. There is always a space before thought can come in, there is a looking, a seeing, and with you that space will now become larger, and in many of you it is already quite spacious.

In other words, the spaciousness around your sense perceptions. So notice that it is already there, but as you become aware of it, the spaciousness grows around your sense perceptions. So, and now comes, this is a magnificent thing, it's a great mystery that in past ages people had to spend 25 years in a monastery to be told this.

The master would say, OK, you work with me for 20 years, and then ask me again that question. But now things are speeding up, we haven't got that much time, in a good sense, on the planet. We are running out of time, and that's wonderful.

It's shrinking. So when you see something, there is a sense perception, can you be aware both of what arises in your sense perception, what you are looking at, or it may be listening, and can you be aware of the awareness, which is the stillness, in which that sense perception happens. And that stillness, that awareness is, one could say, the space around it.

So there is a spacious field, and there is a sense perception. And you are not interpreting what you see for a while, there is no need. There is a deep knowing, but there is no interpretation.

There is not conceptual knowing, not that you have lost your ability to have concepts, but when you need them, they will be there. Words, concepts, thoughts. But you are no longer compulsively trapped in concepts.

You are exiting, exiting a conceptualized reality. Oh, that is the awakening. You are stepping out of inhabiting a totally conceptualized universe, which is mental conditioning.

Everything is called something, interpreted, labeled, named, and so a great freedom arises of perceiving through the unconditioned consciousness. And this is, you are here to experience that, and to see that it is already, that movement is already happening in you, that freeing yourself from compulsive conceptualization is already happening. And it is happening when you look at a tree or a flower or another human being, and it enters your field of vision, and in that moment there is pure perception and no labeling it in any way.

Just a field of stillness. And it may be that it is only there for a few seconds, but see if you can capture that space, and that is not perhaps a very good way of saying it, because you cannot capture stillness. It is, see if you can be attentive, and see if you can notice that, and that noticing is vital, because as you notice the stillness in which your perception happens, the space or the stillness expands.

So as you perceive things, you are now inhabiting two dimensions. One is the dimension of form, which is all around you, continuously fluctuating, and they may be outer forms or they may be inner forms, as emotions, thoughts. And the other dimension is the dimension of the formless, consciousness, pure consciousness, pure awareness.

The other is the dimension of the object consciousness, things. So you inhabit the dimension of the manifested without being lost in it, because you also dwell in the unmanifested. You dwell in the realm of stillness.

And even if at first the spaces of stillness don't last for very long, it's good enough. Three seconds of looking at a flower with no thought is good enough. And as you become aware of, there's not only the flower, I'm naming it now, but the awareness is not the naming, you become aware of the flower, and you become aware of the field of awareness or the stillness.

And this looks like a dualistic thing, but it isn't. It only becomes dualistic when we speak about it. When I speak, when I speak about becoming aware of awareness, it looks like two things.

Aware of awareness. But that's only because we're using language, which has a subject and an object in a sentence. What is really happening is self-awareness.

You're becoming aware. Awareness is becoming aware of itself. So that is the dimension.

And it's hard to talk about that. And in a way, the author of the Tao Te Ching is right when he says at the beginning of this book of wisdom, the Tao Te Ching, if you can speak about it, that's not it. The words have to be seen as for what they are, just pointers.

So this is a beautiful practice here. Walk around wherever you are. Sit, stand, lie, walk.

Be aware of yourself as the aware presence, as the stillness in which everything is seen and heard. And so you become like a little child. It's not for nothing that Jesus said, you must become as little children if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven.

Now what he is pointing to, and he's not saying exactly that, it's always just an approximation. It does not mean you return to that state because there is only that quality that a little child has in whom the conceptual reality has not yet developed. And when that little child in whom the accumulation of words and concepts in the mind has not happened yet, that little child looks at the universe, and you sometimes can see it when you see a one-year-old, one and a half, before language takes possession of their minds, the way they look is thoughtless awareness.

And then they smile at you, there's the pure joy of being. And you can see that which shines through is magnificent. And then gradually the veil descends because the child is programmed to ask, the mind of the child is programmed to ask, Daddy, what's that?

And then Daddy says, that's a tree. And then the mind says, tree, tree. Next time the child sees a tree, that open, complete openness is no longer quite as open because then the child looks at the tree, and then the mind says, oh, tree!

And two years, three years later, the mind is already possessed with concepts. So when Jesus says that, it's pointing as little children, you walk around in that state of openness, of non-labeling, the state of original innocence, which replaces the dysfunction, the collective dysfunction of the human mind that we could call original sin. If we go beyond the habitual interpretations of sin, there's no doubt that there's a dysfunction in humanity.

Look at human history. That's why they talk of original sin. Sin means missing the target.

The original Greek word translated means missing the target. That's what sin means in the original. And in other words, you miss the point of your whole existence.

And if you miss the point of your whole existence, you suffer. And that eventually works too. It wakes you up eventually.

So it seems insignificant at first to the human mind to say you can look at something and notice whenever you first look at something that there's a moment of spacious presence before the mind comes in and calls it something. And if that can be sustained, not through effort, not through wanting, not through some kind of act of willpower, but if that can be sustained simply by noticing that space of aware presence when it arises. And then even as a human being comes into your field of vision, walks in through the door, appears in front of you, you look and there's a moment of non-labeling.

Let's say somebody you have never met before comes and you look and there's not a single thought in your head for perhaps five seconds. But if you notice that, that in the first moment there's a field of awareness in which the perception happens before the labeling comes in, you may find that it expands and you could still be in the state of just looking a minute later. And you can even talk.

And every time a sentence has come to an end, you re-enter the state of spacious awareness. A word has been uttered and you're back in space. And then your words have a different quality too because now they come out of that dimension.

They have an aliveness. They will touch the other human being. What you say has the essence of that freshness of being, not the old stuff that otherwise is your mind.

A minute later after meeting a person, you tell them the old story of me. So what do you do for a living? Well, blah, blah, blah.

You can talk about that also and then step back knowing that's not who you are. So who are you? You are the stillness.

That's where your true sense of I am comes from, of beingness. So this is the opportunity as you sit here to be in that state. You don't really need to think as you sit here.

I certainly don't think as I speak. The words are heard. As they come out of the mouth, I hear them.

As you do. So there's nobody teaching anybody. Do I know more than you?

No, of course not. Probably less than most of you. What I know is the realm of stillness.

And that's not anybody's personal achievement because everybody has that as their essence. So what I know is your essence. That's why it's nice to sit with me because otherwise why would anybody come?

What you enjoy most is to be with yourself. But in the true sense, not the mind-made self, the deepest self. Now ultimately you don't have to go anywhere.

This is just a temporary stage in the evolution of humanity where you have to travel somewhere to be with yourself. Now some of you have traveled to India and perhaps you already know you don't have to go to India. And so Omega is a little closer.

And the next stage is you don't have to go to Omega. Sorry. Oh.

You may go for the enjoyment. I sometimes enjoy listening to spiritual teachers who may be using different words. And yet the truth is there.

And it's a wonderful, deep joy in hearing it in a slightly different form. When you meet a human being and don't label them, or if that is not yet possible, at least not for more than a few seconds, and then compulsive labels come into your mind, what you can do, however, is to recognize the labels that come into your mind as just that, without believing in them completely. Because the mind is the compulsion to interpret everybody and everything.

It does that to other human beings. You form judgments. You meet them and you look at them.

And the more you're identified with your mind, the quicker you are in your judgments of the other human being. You know them exactly. It might even be true occasionally.

You may have seen something that's actually there, but what you have seen and thought that this person is is some conditioning in the other person, not who that person is. Or you have completely imposed your own condition, perception on that person. But you can recognize any thought you have about a human being as just a thought and a perspective and one of many possible thoughts and not the ultimate truth.

So you recognize the relativity of your thinking. The relativity of your thinking. There's one spiritual teaching that works entirely with that.

It's a particular... Byron Katie has this teaching that whatever thought comes into your head about another person, about yourself, or about your situation, you look at the thought and you ask yourself, Can I really know that this is so? Can I really know that this is true?

And if you really look at the thought and you say, I can't really know that this is true, this thought that I have about this person or this situation. So it's a stepping, a continuous letting go of identification with thought. And then gradually the thought, the compulsive thoughts arise less and less.

And as the compulsive thoughts arise less and less, more space is there. That's why we are here, for the arising of space, stillness. And in many of you, it's already happening as you sit there.

But there are some, I can see or sense, a few, not many, fields of restless energy here and there. Or others go... You may want to try feeling your hands as you sit here.

Because you are restless, because your entire attention is still lodged in the head, in the mind. And the mind must feel either restless or anxious or totally bored sitting here. So if you cannot get out of that, the body really is the...

If you can, simply begin by feeling the inner energy field in your hands and that there is, yes, there is an aliveness there. You can feel that there is a hand, not externally, but internally. If you closed your eyes and somebody asked you, is your left hand still there?

For a moment, you would have to internally, so to speak, look for it. And then you would say, you would feel something. Yeah.

And then the question is, how do you know that it's still there? Because it's not touching anything, you're not moving it. And then, of course, you will know, because I can feel it.

I can feel this energy. That's how I know that the left hand is still there. Not a memory, that it was there when I last looked.

And then your answer comes from the memory. Yeah, it's still there. I saw it a minute ago.

And again, these things to the mind seem insignificant, but they are of tremendous significance to begin to inhabit the body, which takes you out of inhabiting the mind exclusively. If you can feel your left hand or your right hand, you can also feel other parts of the body. You have to just start somewhere that becomes the entry point into the body.

I'm speaking particularly to those, to all of you, but to those who are either bored out of their minds. Well, if you were bored out of your mind, you would be okay. But those who are still bored in their minds or are feeling restless and are thereby missing the essence of this gathering, get into your body.

Get in there. Feel the legs, the feet, the hands, the arms. So if you can feel one hand, you can feel the other hand simultaneously.

You feel them both at the same time. The feeling of hand. Feet.

You can feel both feet also as you feel your hands. Subtle at first. Some people feel almost like a tingling sensation.

Some people feel a warmth. And then can you feel the trunk of your body, the belly? Sometimes to feel the belly, the belly is very helpful to be in there.

Taking one deep breath or two or three deep breaths and following the breath with your attention and feel the belly or the abdomen. It's a more polite word. Feel the abdomen rising as you breathe in, into the belly.

And for a moment, there's a cessation. The belly is full and then breathe out. So breathing a few times into the deep, take the belly breath, which means you have to follow.

It's not just a practice, an external practice. The essence here is that you follow the breath with your attention and then you move into the belly. So the attention leaves the head and moves into the body.

So you breathe into the belly. And there you could say, this is the center of the body, around here, solar plexus also, but belly is a beautiful center. And once you've breathed in a few times into the belly, you can actually feel the energy field of the belly here and you rest there.

And from there radiates out energy into the rest of the body. Hara, the center, as the Japanese call it. So here, and you may notice then, when you look at not only the images of the Chinese fat Buddha with a huge belly, who laughs all the time because he has no problems left, toothless old man with a huge belly, whatever you say to him, come with your problems, he will laugh at you.

But you may also notice that the Indian Buddhas and other Southeast Asian Buddhas, most of them have a very slight protrusion in the belly region. So there's the belly, there's a little bit of slide, because they rest here. Their center of gravity is not in the head, as it is with modern humans, Western especially, but the whole world has become Western.

So the center of gravity is not in the head. The center of gravity is in the center of your physically perceived body, but it goes beyond body. So you rest there.

And so to sense that field of aliveness is beautiful. It takes you out of the head. Your attention moves down here.

You unite with the all-pervasive intelligence that is beyond the mind that inhabits your body, that is only an expression of the one intelligence. It's the intelligence that lives in your body as the life energy that regulates thousands of complicated functions, complicated from the point of view of the human mind, that regulates, coordinates thousands of functions in the body simultaneously. Everything is just right.

If one thing was slightly maladjusted, the body would die immediately. You would collapse. Temperature, heart rate, lung circulation, innumerable things that you could spend the next 5,000 years analyzing how the human body works, and you still wouldn't get to the end of it.

And that's only the outer body. So there's an intelligence at work that is vast. So if you can feel your body, that is an entry point into that vastness.

And the deeper you go, if you do it for yourself, you can do it with your eyes closed at first so that you become familiar with inhabiting the body and realize as you go deeper that it's not really about the body. It's about sensing that vast spaciousness that is here. Vast spaciousness.

So you enter the spaciousness through the body. And then everything comes to life. Once your body comes to life, and then you look around and open your eyes without losing the inner sense of body, then you feel everything is more alive suddenly.

It participates in that because you are not deadening it anymore with mental abstractions, concepts, labels. It has always been alive. You couldn't see it anymore, couldn't feel it anymore, sense it anymore.

So I recommend that each one of you spend some time going into nature and being perhaps with... choose something like a tree or a flower or a patch of ground or a landscape, maybe the lake, the little lake we have here, whatever, or a rock with moss growing on the rock. There are some trails here, beautiful moss growing over ancient rocks.

And just be there. Be with it. And as you look, feel the energy field of the inner body at the same time.

That makes it much easier to look without mental interference, to have a space of stillness as you look. So you are present within and without, and you look from there. The inner body becomes a root, that which roots you in the present moment, anchors you in the present moment, and takes you out of mind.

And if then mind starts working again, anything, if you are doing anything creative in your life, becomes still first. Before the act of creation, there needs to be stillness. Nothing creative can come out of the accumulations of the mind.

The mind can be an instrument to give something form, but the inspiration, the creative impulse, comes from a deeper level. It comes from the stillness, the presence. So go into the body and feel that.

You don't need to think anymore. And then you look, and then at some point a thought comes, or a creative movement comes. It may be dance, whatever.

It may be a word that you speak, words that come out of your mouth, but they come out of the stillness. So getting in touch with that is a simple and beautiful way of entering the realm of no thought. And then thought can operate beautifully and is not going to create problems as it usually does, because most of your life problems are created by thought.

Life only has challenges. The only place where a challenge can come is in the now. Apart from a challenge that comes in the now, there is no problem except in the head.

The power to face challenges is always there in the now. But you cannot face problems because they have no reality. Always use as the criterion to tell you whether your problems are real, or ask, what's the problem at this moment?

What can I do about it now? Nothing. I'm lying in bed.

It's four in the morning. Then go into the body. Okay.

Ah, it feels good to be alive. And I thought I had problems. At nine o'clock in the morning when you enter the office, you open the door and there sits this man who you were thinking about all night, who is creating problems for you.

And his mouth opens. Words come out of his mouth. And you bring an alert, aware presence to it.

And you look and listen. And then words come out of your mouth. They won't be reactive anymore.

There will be a response, not an old reaction. And the words will be true. They will be just right for that moment.

And they're not rehearsed. Or no words come. You may look at him and walk out.

I've forgotten the list. I can't remember things. But those things, they come out of right presence.

You have to be present. Otherwise you cannot manufacture or try to bring about right words, right speech, right actions. Okay, I'm trying very hard here to say the right thing.

I'm trying hard to do the right thing. It's not working. You can't try to do the right thing because the right thing comes out of a particular state of consciousness.

Spontaneity, intuition, realization comes out of stillness. So in this shift, thinking loses its capacity to make you unhappy. Thoughts for a while still arise, but they're not that overpowering anymore.

You're not totally in them anymore. And then space arises. The ability to not think arises when there is nothing much to think about, when life would be far more joyful if we are not interpreting this moment.

And if you live in alignment with this moment, a lot of the time, you're better off not interpreting this moment. Let it be. It is.

And out of that state, necessary action comes. On doesn't. If it's not necessary, it doesn't.

So the evolutionary and revolutionary shift in human consciousness is to enter that dimension where compulsive thinking comes to an end. Compulsive thinking comes to an end to transcend thought and realize that you are more fully yourself and more intelligent when you are not thinking. And when thought then comes in, should it be needed, it will be more effective, more powerful, more creative.

So you are here to be able to learn to enter that realm of great power, the realm of pure awareness. And it's not just the words that are pointing to it here. As you said, it arises because that realm itself is here in the energy field of this gathering.

And it is very helpful, even if your mind is saying, OK, I'm not really getting this. Of course it's not really getting it. The mind cannot get the essence of it.

So the most helpful thing about this gathering is the energy field of stillness or presence that works, comes from within you, but is also here in this field. That's the essence. And that's what works most powerfully, that transforms you.

The words are additional helps, additional pointers, and also to keep you entertained while you sit there in the energy field. So practice, practice again is the wrong word because it implies some kind of effort almost, but it is effortless, but pure seeing, pure listening, become aware. Whenever you look at something, at first there is a space before thinking happens.

As you become aware of the space, you may find that it expands. What that means in relationship to other humans, we will look at, if you can relate to other human beings, what it does to human relationships. I suggest just for a little while you stay here when this body has moved away.

Just stay until you feel the impulse to get up. Just stay for a little while in this energy field, in the stillness, and see that the body on this chair here is not really needed. That's enough what's there.

Eckhart Tolle - how to touch the tiger

This is a perennial question. Always new though, because it's... Many people ask that question again and again from Joe, Joey, Joe.

Can you help me better defend myself against the pain bodies of people with whom I'm close, like my son and wife? When their pain bodies are activated for whatever reason, my pain body explodes forth. It is almost like they enjoy playing or feeding on one another.

What suggestions do you have for this situation? Well, very simple. You need to be there when it happens.

If you're not there when it happens, there's nothing you can do and I can't help you. Yeah, but how... Okay, I'm asking the next question now.

But how can I be there when it happens? I suggest that you bring presence into your everyday life in ordinary situations so that you grow in presence power, a way of speaking. You grow in presence power.

You are present when you look at a flower, you're present when you look at another human being, you're present while you drink your tea, you're present while you walk across the room rather than wanting to get to the door, you're present with every step. It's a beautiful practice. You're present while you're waiting for the elevator, you're present while you're in the elevator.

Feel the inner body, be there fully. You grow in presence power. Invite presence into your life when you're not being challenged because when you're being challenged and you haven't invited presence into your life in non-challenging times, you're not going to sustain presence when you're being challenged.

Unless perhaps it's a life and death challenge in which case it could still happen. But normal challenges. If you're not present in non-challenging situations, then how are you going to sustain presence when you're facing a pain body?

Either somebody else's or yours. Usually they go together. So when I say be there when it happens is what that means.

Be conscious of what is happening at that moment. Realize that it is the pain body. Be there as the awareness rather than as a reaction.

Be there when, if you should still react even then, can you be there as the awareness behind your reaction and sense, feel that, feel anger arising that wants to feed the other person's pain body. Can you feel it at the moment of it happening? Can you feel it when the other person's pain body, can you see how the other person's pain body is controlling his or her mind, speaking through his or her mind, saying all the right things that are designed to make you react so that you can feed their pain body.

Can you be aware as the presence there while this is happening? It's a beautiful practice. One of the great spiritual practices is awareness while the pain body is active, whether it's somebody else's or yours or both together.

If you're very aware in the presence of somebody else's pain body, your pain body won't arise, or you may just feel the beginnings of it. Now, awareness doesn't push anything down. Awareness is like light.

The light shines on it and the pain body comes up and then hits the light of consciousness from where you can sense it. And the pain body doesn't like to live in the light of consciousness. It withdraws quickly when it encounters the light of consciousness.

It's like certain animals, they like the darkness. If you shine a spotlight on a rat, it'll run away. It prefers the dark corner.

So if you shine the light of consciousness on the pain body, it can't survive in it for very long. It will withdraw again. So by that I mean you consciously sense it as an energy field in yourself or in the other person.

And you're there as presence. It doesn't mean that now you're going to immediately dissolve the other person's pain body. That may not happen, or it may happen.

In exceptional cases, it can happen. But don't expect it to happen. Don't expect this practice to dissolve somebody else's pain body.

At least you're not contributing to the growth of this other person's pain body. And then you'll see what happens. The pain body will make one attempt, and another attempt, and another attempt to draw you into a reaction.

At some point, the best response may be to walk away for a while and hope that the pain body will exhaust itself. Because when you walk away and the other person has nobody else, the other person's pain body has nobody else to get a reaction from. It will go into the person's mind and it will get then its food from negative thinking.

Pain bodies love negative thinking. It feeds on negative thinking. And then you come back after an hour, and it might have subsided.

The important thing is to make it into a spiritual practice. Be alert. You might, if you live, this questioner has son and wife, it seems to be, the pain body mainly comes through his son and his wife.

So here, you might even know that certain situations are likely to bring it up, so you can be already very alert. Or if the pain body comes regularly, every week or so, you can say, oh, a week has passed. It's very soon it'll happen again.

So you can be very alert. Like, you go, it'll want some kind of trigger. The slightest thing that you can say could be misinterpreted so that the pain body can use it.

So you have to be very alert and non-reactive and just be there as, again, be there as the aware presence. The slightest emotion, the pain body will try to get hold of that and then make it into some negative emotional feeling. This is a little bit like, let's say, you're encountering a wild and dangerous dog in the street or you're walking somewhere and you get this dog that comes towards you and you know, you can immediately know that the dog is dangerous and the dog is looking for some kind of emotion in you, fear, for example.

If you can be absolutely present, it is unlikely, although I'm not guaranteeing anything, it is unlikely that the dog will attack you because it is seeking some to link into some kind of fear, emotional fear presence or aggression or fear, and then it'll go in. If you can remain absolutely present, it may come close, and of course, it's a great challenge. No thought in your head is part of that.

Absolute, clear, totally clear mind. Krishnamurti has a story that it happened to him once with a tiger, and he said the tiger came so close to him, a wild tiger in India, that he touched the tiger for a moment, and of course, he was totally, his mind was totally clear. The slightest thought, and he might not have survived to tell the tale, he was absolutely present.

And then you can touch the tiger, although I'm not recommending that you try it out. I'm not recommending it. It's only an example of what happened to one person.

As they say in some films, these stunts are performed by professionals. Don't try them out.

Eckhart Tolle -Talk Titled The Deepest Truth in Human Existence

Kathé, Kathé Pará, Parásá Orishá Kathé, Kathé I would like to explore with you this afternoon the deepest truth of human existence.

[Speaker 1] (1:47 - 1:23:08)

When I say that, that may sound a little bit abstract. Interesting, but abstract, human existence. And it may sound a little bit philosophical.

But this is not a lecture on philosophy. Nor is it a lecture at all. The best way to look upon it is as a meditation.

Although somebody is speaking, look upon it as a meditation. So when I say the deepest truth of human existence, it sounds a little bit removed from your everyday concerns. So let's put it in another way.

We are here to explore the deepest truth of who you are. Because you are human existence. We are here to explore the deepest truth within yourself.

Knowing yourself at the deepest level. A level so deep that knowing yourself and knowing God become one and the same. There are two levels to this talk, if it can be called that.

One is the words and one is the gaps between the words. A certain stillness. I just point this out because it is helpful, as you listen, to be aware not only of the words, but of an underlying field of stillness.

Out of which the words come. Nothing personal. There's a field of stillness that is both within and without.

Gaps between the words. A silent space. In between and underlying the words.

And simply to be aware also of that dimension. Then listening to these words is more than absorbing information. Because there isn't that much information here.

It's not an information based talk. Then it becomes a meditation to just sit here and listen. And the deeper teaching, if it can even be called teaching, is not in and through the words.

The deeper teaching lies in the dimension of stillness. Because the moment you acknowledge that underlying dimension, you have accessed a realm within yourself that is deeper than the stream of mind. With which most people are identified as themselves.

Simply as we sit here to acknowledge, to notice, to listen to an underlying stillness. That which acknowledges that in you. That which is able to listen to that dimension.

Listen not to something. Listen to nothing. To nothing.

Just the act of listening. That in you which is able to acknowledge that dimension, to be attentive to that dimension, is a realm of stillness underneath the stream of mental noise. In other words, the moment you pay attention to that dimension of silence, there is a stillness in you.

Because through thought, you cannot pay attention to silence because thought is noise. So already, although through words we are going to progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence. Even as you sit here and follow the words that progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence.

That deepest truth of human existence is already emerging in you as you sit here and listen. Even now, simply by paying attention to silence through the inner stillness. That is the only way you can notice the stillness in you notices that.

And you have gone beyond the continuous stream of mental noise that for most people is who they think they are. So the answer to the initial question that I asked, I said, let's explore the deepest truth of human existence. The deepest truth of who you are.

The answer of that is never really in the future. Not even within the framework of this talk is the answer of who you are beyond the conditioned mind. Never is that answer in the future.

It's always now. So our question, what does that mean? The deepest truth of who you are.

Knowing yourself. Doesn't everybody know themselves already? And most people would say, yes, I know my name and all those things that are associated with my name.

Things that cling to that initial form identity that my parents have given me when they taught me what my name is. Such and such, whatever it may be. First, what's your name?

The little child is asked. And he's very proud to be able to say his or her name. And the parents say, very good.

That's the way human existence goes. And nobody realizes that already through the initial first label, mental label, first identification with a thought. A sequence of sounds.

The first limitation, illusory limitation on who you truly are beyond mental concepts. The first limitation has already arisen. You have already entered a prison of conceptualization.

It is the beginning of it. But we need to go that way. Humans have to move through that.

It would be futile to tell a child, you have no name. Don't identify yourself with a name. That the child has to go through the stage.

Every human being has to go through the stage where they begin to accumulate experiences, knowledge, labels, words, concepts, all kinds of things. Cultural conditioning, personal conditioning through their environment. And these things then cling around the name.

And after a few years, gradually, a sense of self develops. A me. Even in a small child, it begins to develop.

When the child says, my toy is bigger than yours. It feels good to the child to strengthen its sense of self through feeling, I have more than you. I know more than you.

Or my father is stronger than yours. You can add a bit more to that sense of self. And again, that is a normal process.

And so gradually, the accumulations continue. And you become an adult. And then you have a certain sense of self based on the conditioning of your mind.

That is the mind that never stops. That is the mind that is a continuous stream of thought processes. And the thought processes are strongly connected with the conditioning of your mind.

So the stream of thinking, and this doesn't depend on culture. It doesn't depend whether you live on India, in India or in the West. It is the same in every human being.

The stream of thinking goes on incessantly. And a lot of that is to do with me. And my concerns.

And my problems. And what is going to happen to me. There is a story of me, which is my past.

Things have happened to me. Things that I have accumulated. The content of my mind is a kind of story that people like to dwell on.

Talk to themselves about their story. Have a monologue or a dialogue in the head. And so a sense of self develops that is mind based.

And that again happens to everybody. A sense of self develops that is content based. Content and form based.

A psychological form of me. And for most people, that is who they are. So if you ask them, who are you?

They will tell you a little story. They could keep it brief. They could give you a brief summary of me.

Or they can make it very long. They can go on for hours. Because my story is so interesting and dramatic.

Have you got enough time to listen to it? Let me tell you what my story is. And what I have suffered.

What I have seen. What I have, my triumphs and my victories and my defeats. What people have done to me.

And all the bad things that I have done. I'll tell you about all of this. And so this is why psychoanalysts make a good living.

Because there you pay them to listen to you and to the story. And if you want to be thorough in psychoanalysis, you have to go three times a week for a few years. And so you tell your story.

And as you tell the story of me, more and more layers of complexity become revealed about me. And it's so interesting. And so after you have completed your course of psychoanalysis, if ever, then the psychoanalysts might tell you, we have come to the end.

By the way, that's very rare. You will tell you, we have come to the end of our analysis. We have analyzed everything about you.

And I will give you the file. It's big. Here it is.

You can take it home. This is you. And if then somebody asks you, do you know yourself?

You say, oh yes. It's all here. The content of my mind has been analyzed.

And here it is in this file. Or it might be a computer disk these days. And so I can tell you all about it.

And of course, when they say, I know myself, what they really mean is, I know a lot about myself. I know many things about myself. A lot of information.

Many facts. And they forget who the I is that knows. Because all that knowledge is knowledge about.

It's form knowledge. You know a lot about your psychological form identity. Not that there's anything wrong with it.

Each person moves within a form identity, has a form identity, which is not to be rejected, but to be honored. Part of your form identity is the function that you have in this world. The social function.

Your profession. Whatever you do. Your activity.

Your relationship to other people as a mother, as a father, as the boss. Many other things come into it. Your cultural background.

Your nationality. The nation that you feel you are part of is part of that conditioning. It is not to be discarded, but also to be honored.

You honor the forms that are the content of your mind. You identify with as me. The only thing is if you only know yourself as those forms, because every form identity consists of various roles that people play within that form.

And that usually is the limit of people's self-knowledge. Plus, if they've done psychoanalysis, they know about their childhood and all those things that happened then. So, is there more to who you are than the form identity, which has two levels.

We've been speaking about the psychological form of me, and of course then there is the physical form of the body. So, people identify with the two. There's my physical body, me, and there's a psychological story.

And that is the story of me. And that includes all the conditioning of the reactive patterns. All those things are in there.

The content of the mind is the psychological form of me. So, we have the two levels of identification. And sometimes the body can be a very strong identification in certain people.

It becomes part also of the psychological form identity. If, for example, your body is very beautiful or your body is very strong, that enhances your psychological form identity. It gives you a feeling that you are stronger, more beautiful than others.

And the sense of self becomes enhanced through that. And that can last for quite a while and it works quite well until you reach, the body begins to grow old. And then the beauty fades.

And if that was the main part of your form identity, great suffering starts. When the beauty fades that you thought that was me. So, the form identity, both physical and even more strongly psychological form, has certain characteristics.

And one of the characteristics of form identity is that it never feels complete. It never feels except for brief moments which turn out to be delusory. Never feels really at ease or at peace.

It never feels that you are freely and fully yourself. Yet. Yet is added by the mind because it's a little escape which says, okay, yes, there is this recurring almost permanently underlying sense of lack, of insufficiency and of incompleteness.

And many people who are not conscious enough don't feel it directly. It becomes translated into continuous wanting and needing this or that to fill that hole that they feel. To fill that sense of lack and insufficiency with something.

To make myself complete in this form identity. And so, there is an enormous need in human beings to add more to me, to make me complete. And that is the search, that is the enormous momentum behind human wanting and needing.

The Buddha speaks of desire and again, that's a little bit abstract. At his time, it was a powerful word perhaps. But desire really is wanting, needing.

And then, you look for things to add to the accumulated content of mental identifications to complete my sense of self. So, you look to and it's strange, it's a little bit like a little grasp at anything to add to me, whatever it can. And a very common one, of course, is material possessions that I identify with.

I have more than you. This enhances my sense of self. I identify with my house.

I identify with my car. In a very subtle way, I feel it's an extension of me. The car has become a mind object and that mind object is used to strengthen, to enhance a deficient sense of self.

And for a little while, it works. You feel bigger as you step into your BMW. You have expanded.

Your sense of self has grown. And you are more powerful than all those little puny little cars around you. And for a little while, that works.

You feel almost you have arrived. And then, before long, it wears off. And then you sit in that car and it's not that fulfilling anymore.

It's just a car. It gets you from A to B. Oh, that wasn't quite it.

And then you look to the next thing. And the next thing could be a relationship to complete me. Because the last one didn't work.

It didn't complete me. Something went wrong. So you go out and look for it there.

The ideal one I'm going to meet one day. I'm looking for the ideal partner that is going to complete my sense of self. And then it happens at times that you find him or her.

That means it's called falling in love. And it says, OK, I found you. You are going to complete me.

You are going to make me happy. Which you sometimes read in the lonely hearts columns looking for someone to make me happy. What they mean is to make my sense of self complete.

To fill that lack that I feel. And so you might get married and for a while the illusion is there, just that it was there with the BMW, that now I have arrived. This is when you fall in love.

You have this euphoria of completeness. Oh. Oh.

Finally the story of me has completed itself. I have arrived. I made it.

And then comes the honeymoon. And then comes ordinary existence. And all the things that arise in ordinary existence.

And sooner or later this ideal partner fails to live up to what she had promised when he signed the wedding document that is to complete you. To make you happy. It's not working anymore.

That feeling disappears. And then it becomes, oh, I made a dreadful mistake. It wasn't the right one.

He wasn't right. Or you begin to look elsewhere. But in the meantime, you've been looking every day for hundreds of little things to add to me.

To enhance your sense of self. All kinds of little things. Whatever.

One could make a list of hundreds of things. How that egoic self, mind made entity looks for little things to add to me. Experiences can add.

Anything. Drugs maybe to have an experience with that. Maybe food even.

Food. I can add that. It's a psychological need.

The body has a limited need for food. But the psychological me has a great need for food. Because even through that, it can make itself feel a little bit more complete.

A box of chocolate works for an hour or two. And you can see the impulse behind it when people reach into the bag of chips or the chocolate and there's no... There's more.

It's not the body really that wants. It's the mind made self that seeks some completion through that... And when the bag of chips is empty it looks for the next thing.

So in many little and big things, there is this enormous need to add to me. And everywhere to make myself complete. Because it's never...

That completeness never lasts. And so people believe that their sense of not having arrived, of not quite having made it yet, of not being truly and fully yourself, people believe that this is their personal problem. They believe that others exist who have made it.

Because you see the movies and you see the magazines that show you these glamorous, famous people who apparently and surely they must have made it. They look so happy in their glamorous surroundings. And the culture tells you that that is the way to go.

You can make it. Just try harder to have more possessions or more status. That's a big intangible but enormous thing to add to oneself.

Other people's view of me is an enormous piece, bigger even, can be bigger than the greatest mansion. That need for others to give me their approval, their high opinion. And so there's the need for status in society.

For others to tell me that I am great and good enough. And that's an enormous, these are enormous chunks of identification that you can add to the deficient sense of self. And for a little while, it also works.

And then if you've met any of the famous people that you see in the magazines and films, whatever they, sports, movies, famous this, famous that, people who are told by the surrounding culture and the world that they are special, that they have made it and they are great role symbols in society. And if you meet them, you will see that underneath the glamorous facade, there is the same sense of deficiency of it didn't complete them. The whole world telling them that they are great and deep down they feel this is a big lie.

Also there are famous people who have actually through that have seen through the delusion of that the meaninglessness of this world, which to a large extent is mad because it's the human egoic mind telling you that you are important. And some people striving a lifetime to add that to their sense of self to the world, please tell me that I matter. My sense of self depends on it, please tell me that I am important.

And then of course only a few are told that. The others are left in limbo and are unhappy there and those that are told they are important, they are unhappy there. Not complete.

And it happens occasionally that a few of those people who made it rich and famous they begin to go deeper because they have everything and they can't possibly think of any more to add to me because what can you add when you have everything, could buy anything go anywhere and everybody thinks you are God. And still feel and so some of those actually see through the delusion and then penetrate to deeper levels of their being. But for many of us there is always the hope that through this or that addition to me added content for the mind, the mental identification that through that I can complete myself and my life is going to work and finally feel that I have arrived I'm home

I'm fully myself and what people don't realise is it is not their personal problem the fact that they feel that they haven't arrived that they haven't made it it is built into the very structure of the mind made sense of self that deficiency and sense of lack is inseparable from those mind structures from that identity so it is nothing to do with what you could possibly add nothing that you add could fulfill you is the truth and that is for spiritual seekers this is a very subtle point because that mind set which is collectively conditioned nobody's personal problem that has an enormous need for more for more of whatever it may be more that mind set is quite deep seated it implies of course that you have an enormous need for future because you can, it's only through future and you're looking into future where you can get the future the mind made self tells you will enable you to get that and this is why very few human beings are actually where they are rooted in the presence of now they are reaching out in that drive for more they are reaching continuously, they are being pulled out of now, which is all there ever is, which is life itself, nothing else ever exists except now but they are pulled out of this into a mental projection in a psychological future where they are going to complete themselves because they will reach that more there that's the momentum and that's how most people live in that continuous, almost desperate search for being ultimately yourself, finding yourself through more through future finding myself through future everybody is doing it through looking where you can add more, where is the more I need more and then you become frustrated with the more gross levels of more and then you move up into the subtle levels of more where you seek to add perhaps spiritual experiences and a spiritual seeker needs to be very careful and look whether within him or herself the need for more still operates and then the spiritual search becomes a need to add more to me as spiritual knowledge, spiritual knowledge is valuable and beautiful as a pointer but it can become mental content that I identify with as me spiritual structures and spiritual knowledge is wonderful, this country is the cradle for that it has got the most beautiful and profound maps or signposts towards who you truly are to point you to that and if used rightly it works beautifully and powerfully but if used by a mind that is seeking more to add to me then the very scripture can become a hindrance because you accumulate maps and signposts they are beautiful and you carry great knowledge and in a very subtle way a spiritual ego could also come in it's very more subtle than the BMW ego, it's the ego coming back through the back door and there's a very subtle sense of I am now more than all those poor little worms who have not yet seen the light I have studied those things, I have studied with masters, I have been to monasteries or in the west it's workshops I have done all those and there's so much I have there's a very subtle sense of more but never enough because you feel well I haven't quite arrived yet but I am already more than all those all those mere more, it's a very subtle thing and you have to be very vigilant to see it in yourself that still that deep seated collective mental conditioning the need for more flows even into the spiritual search the spiritual seeking seeking to become fully myself and again there's a great psychological need for future because I seek to complete myself in future so that the same mindset can operate in that realm also so it's good to know that because once you know it and you know that the the sense of insufficiency or lack is intrinsically linked with that mindset, you can't get out of it no matter what you do no matter how much you add it's never enough, even spiritual knowledge, if it's only an adding of experiences or knowledge it's never quite enough yet but as the search goes on the great need for more of me until you see how it operates in yourself until you see that there's a continuous movement away from what is now until you see the need for this mind made sense of self and this is really lies at the root of that continuous conflict in the world collectively and personally the madness of human history why is that? why is human history so insane?

80% of it look at the 20th century incredible how can humans do this? there must be enormous dysfunction at the core of the human mind and this is it because a great need of this mind made sense of self is actually in order to continue to feel its sense of self it needs to create opposition with others situations and people because only by fighting against by having issues with can it continue to feel its mentally derived sense of self you need the sense of separation of me against you there's a need for conflict and problems built into the mind made sense of self it never says that openly it says I'm looking for peace joy and happiness but then what it says and does is the opposite in many cases so you can see the need for conflict in personal relationships in organizations, nations between nations and nations, religions and even within religions any human structure sooner or later they will be in conflict there's these relationships every few days most relationships you seem to be forced to act out that kind of conditioned script where you are in conflict with each other and problems the little self says the egoic self says I want to be free of problems but problems are part of its sense of identity it's looking for the next one and we all know people who you say who would they be without their problems it's easier to see it in others all that is the structure of the self that needs its enemies to continue to feel it's a very favorite way of enhancing your sense of self through enemies is to argue and feel the enormous momentum behind being right in an argument making the other person wrong, if you can make the other person wrong, you can strengthen your sense of self of course you don't know that you have really only strengthened the illusion but for a moment it feels good, not really but the ego says it feels good, the body knows that it doesn't feel good at all but the ego says I've shown him that I'm right and for the moment you've added that big rightness to the sense of self and it grows and then after a little while it wears off and then you need somebody else to make wrong and you might even be looking it's of course unconscious and then you start discussing a spiritual matter and you say, you don't know what you're talking about let me tell you or you say something and somebody doubts your point of view now what, well your point of view is a mental position a thought this is how it is, and somebody else says that's not how it is at all but you have a you have a mental sense of self you have identified with the thought, identified means your sense of self is in that thought it's a me your self is in the thought one could say, I sometimes use the expression you have reincarnated into the thought form for a moment reincarnated means your self is in it it's one with your sense of self so when somebody says no you're completely wrong it is it is an attack on your very life this is illusion because your identity is in the thought and so there's an enormous amount of emotional the defensiveness that comes or the aggression that comes when you defend your mental position in very unconscious people it can easily degenerate into violence and then violence in many cases, that is the root of violence making the other wrong even a nation, collectively the same mindset operates making the other nation wrong ok, let's prove that they are wrong we'll attack them and then we are right and the more enemies we have the more we feel our sense of self so it operates on a personal or collective level that delusion that through fighting and opposition you can strengthen the self the me and so it's always looking out it's not really, the egoic self isn't really looking for peace it says that it cannot show you openly that it's looking for trouble if it weren't human history would not be the way it is the world situation wouldn't be the way it is, the madness of it and I always say, if you doubt it read 20th century or any other century, but the 20th century is the most mad or watch TV tonight if you doubt the madness what is this? and so it is built in this need for enemies for problems and conflict, everybody carries that in here and is forced to act it out to strengthen the illusion of me and it always works for a little while so all these things operate the adding and the needing opposition needing an enemy those two work very strongly so you are always looking for the next thing and so what is human humankind to do if humankind is trapped in this collective conditioning of the mind are we ever going to find the sanity are we ever going to find who we are beyond that delusion and it's there is nothing wrong with a form identity but if your sense of self is completely in it it becomes dysfunctional form identity is an aspect of who you are the form aspect function, social function all those things I mentioned beautiful but if your self is in it if you derive your sense of self from that and have nothing deeper than that it's always a cause of problems and suffering it's beautiful being a mother but if you only know yourself as that role you will be clinging to that form if you don't know yourself beyond form there is always a dysfunction that comes in so how do you know yourself beyond form this is the question that's been asked forever since the spiritual search started because it is a spiritual question it is the ultimate spiritual question who am I am I more than this and of course you could add answers on the mind level by adding beliefs they are a little bit comforting how do I know that I am more how do I know that how do I step out of this continuous stream of thinking a lot of it is to do with self that's why it never stops it's so compulsive because I need to keep myself going it's almost constant but it's always overlooked and that is the mind made egoic self it's main enemy it has many it needs them it's main enemy that it continuously fights ignores opposes, resists is actually the present moment the now it never wants the now there is always an unease with the now there is always more sometimes more than unease because I am looking, I am on my way to the future that is going to fulfill me this is the now is a stepping stone it enables me to get to the mental projection of future where I am going to complete myself so please don't hold me up now I have no time for now I have something much more important on my mind and that is myself as this future projection where I am going to make it that could also be a spiritual thing it could be a spiritual mental image of a future stage to be achieved as a strong mental projection and you are just trying to get away from this because you need to get there full liberation attainment realization can have an enormous pull towards future and you don't realize you are trapped in the same mindset that the BMW person is trapped in it has become a pull towards future and trying to make it and so I have met many spiritual seekers who have become unhappy after 30 years of search, 40 years of search 50 years of search when am I going to arrive to really have you ever looked at now have you ever looked at the only thing that never leaves you the only thing that is ever real the only thing where anything can ever happen be said, thought experienced it's got to be now life is always this moment but the mind made ego itself is striving towards the next one for its completion it's looking for itself there it doesn't know that it is already here if you could only acknowledge fully and deeply this here and this now if you could go deeply into this now you would find that yourself beyond a mental story is already totally complete and only on the level of form could you add things and it's beautiful never to find yourself you can learn new things it's beautiful, explore new countries beautiful, more of this even have more possessions but you can't find yourself through that if you try to look for yourself through more even spiritual experiences they are nice too but if you are looking for yourself it never works so adding more is beautiful except you can't find yourself through more more works on the phenomenal level and when you realize that you give up you recognize first of all the egoic need to make the now into an enemy and to run away from it to make it into a means to an end, to resist it internally, to criticize it to project yourself away from it I'm not interested in this because this is a limitation on who I am who I want to be I'm on my way to the future everybody in the big cities of the world they are all almost out of breath and if you stopped anyone of them they would give you a reason why they are out of breath because I need to get there but the common denominator is they are all trying to get to the future and the whole life is spent like that and the spiritual aspirant metaphorically speaking, maybe he is not running around but there could be the same inner urge for future inside so the breathlessness would become a metaphor when am I going to be myself have you looked deeply into now the only thing that never leaves you all there ever is your entire life here in this space of now don't talk to me about now, I don't want this, this is a limitation, I don't want the place where I live this is not what I want I don't want to have these, the place where I live, the place where I work, all these are limitations of my life I want to limitless I want to find myself as that which is beyond limitation, that's why I'm trying to get away from them now but has it worked, how many years have we been trying to get away from it 55 60 and have you gotten away from the limitations of now, not yet but I have some more time left and you see the fallacy of that and then you suddenly, you pay a little bit more attention to now first you see the pull away from it and you notice that and then your attention moves into just this, now just this often is not sometimes it's beautiful but more often than not ok it's not that interesting I mean, why should I linger here and at other times, it's not only not interesting, it's actually this is not where I want to be this not, this now, because this now is a limitation on my life I'm trying to get out of this ok, but you can't so you look more deeply and then something opens up within you you pay attention to this moment and then comes the realization all you ever have is now and the form that appears in the now they believe that there are many different nows every day and every hour one moment after another moment but of course it is always the one eternal, timeless one moment only the form in which it appears changes continuously now the very form in which it appears this is the reason why many people don't want the now because it's not satisfying enough, it doesn't add enough to me it might even threaten my sense of self, the form that this moment takes, and in any case it's not fulfilling enough, it might even be a limitation on me, I want expansion, and here I am in this little prison cell in certain extreme cases, where the now is seen as very, very limiting, or your body your physical body may be ill can't move very well anymore so that becomes very, the now the form that this now takes can in some cases be extremely limiting and you are asking me a person might say to not to try and get away from it yes, because that didn't work, why not try something else why not try to live in alignment, inner alignment with the form that this now takes, in other words to embrace the now internally no matter in what form it comes to say yes to now which after all is life it is inseparable from now, life is always now, never not now and so you say yes to life by saying yes to this moment and whatever form this moment takes you say how can I argue with it it already is it is it is the isness of this moment of course I can change it, I can take action now, if I'm stuck in a I'm locked in a building I've lost the key this is the now of course then I can get up and shout out of the window and say can somebody please open the door but if nobody hears, maybe somebody will come, but at this moment this is this now now you can internally argue with it and resist it or you can say that is the isness of this moment, that is the suchness of now, the form it takes and you see the futility and even madness of arguing with is because whatever is, is already the case so you the shift in consciousness happens the moment you say yes to what is because the entire structure of the egoic mind made self lives on resistance and opposition and on making the now into an enemy it lives through that, that keeps it going so the beauty of this is we can step out of thousands of years of collective conditioning not through needing more time to step out of it and this message cannot yet be heard by everybody there are still many people on the planet before they are ready to listen to this they need more time but since you are sitting here I assume that something in you hears the message that to find yourself and we will look more deeply now what does it mean now to find yourself you don't need future for everything else it's helpful on the practical realm it works quite well now when you say yes to whatever form this moment takes what happens here comes the form that this now takes alright I welcome this because it is the form that this now takes usually something in you which is the egoic structures would have resisted it as limiting not enough not what completes me and through resisting this form in a situation, an event a person, a human being it can only appear in the field of now through resisting it any form that appears you strengthen your own form identity there is a contraction in your form identity when you resist a form that appears in the now there is a and that contraction is the strengthening of the illusory self and so it likes that it has a strong momentum because it survives in and through that resistance when you relinquish the resistance because you have seen through the futility and madness of living in that way and you embrace the now there is the form that the now takes and you bring a yes to that and suddenly what I say now is only a little metaphor or pointer there is a sense of space around what is happening in the now there is a larger spaciousness inner perhaps even outer a space around the form of now which could be a human being a situation something has gone wrong which happens a lot the mind would call it wrong because it's against what should be happening this shouldn't be happening now but here it is yeah but it should but here it is oh ok you become aligned with that isness and that is suddenly you oh there is a spaciousness around the form of now it happens within a field of yes, peace around it you can't it is not something that you can easily capture in words or thoughts because it is formless through that act of what ultimately we could call surrender entering the surrendered state of consciousness surrender to God that's a little bit abstract who knows what God wants how do I surrender to God surrender to whatever form this now takes because the totality has brought this about it is intrinsically linked with the totality of the cosmos everything is totally interconnected so the form that this now takes could not be otherwise the whole universe has brought this about as form and there is a little knee in the head that has an argument with it and strengthens itself through that argument that is suffering that is the cause of human suffering that is not knowing yourself beyond this little form so suddenly there is a depth of spaciousness that is there when you surrender to what is completely an uncompromising yes that is surrender to God and in that the egoic structures that live on resistance and on denial of now subside and there is a depth to your being suddenly and a peace that is there no matter what form this now takes because quite often as we pointed out it is a limitation it appears as a limitation on your life not on the head but it's here so the limitation now people sometimes spend a whole lifetime running away externally and internally from limitations and I'm not saying don't change a situation if change is possible but if you would find whatever situation you get into you encounter new limitations and you are going to find that yes you can improve your life situation but even if you improve it some other limitations will appear I gave the example in the talk yesterday an unemployed actress working as a waitress being in resistance to that or being in surrender to that seeming limitation through being in the surrendered state in my little story that I gave to explain that in the surrendered state she honored the now each customer in the restaurant instead of saying here I am I'm a brilliant actress and what has life given me a waitressing job and then the now you can't honor because the now is so limiting and unpleasant you would be fighting it internally continuously and every customer would make him or her feel that you don't like this now and you are part of it and then if she enters the state of alright this not a mental concept I might as well accept that I'm a waitress that is a further conceptualized sense of self strengthening that of course you are not a waitress it's a temporary function you are nothing permanently it's all a temporary function so don't derive an identity an unpleasant not enough identity from saying I'm a waitress this is what life has given me simply accept not that you are a waitress, it's a delusion accept this moment and there you are, there is a customer and you say can I help you you are honoring and saying yes to now with that comes in a totally different energy into the interaction and the customer senses that he or she is being honored you honor the now and any form that comes into the now that goes with it without saying if you honor the now whatever form this takes is honored and so and I gave a little humorous example that after serving many people in that way she meets a director who gives her a card and call me up, my name is Steven Spielberg and the shift came in three years later she is a famous actress, world famous and is her life now free of limitation, no she can't walk alone in the street anymore everybody wants something totally restricted her freedom of movement what does she do there to see that before long some form of limitation will recur in your life in the now and you surrender to that you can change the situation but knowing the limitless is not to be encountered in the world of form because form means limitation so you say yes to the now even if it is a form of limitation seemingly you surrender to that and suddenly around to the seeming limitation there is spaciousness at certain depths what really is arising here, although we need to be careful with words all forms thought forms physical forms are conditioned it's the conditioning conditioned consciousness consciousness appearing as a form consciousness appearing as a thought form consciousness appearing in many many forms but there is the appearance arises out of a vast realm of the unconditioned consciousness before it takes form and that is within every human being that dimension is there one could say underneath the conditioned which is all thought forms and emotional forms is the depths of the unconditioned which could be can be felt cannot be known as such as you know an object in consciousness people look for god or themselves believing that at some point in the future of course they are going to find god or themselves as an object in consciousness as a knowledge in a subject object relationship as if they could know it in the way that you can know a tree but you can't because the unconditioned is not an object it is the ground out of which all mind objects objects in consciousness arise into which they subside so you can never know yourself in the normal sense of the word but you can be that and that is felt one could say it is a realm of stillness underneath the mental noise and every word will reduce it, it is far more than that every word is no more than a little pointer a realm of aware presence that is beyond thought thought can happen come out of it but in itself it is consciousness one could say without thought unconditioned oh that is the deepest meaning of now because the strange thing about now is that it never leaves you and it doesn't change the field of now because it is the essence of now is the unconditioned consciousness the field in which all phenomena happen and this and now the beauty here is to know that one could say you know the now beyond the form it takes but you don't know it in a subject object relationship you know this field of now when you surrender to the form you know that which is beyond form surrender to the form the limitation and then there is that emerges that is beyond form and beyond limitation as yourself and this is goes against how everybody lives in this world they do not surrender to the limitation of this form, they think they want to get away from it surrender to the form of now takes you into the depths of the now itself which you then know as the essence of your being but not don't know anything about it, a direct unitive knowing as yourself I would go so far as to say that you are the now totally one with it it never leaves you you can't leave yourself the essence the unconditioned dimension of who you are and when you know that you can allow the conditioned and the form to be and it's beautiful the form as which you appear because you don't need it anymore to derive a sense of self from it then the forms are beautiful also you honor them really for the first time when you know yourself to be beyond the form you honor all the forms completely also so to surrender to the limitation the seeming limitation this is the essential truth the ultimate truth of all religions is the surrendered state of consciousness there is even one religion that's called surrender, Islam but it is the essence of all religion in Christianity that essence is contained in the image of the cross Jesus on the cross is all of humanity the cross is the ultimate symbol of extreme limitation couldn't be more limited than to be nailed to a cross it's a torture instrument so in a way for a while humans experience the world which is the world of form almost as a torture it's so heavy and then that can take up time until suddenly they can hear the message of surrender and then at that moment as symbolized by that image of Jesus surrender happens on the cross total surrender to extreme limitation and the seemingly unacceptable not my will but thy will be done thy will is the will of the one and then my and thy merge in the act of surrender there is no longer my that opposes thy, when my and thy merge there is total surrender, your will is one with the totality and at that moment the cross becomes a symbol for the divine the very limitation turns into the symbol for God or the divine so it's not by resisting or running away from but by that deep act of surrender that the divine is realized and that amazingly does not take time surrender can only be now it may take time to dwell in the surrendered state as your permanent state you fall back into resistance because the momentum of the collective conditioning is so strong and then you re-enter surrender but the moment of surrender is always now because you surrender to the now and in the now so it can only be now so that one decisive act or spiritual practice is the one that doesn't take time and that's the beauty of it it really means you don't need future to find yourself and you need to add nothing to you to find yourself nothing then you can play with the realm of phenomena and add things it's beautiful it's a play but you no longer need it for yourself that's the essence of spiritual realization all the teachings point to it that is to see that what grace to see that the very thing that looked so heavy which is the world of form the very thing that seemed to be limiting me on all sides that very thing is the doorway into the formless and into who I am beyond form and you see that ultimately they are one they are one form is emptiness emptiness is form

If any question comes into your mind right now, please realize that it is irrelevant. And please realize that it is an attempt of your mind to obstruct your practice of presence. Occasionally, I may say something just to point you back to it, because there is always a possibility that you may drift off into thinking.

It's also quite helpful, as you are aware of being conscious, to be aware at the same time that you are breathing, to feel the breaths going in and out, and at the same time, be the consciousness, the presence. Thoughts are not important right now, even if they pretend to be. Don't be concerned if an occasional ripple of thought floats around the surface of your consciousness.

Not a problem. So when you go into a meditation like this, it can become very deep, so that this consciousness left, pure consciousness, and then as you open your eyes again, listen, look around, begin to perceive externals again, it's still in the background. At this moment, you're aware of where you are.

You're aware of the room. You're aware that you're breathing. In addition to that, sense perceptions, perhaps some feelings, a few thoughts floating through your head, or maybe no thought, maybe just a clear sky inside you with just little puffy clouds here and there, little thoughts, and then disappear again.

So perhaps you're the clear sky, and the clear sky is the awareness. So the essence of our meditation is to be aware right now, whether or not your eyes are closed or open, it doesn't matter. Whether you are aware, that you are aware.

Whether you are conscious, that you are conscious. Can you sense your own consciousness? It's kind of subject and object merging within you, because usually when you're aware of something, the subject is aware of the object.

But when you're aware of awareness, the subject is no longer aware of an object because there's just awareness. You're aware that you are aware. Object and subject merge into one, self-awareness, presence.

That's the sky, the clear sky. Occasional thoughts may come, not a problem. And you can be aware with every cell of the body, an alertness that pervades the entire body.

It's not the body anymore. It's just the space. You are that presence.

There's nothing to know about it beyond that. You can't know it. You can only be it.

And as you no longer identify with the mind, the thoughts, the presence can shine through the mind, can even use your mind and inspire your mind. Another word we can use is stillness. That's the stillness within you, vibrantly alive stillness.

And of course, you don't necessarily need to sit still to be in stillness. You can move, as you know, and be in stillness. That's the beauty of it.

You can do things and be in stillness. Can interact with another human being, can even speak to them and be in stillness as I'm speaking to you now. But I'm in stillness.

The words are just floating around the stillness. And you can bring stillness to nature and nature will love you for it. And you can share stillness with a tree.

See if you can be as still as the tree. That's something. Or if the sky is clear at night, you look at the sky.

There are stars, but there's the vastness of space, which is also stillness. There's not a single sound in space. Only in science fiction movies, but there's no sound in outer space.

The deepest stillness. And even a flower, it's surrounded by stillness too. The flower exists in that still field.

So if you need a little bit of help to find the inner stillness, go to a tree, look at the sky, the night sky, or the sky at sunset as it gradually darkens. Very still and spacious. Or you can touch the earth.

It's also very still. So many things can teach you stillness and help you. And the quickest way to stillness in any situation, no matter where you are, whether on top of a mountain or Times Square or Piccadilly Circus, in the midst of traffic, is to welcome the present moment.

Just that little thing, no matter what form it takes, whatever arises in the present moment, you welcome it, or at least you allow it to be non-resistance. Immediately, you can sense in the background of your being that field of stillness or peace. So that simple thing, allowing this moment to be as it is, connects you with the transcendent in you.

Couldn't be any easier than that. All you have to do is remember that this is possible and then do it. It's a good thing to start and end this by looking around wherever you happen to be before you close your eyes.

So you just become comfortable wherever you are and look around very casual way. And you're beginning to step out of thought. You're just looking around.

Then you close your eyes. And what helps is to take a few breaths into the abdomen so that, because that can put you in touch easily with the entire energy field of the inner body. As you breathe in, the abdomen expands a little.

Then you hold it at the end of the in-breath for two or three seconds. Feel the energy expanding then throughout the body. And then you breathe out.

And in again. And you follow the breath with your attention. This is an ancient breath awareness practice.

You can't be thinking at the same time and follow the breath with your attention. That's why it's such a good practice. And you become aware of your body, the inner body, the aliveness.

When you feel that the awareness of the inner body, the aliveness of the inner body and the inner body become a single thing, a single whole thing. So you merge with the sense of aliveness and stillness. Instead of observing it, you feel that you are it.

It is awake. Remnants of visual image of the body, but it's not necessary anymore. You just focus on that sense of pervasive presence.

Not other than you, that is essentially you. That is the essence of who you are. That is the I before it becomes something.

The question, the answer is not to be found in thought or in words. The answer is this. The presence that you sense, you sense yourself as the presence.

That's the answer to who am I. For success is sense of enjoyment. Counter state is deep sense of beingness of I.

It cannot be improved upon. Nothing needs to be added to it. It doesn't get any better than this to use a common expression.

This moment, being conscious of being, listening to event on the surface of things as with the source of all life from which the consciousness emanates, the consciousness that you are. That's the very, that realization is the very fulfillment of your life in this moment. What is there to add to it?

Plead. There's no, there's still nothing that you need to become. There's nothing missing.

Everything's missing on the human level, the human dimension, but not on the being level. There's nothing missing. Anything.

That's the fullness of life that Jesus talked about or the emptiness that Buddha talks about. Spaciousness is a better word for it. Then as you open your eyes to feel the stillness or the spaciousness within, as you look around the room, and that is how you realize the possibility of being present within and without.

In a moment of spaciousness, no thinking is required in this moment. Wouldn't add anything to it. Be aware of yourself and what's around you.

The consciousness that you are makes this possible. You cannot yet in your daily life step from thinking into awareness, freedom from thinking for a moment. Then you just use one of the portals in our body, breath awareness, attention to sensory perception.

For a while, you can just step out of thinking when it's not needed or reduce thinking to just a trickle and presence arises when you sense it with your entire energy field. This power grows in you. The power itself doesn't grow, but its manifestation in you grows.

Presence, power grows in you. At first, it seems nothing remarkable. As you notice, it frees you from a lot of turmoil, mind generated and it deepens you because it is the deeper mind, the deep eye that emerges, the deep self, the deeper mind.

Don't wait for emergency situations to become present. Don't wait for life to knock you, give you a jolt, a shock. Choose it in ordinary moments.

Then it grows in you. Life does something to you to intensify the presence instead of taking you out of presence into reactivity. You respond, but don't react.

Reaction is on the conditioned mind. Responding is out of presence. So when you realize that what's important is already here and not in the next moment, what really matters, that means you already have shifted to a different state of consciousness.

Very simple, just that realization, but it's so deeply ingrained, the illusion, the belief, the unconscious assumption, the next moment matters more than this one. The body inherits that mind pattern and that makes life very frustrating. You all know that.

Life consists only ever of this moment. So we are here to go deeper into this moment and not wait for something more significant. So we become comfortable with being here now.

Get rid of the illusion that there is something important missing. There's something not quite right that hasn't arrived yet, something deep-seated illusion. There's something not right.

Earthly things believes that something's going to be right when this or that happens or I attain this or that. And the spiritual seeker believes it's going to be right when I become enlightened. In both cases, it's future.

Seriously overlooking something vital that is very easy to overlook because thought is so seductive and hypnotic, light, visual, presence that is essentially who you are and has nothing to do with your past or future. This moment, here, this, and almost, let's say, to ignore the truth of it, that means that's it. Just a sense of goodness and rightness of being here, that means that dimension that has no form is already the next step, one could say, in the evolution of human consciousness is stepping out of self-talk, which is the conditioned mind, and realizing there is much more to who I am than this conditioned content of my mind.

And that is the beginning of awakening. It's not those words, not that you need to believe that there is much more to who I am than the self-talk in my head, because that is still self-talk in the head. I believe there's more to who I am, and you better believe it, too.

And suddenly you go, ah, and your attention is suddenly in the present moment. The self-talk is never in the present moment. And suddenly your attention is in the present moment, and you go, hmm, and the whole person right now is not there anymore when you go.

You're not a person at that moment anymore. You are an aware presence. So that shift in consciousness can happen very easily, whether it stays with you for a few seconds or a few minutes or an hour or a day or longer.

It doesn't matter that much. The important thing is that it arises. It arises, and suddenly the unhappy self-talk entity is disappearing, and what has taken its place?

Just a sense of presence. And that sense of presence is first of all aware of sense perceptions. So you look more consciously, you listen more consciously, because there's so much to look at and so much to listen to.

And it's not only looking and listening, it's also feeling the breeze on your skin, the air. Do you feel the warmth of the air? And there might be a scent in the air, and you become conscious of that.

But feeling the air, the movement of air on your skin requires a considerable degree of awareness. A person who is immersed in the self-talk in the head, they cannot feel the breeze touching their skin. They can't feel that, it's a very subtle thing.

And to feel subtle things, you need to have that aware presence, that alert, aware presence. You cannot be immersed in the self-talk to really honor and appreciate deeply the present moment, which is life. We could say honor, appreciate deeply life, because present moment and life are synonymous.

There is no life away from the present moment. If you cannot appreciate the present moment means you are away from life. Instead of life, you have a substitute in your head, just abstractions in the form of thoughts.

So to notice the breeze on your skin, you need to be quite alert and basically still inside, and then you can go. We feel a certain aliveness pervading the body. It's very simple, but some attention has to go there.

Otherwise you can't feel anything, which means you have to take some attention away from the thinking. If you're fully in thought, you can't feel your body at all. You don't feel alive anymore, just abstractions.

So the beautiful thing is, it's not only that your body loves being acknowledged and getting your attention. It's a very healing thing to do. And most importantly, it slows down your thinking considerably if it doesn't stop it completely, because if you have your attention here, you can't have it there.

And this would be the embodied state. It's quite nice. What you're feeling is not ultimately the physical body.

It's already halfway beyond the physical body. Qi, life energy. And I call that halfway between form and formlessness.

It's a bridge. Qi is a bridge between the formless dimension and form. So it's wonderful to sense that.

You can do it anywhere when there's enough room. You don't need to focus on externals 100%. Have some attention in the body.

Boredom disappears, for example, when you have attention in the body, you're not bored. You actually enjoy feeling alive and that it can serve as an anchor for staying present. And that can be one way of looking around at the world without unnecessary mental labeling.

There's clarity of perception and looking at the situations that arise in that clarity of perception. And from that clarity of perception, you know what you need to do or what needs doing in that situation. It's a higher intelligence that you contact via the body, a higher intelligence than the quiet knowledge of the human mind.

And then you know what to do. So you have an insight or a spontaneous doing or if there's nothing to do, being is enough. You can enjoy just being.

Sleepless nights are a wonderful opportunity for going into the body. Oh, I can't sleep. Why don't you do something useful, go into the body?

And then you lie there and feel the aliveness. And before you know it, you've gone to sleep perhaps. And then you wake up in the morning.

Perhaps you still feel a lingering sensation there in the body. And if you don't, as you wake up, put your attention into the body first before you start thinking about the day or just a couple of minutes, three minutes, two minutes. It's a good start of the day.

To feel alive can't be a bad start of the day. I'll tell you what a bad start of the day is is listening to the news. It's a grounding, but not a heavy grounding.

It's rooted in being. Am I spacious to even ask the question can immediately bring about that opening of a moment of cessation of thinking. Because to check within, your attention goes, am I spacious?

Well, it's almost inevitable that after asking the question, you are spacious. Because after the question mark, there is an inquiry, non-conceptual, there is a looking, there is a field of attention that arises and you go, am I spacious? Yes.

Now probably before you asked the question, you were not. So you remembered to ask the question because something was going on. You were upset about this or that or stressed or anxious.

Or many of the so-called normal states. And so then suddenly you are spacious. It's so easy, a little space opens up.

And then you remember no matter how important the things of the world or your world pretend to be, nothing is more important than being spacious. Another version of this question refers to relationships, whether it's an intimate relationship or whether it is just a short or superficial relating. Is there space in this relationship?

Is there space in the relationship between yourself and your partner or family member or whoever it may be, a friend? So again, all related. Without the space, it gets taken over by stuff.

Without the space, your life gets taken over by stuff. Welcome to our meditation. We start with the surface of now, which is whatever we perceive at this moment.

Whatever you perceive, whatever I perceive, really it's the I. So you perceive this person talking. You hear the voice.

There's the totality of the room. There's the ever-present noises. The ceiling and the walls, all part of the totality of your visual perception.

So there's a totality of sensory perception. That's the, I actually call it the surface of the now, or you can call it the outside of now. And then you're also aware of yourself breathing and you may be aware of the energy inside the body.

So we are gradually moving from the outside to the inside. And if you allow the outside to be as it is, although there's nothing special here in this room, it is quite nice. It has its own beauty.

Sounds are quite nice if you allow them. Imagine it's the OM sound. And now comes the really important part.

You're aware of yourself as the perceiver of all these things. You're not aware of yourself right now, but you're aware of the personal self, because at this moment, let's use this word, I hope that you are not thinking about your personal history right now or the problems you've had in the future, in the past or might have in the future. So when I say you're aware of yourself, it's not you're aware of yourself in the usual way, because when you usually say you're aware of yourself, you're aware of the story of yourself, you and your life, you and your position in the world, you and other people and so on.

No, more simple now in our meditation, you're aware of yourself not as a person with a history, but a deeper level of self. And I begin by calling it the perceiver of whatever it is that arises in your perception, auditory, visual, feeling, sensing. So, but who is it that is perceiving this?

Not the person, because the person is a story. The story is not perceiving this. So for a moment, let's not call it anything, but be aware of the simple fact that you are perceiving this, but you don't know what that is, that I that is perceiving, but there's no doubt that that is there.

And even if what you're perceiving is a dream, perhaps it is, it certainly has a lot in common with a dream because a dream evaporates very quickly, it doesn't last. Many philosophers have discussed whether human existence is a dream. We don't need to go there.

We can say it might be, but even if it is, it's all not real, as some people say. There is something in which the dream appears. The dream is being experienced.

One could say there's a light in which the forms appear and you are that. And there's no doubt that if it's a dream, it's happening. If it's all unreal, at least that unreality is happening in that light of awareness, because without that awareness, there would be no sense perception.

There would be no room. There would be no voice or somebody listening to the voice. So that's the one thing that cannot be doubted.

Everything else you can doubt whether it's actually real. And that awareness is formless. It doesn't have a history because your entire history appears in it when you remember it in that awareness.

And when things happened that once happened, they happened in the present moment, in the light of awareness. And you can only remember it as the awareness now. So I'm now asking you, although you continue to be aware of sense perceptions, to simply acknowledge the fact that you are aware.

And even that is not perhaps putting it rightly to acknowledge the fact that there is awareness. In other words, you are aware that you are aware. You are conscious of being conscious.

It sounds a little strange, but it's an amazing thing. It also sounds, if there were a duality here, I am conscious of being conscious. The subject, I, but that only appears in language.

In fact, when you are conscious of being conscious, and that's a, it's a, it's a strange thing. Just, and you can't, you can't say much about it. It just has no form and no shape.

It's totally elusive and yet all pervasive. Can you feel the fact that you are conscious, or rather that you are consciousness? And that's an, to, to sense yourself as that and still be able to perceive all this.

And you have long since left compulsive labeling behind when you are aware of yourself as consciousness and then perceive as consciousness, labeling things mentally doesn't come in anymore. There's just consciousness and forms arising and subsiding in consciousness. Arising, some forms stay for a while.

This room stays as long as you sit here. This room arises in consciousness and then you leave and it subsides. But the voice, the words arise in consciousness and subside.

Arise, subside. We could call consciousness the, the eternal gap behind everything, the gap in between everything, the space behind everything, whatever you want to call it. These are just pointers.

And there is a, an intense frequency that arises in you when you become aware of consciousness. It makes the personal self fade out. It burns up the karmic accumulations in you.

Old stuff from the past, pain body, old mind patterns. And your entire being is vibrating at a higher frequency. That's the only way I can put it.

The words may not be absolutely right, but that's how I sense it in you. And that is inherently joyful and energizing to sense this essence in yourself. We are learning here not to have it as a very short-lived glimpse, but to be able to stay there.

And every moment you stay in that, the old gets burned up in you and you connect with intelligence, not the IQ intelligence that you measure in IQ tests. That's a very limited form of intelligence, creative intelligence I talk about. This does not mean that you or I this moment will come up with the solution to the problem that Einstein couldn't solve, the unified field theory or whatever it was.

Nor does it mean that suddenly I can paint a masterpiece or compose an exquisite piece of music because these are not vehicles that have been prepared in this body, by this body. But this intelligence can flow into something. If there is a vehicle in your life, it can flow into that, transform it, and make it absolutely creative.

And even that is no more than a bonus. For some people, it may be enough to walk around the planet for the rest of their life in this form as peaceful, intensely alive beings that are astonished at the beauty of all things and bring that vibration of peace that comes with the awareness of pure consciousness. Whoever they meet, it's a little whiff of that.

And for some humans, that's enough and they fulfill their purpose here. Others may create some more elaborate forms, but empowered by not the ego, but by the greater intelligence it creates, it can flow into the human mind and body and create through the human form. Let's come back to the simple secret.

Be conscious that you are conscious. Feel the awareness as your essence. And you will notice it's very still.

The awareness is still. I compare it sometimes to space. I call it inner space or space consciousness.

It has no extension. It is vast, but not like the outer space that you see. You don't see it, but that is there when you look at the sky at night.

The vastness of space is only a reflection in the external of who you are in the essence of your being. And that's the awe-inspiring thing when you look at the starry sky at night, the absolutely awe-inspiring thing that if you are really looking will really shut up your mind immediately because it's so astonishing. That was my first meditation when I was in my teens.

I had no idea it was meditation. Lying on the deck of our, we lived on the top floor. There was a little terrace.

It was in the south of Spain where there were beautiful skies at night, totally clear. There was no thought. I had no idea that was going on then.

I just, it was deeply enjoyable. The awe-inspiring thing is not the countless, countless suns that you see, which are stars, but the vastness of it, the nothingness that makes it all possible. The vastness of space, unimaginable infinity, and there too that can put you in touch with the vastness within you.

Just looking at that. And space, again, is very similar. The outer space is very similar to inner space because both of them don't really exist because as I mentioned earlier, existence means to stand out, but space is, you can't say, oh, here's space.

All you can ever be aware of is things in space. And again, in yourself, you can't say, here is the essence of who I am. You cannot be aware of it as an object.

All objects are things, forms that arise in the space. Why can't you be aware of space? Because you are it.

You cannot separate from it and look at it as an object. It is the formless I, the I am that I am. The most profound statement in the entire Bible, which is, of course, a mixed bag of all kinds of writings, but there are some deep insights.

You know how to find them. When God is asked, what's your name? God says, I am that I am.

That's my name, it's the I am. That's immediately there's space in you when you become conscious of being conscious. That is space.

In any situation you find yourself in, a quick access to inner space, spaciousness, essence, is to become conscious that you are conscious. That's presence. Then, yes, you are still a person.

You can function as a person, but you are not trapped in the person. That's the hybrid I talked about. You function as the person.

We are not trapped in the person. And now for a little while, we just see if we can stay there in that consciousness of consciousness. It can be a helpful thing to be in unusual surroundings because it's easier to be more present in unusual surroundings.

That's the advantage of traveling. And that's why, as I've written somewhere, many people feel more alive when they travel. And when they are at home, their surroundings are so familiar that they lose presence completely.

They don't see things anymore. They go from where they live to their office or wherever it is, gone, done it so many times, they don't see it anymore. And you would be surprised even at home, your usual surroundings.

You might have a painting on your walls and haven't looked at it in the past three years. Might be very beautiful. Or your garden or the plants in there.

So this is the familiarity can lead to a kind of semi-sleep-like state. And when you're traveling, you go, oh. And the good thing is you might not even have a name for all the new things you see.

At home, you know what everything is called. But here you see things, you might see a weird animal. The mind stops because you can't name it.

And that's a wonderful thing. Or you see trees that you haven't seen before and you go, oh. Or you might say to your friend, look at that.

And you might notice in the moment of looking at that, you're not naming it in your mind because you don't know what it's called. So there's a moment, a few seconds of just being present. Be the presence rather than the naming person.

So it helps to be wide awake to your sense perceptions because that is one way of coming into the present moment. Which is why we are here, because there is more to the present moment than we realize most of the time. There's more to it.

It's the access point to the deeper dimension within yourself. So as a general theme, underlying theme, I recommend, surprisingly, that you practice being in the present moment. Although you've been taken out of your usual surroundings, you have carried with you something else.

And of course, that's your mind that travels with you wherever you go. That is perhaps the meaning of the book that somebody wrote. I believe the title is, wherever you go, there you are.

So wherever you go, you carry your mind and the conditioning of your mind with you. So that is the challenge here, to transcend the conditioning of your mind. The habitual way of interpreting the habitual way of reacting to things, habitual mind patterns.

If a mind pattern in you is that you frequently and very quickly become discontent with where you are, if that's a pattern in you, then that pattern will arise here also. If your mind pattern is one that loves complaining and finding fault with things, then it's very likely that very quickly this mind pattern will appear here also. So you get surprising things, things that your expectations are not met in various ways.

And that is a challenge to the mind, to the conditioned mind, because the conditioned mind wants its expectations met. And if they're not met, it gets uneasy, restless, irritated, angry, starts talking about what's wrong, either silently in your mind or to others. And if others can agree with you, then it's even better.

Or you can go on the internet and then you can get 1000 people agreeing with you. I'm not saying if there's something really wrong, you shouldn't do something to rectify it. So if something is leaking in your room, you say, no, I'm not going to say anything because I'm not supposed to complain.

No, of course. Say there's something there that needs to be rectified. That's not a complaint, it's just information.

Complaint means there is an emotion behind it. And the emotion says, this should not be happening. Then it becomes a complaint or it's your fault.

Then it becomes a complaint. If it's simply presenting information, it's not a complaint. It's just a fact.

And then the question is, can anything be done about it? If yes, good. What they say, there's nothing we can do.

Do you go on insisting that this is very bad and create suffering for yourself? Or do you simply accept this is what is? So it's bringing your inner self into alignment with the present moment.

A very powerful spiritual practice. Why is it so powerful? Especially when the situation is challenging and you still say it and you mean it.

Because everything that sustains the person, the exclusively personal sense of self, in that act of complete surrender to what is, the personal sense of self gives way to a deeper transcendent sense of self, which the Buddhists call no self. A deeper consciousness suddenly shines through. So really, it's a kind of denying your form identity.

Doesn't mean you don't have it anymore, but you are no longer trapped exclusively in your form identity. The form identity is strengthened and the more you can be in opposition to what is, the stronger your form identity, me, the person, the me. The more you are in opposition to what is, the stronger the me becomes, your form identity.

And if you can have enemies, lots of enemies, it loves that gets even stronger. They're all against me or us, if it's a collective ego. Collective ego loves its enemies, can't actually survive without them.

Every collective even needs the others. We're not us, this is us and that's the others. So that's the wonderful thing that the person, the exclusively personal sense of self becomes weakened, subsides, and something else emerges when you're no longer habitually oppose what is, something emerges that is deeper than the personal sense of self.

The transcendent dimension, presence, whatever we want to call it. Some people call it your higher self, or you could call it your deeper self. Words, doesn't matter.

But something emerges that is from beyond the person. And that is a place of great power and aliveness and possibility. That is where you are connected with a vastness and with everybody else too.

So it's when you feel, when that transcendent dimension arises, you feel a greater sense of connectedness, no longer the separation with, not only with nature, but also with other humans. You no longer feel the otherness of the other. It's just yourself in another disguise that's really becomes your experience.

Whoever you meet is yourself in another disguise. Isn't that a wonderful way of being with other humans that essentially you can sense not only your connectedness, but you can also sense your inherent oneness with others. So that is why this presence practice, honoring the present moment, welcoming the is-ness.

That's why that's such a powerful practice. And for many, the beginning of spiritual awakening is to realize that there is this stream of continuous commentary in their minds. And that is the thing.

Oh, that's interesting. That's a thought, of course. But before the thought, that's interesting.

There's the recognition. It's the voice in the head. And the recognition is not the voice in the head, although you might say it after the recognition.

But in the moment of recognizing there's a voice in the head, that's not a thought. The recognition of thought is not a thought. The recognition of thought comes through awareness or presence.

And awareness or presence is the higher consciousness, the arising new consciousness. Wow. So that's, that is really the meaning of spiritual awakening.

By the way, in this first half of our gathering, I will be talking more about it. In the second half, we will do more experiential. But even while I talk about it here, I would hope that if it works for you, there's already also an experiential realization of what it is I'm talking about.

So there's the voice. There's a voice in the head. And people say things like, I think.

They don't think. Because thinking is not a voluntary action for them. So it's a delusion to even say, I think.

You don't think. You are being thought by thought. You are created by thought.

There's that energy field. It's amazing. So the master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup?

Now that's a huge demand. If I'm full of clutter, mental clutter, how am I going to empty my cup? I would be immediately enlightened if I could empty my cup.

But the teaching points to something. It points to, there's the word empty. And that's interesting.

That is an important word in Buddhism. And I don't think it's a good translation. Who first came up with it?

I don't know. In the 19th century, the Europeans started to translate ancient texts from Sanskrit. And one person came up with a translation, probably of the Sanskrit terms, sunyata, and translated it as emptiness.

That doesn't sound so nice. It sounds like something missing or something like that. So I have an alternative translation for the Buddhist term emptiness.

So that empty is an important word. So remember, the Zen master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup? Emptiness, my alternative translation for that is spaciousness.

Spaciousness is a dimension of consciousness in you. And that is what we could call the spiritual dimension of consciousness, the deeper or the higher consciousness, just words, doesn't matter. And that is, in every human, it's there.

Many don't know that it's there because the clutter is so dense that they have no realization of the underlying spaciousness. And that is why I say in millions of humans, that is still a dormant faculty, so to speak. So the most important realization in your life, much more important than what you have achieved on the level of the world, whether your life in worldly terms is regarded as a huge success or additional failure, or for most of you, probably something in between, that's normal.

Sometimes you fail, sometimes you succeed, and then you move from gaining, losing, high, low, up and down. That's the identity for most. So the clutter of your mind is there, but there are moments in your life when you become aware of something spacious underneath it, but you may not call it like, call it that, you may not call it anything.

It may arise, for example, in many humans who may never have heard of anything spiritual. They're still, they're out there. They don't know that the little bit of that is in them, but they don't know it.

Little glances come occasionally into their lives of that dimension. It's not enough to actually say that the spiritual dimension has awakened in them, but little flashes come up now and then into their lives, and that is enough. Those little flashes from that dimension come into their lives, and that is enough to keep many people sane.

And those flashes can come when they're, you might think when you go out into nature and you see something extraordinarily beautiful like a sunset, for a moment you go, ah, all the vastness of the ocean or the sky or the elements, the wind, the storm, and for a moment you go, ah, and it's a moment of intense aliveness as you feel. And then you may remember that moment a little later and say, that was such a beautiful moment. Why was it?

Yes, maybe what you perceived was beautiful, but you felt something in that moment. You felt a heightened sense of aliveness and a deep peace and connectedness with being, so to speak. Why?

Because that moment of sense perception of something vast or beautiful freed you for a moment from the incessant stream of thinking. So the incessant stream of thinking, let's say you see this vast, this incredible sunset or whatever, and for a moment you give it your complete attention, and for a moment you're not thinking about yourself, your problems, your problematic life history, or your even more problematic future, and actually you're not thinking about anything. For a moment the stream of thinking subsides and it goes, and that is without knowing it, you have a little flash that's come up from that dimension, and then the next moment it may come up a few days later again when you look into the eyes of a baby, one year old, maybe just in the street or in a cafe, and the baby looks at you, and the baby is one year old, and the eyes are like babies, and you know instinctively that the baby is not thinking about you, because thinking hasn't started yet.

The words have not accumulated yet, the thoughts haven't started yet, and yet there's a consciousness there. You can see very clearly there's an intense consciousness that's looking through those eyes at you without judging you in any way, and in that moment for just a few seconds you feel so good. Why do you feel so good?

Because at that moment the baby liberated you from your stream of thinking, and again a little bit of spaciousness opened up inside you, and so for those few seconds when you look into the eyes of the baby, you were not thinking, and the baby wasn't thinking, so through the baby you are able to be in that dimension, and it felt so good. Spontaneously they can arise. They're not recognized by people as ultimately spiritual, but they are, and so many people, there are millions of people who experience those things briefly, but that's enough to give you a sense still of life is worth living, and then there are others who are so burdened by their minds they cannot even communicate with a baby.

They cannot even perceive the beauty of nature anymore because their mind is so noisy that they never, there's a total veil, so they don't look at the baby like, they look at the baby, oh that's a nice baby, they don't really see the baby, immediately it's labeled.

Eckhart Tolle Old Recording Source Of All Trust

We're not waiting for the session to start. One way to define what we mean by presence, which is a state of consciousness, is to say that you're not waiting for the next thing. And it's so normal to always wait for the next thing.

That's why many people are very rarely really present in the now. It's so habitual and normal to wait for the next thing that they don't know they're doing it. They're always waiting for the next thing.

And as soon as they go into the now, they go to sleep. But to stay awake in the now, without needing to fill it up with anything, or waiting for the next thing, because waiting for the next thing is filling up the now with stuff, which is thoughts. The next thing is a thought.

The next thing never comes, as you know. It's only always this, whatever is here now. The next thing doesn't come ever, not as the next thing.

And then to get to feel your way into the presence of now, to feel what does it to become aware of the now itself, which is a very strange thing. How do you do that? What do you mean, become aware of the now itself?

Usually people think when they're present, they are aware of what's going on. That is true. You're aware of whatever you perceive in the present moment, or whatever is happening internally in the present moment.

So that's already a step forward, if you can just be with that and acknowledge it and be there. But there's more to the now than what fills up the space of now. There's something deeper there, and that's the space itself, the space, the eternal, timeless now.

And then things appear in it and disappear. You can call it the space, you can call it the light of now, whatever word works best. So to be present is not only to be aware of what's going on within and without, that also, yes.

But even more importantly, it is to be aware of the now itself as the essence without which nothing else could even be. And right now, as I talk about it, perhaps you are able to realize within yourself what it is that I'm talking about, so that the words actually work in you, not to be accumulated and remember what I said, but let them work now, so that they can function as pointers in you. So the words are now pointing towards something deeper than what appears in the now, and that's the now itself.

It has no form, but it's that sense of timeless presence that's always there. And the strange thing is, it's inseparable from who you are in your essence. It's the I before it becomes something, the beingness, the being, and you feel that in the background, a presence.

Sometimes I call it, can you feel your own presence? Of course, it's not your own because nothing is your own. We just put it like that, just as a temporary pointer.

Can you feel the presence of you right now? Not as a memory of your past or your personal history. You don't need any memory to feel the presence of you, and you cannot define it in any way.

In some ways it feels as if you didn't know who you are anymore, and yet there is undoubtedly a presence. It defies all description, and that is enormously liberating to realize that within yourself. Sometimes I describe it as stillness, whatever pointer works.

It's a stillness. It's an enlarged stillness that frees you from the person. What that means is you realize there's something more real to who you are than all the things that you think you are, which are accumulations from the past.

That's the person. They make up the person, the conditioning of the mind, the sum total of all the experiences, some of which are remembered, some are in the unconscious, and they might be remembered at certain times. Many other things you think about all the time, what you're telling yourself, who you are, et cetera, ideas about who you are, and the sense of I that's based on the story of me, or something deeper.

So you realize that is there, but it's a very fleeting phenomenon. The personal I is very insubstantial, but there's something much more foundational to who you are, but you can't define it. It has nothing to do with your history, or your name, or your age, or your physical appearance, or your status in the world.

And to be able to sense that is essentially liberating. It liberates you from the delusion that all you are is the person with the physical body and the psychological form. And what's especially liberating is you no longer look to your physical body and the psychological entity for your sense of identity, of who you are.

So the person is still there, but you don't need it anymore to give you your real sense of self, because you have something much deeper. That is your sense of self, which the Buddha called no self, and the Indian teachings called this the Atman, the self, just using different pointers. The Buddha called it the no self because it has no form.

Sometimes he calls it emptiness. You can't make it into a mind object. And it's so liberating because the person is always insufficient.

So if your sense of self is confined to the person, you can't be satisfied for very long. Very briefly, you get moments. But you basically exist in a state of dissatisfaction.

In some people, very pronounced. In others, it's just in the background. Something is still missing in my life.

Something is still not right. And then you try other relationships, and you try other places to live, and you try other activities. And sooner or later, and usually sooner, you come again to the place.

This isn't right either. And then you ask, what am I really meant to do? Where am I really meant to be?

Because it's not here. It's never here, ultimately, because you're not at home deep enough in the now. So you can never feel, this is never it.

So, but there's no external solution to that. There's only an inner solution to that. You come home to the now, and you have to drop down beyond the mental emotional accumulations that you confuse with who you are.

And you sense, as I sometimes say, the ripple on the surface of the Pacific Ocean stops thinking of itself as a ripple, and senses its own depths. And suddenly, the ripple feels at one with the depths of the ocean, but also feels at one with every other ripple that it sees on the surface of the ocean, because it senses its connectedness with the totality, with the one, and therefore recognizes every other ripple as also being an expression of that. And then, for the first time, it can become comfortable with other ripples, really at ease.

The ripples, of course, in our analogy, are people. And what I'm really talking about, I was just looking, coming here, and this question somebody asked that is connected with what we are talking about, and that's the question about trust. Very, something very foundational.

This person asks, a long time ago, I was hurt really bad. It was traumatic. Ever since then, it wasn't really possible for me to trust anybody again.

I still have fears and panic when there are situations of being close together, and I take medication. Can you give me advice so that I'm able to trust again? So, that sense of connectedness with being, that's what it is, to drop down into being, that's where real trust arises.

Trust cannot arise, you can't look at another person and say, give me your trust, can I trust you? People are unpredictable, and people are display varying levels or degrees of consciousness, even on a single day, or in one afternoon. You can catch a person in the same afternoon, relatively present, and then the same person gets challenged by something, one little phone call, somebody, and immediately the person goes into complete mind identification and reactivity, and then the same person who you try to trust says something to you that comes out of his or her particular state of consciousness at that moment, and then the person who hasn't found the true source of all trust, who thinks that you can actually trust a person without sensing the connectedness with being, which is the source of all trust, then that person says, will then focus on the other person's moment of unconsciousness and whatever comes out of his or her mouth as words or actions, and say, you see, I knew we couldn't be trusted. And the unfortunate thing then happens, that thought lingers in the mind, he or she can't be trusted, in whatever form it might be expressed in slightly different words, and that thought lingers in the mind and stays in the background, and then whenever you meet that person again, that thought is there and whispers in your inner ear, he or she can't be trusted, be careful.

And because you believe in that underlying thought, you can't find it hard even to acknowledge the times when this other person is conscious and present, and you say, yeah, but not really, they look conscious now, but they're not really. In other words, you then look at the other person through your screen of mental accumulations, thoughts, and you no longer see what's there, but you see what your mind is projecting there, and you have drawn conclusions. It is true that that which gave rise to that particular thought, yes, of course, that person was unconscious, and perhaps in the moment of unconsciousness, that person said something to you that was untrue, that was a lie perhaps, or that was a distortion of something, or that was insensitive towards you, or whatever it was, yes, of course that happened.

A person can only manifest according, whatever they say or do manifest, it reflects their particular state of consciousness at that moment. But to make a permanent thing out of that and transform that in your mind into a self that you manufacture mentally for that other person, that's the delusion. And then your mind has fixed the other person, has a fixed image of that person, and it is quite possible that for the rest of your life, you're trapped in that, and I'm saying you are trapped, because when you trap another person in a fixed image, you yourself are trapped in that.

Somebody said the same thing 2000 years ago in slightly different words, something about judging. So we need to know how the mind works, how the egoic mind works. If we don't, then it'll deceive us, and it'll, we don't know what's happening then, we identify it with the mechanical patterns of the mind.

So every human being that you know, every human being you meet, they are not permanent fixtures, they are not, they are not, they are expressions of varying degrees of consciousness, depending what situation arises. They are not predictable, or if you know them, if you know their patterns, yes, their patterns are predictable, but you cannot say this person is always to be trusted. You never know, the moment may come, maybe after 15 years of knowing the person, something happens, and suddenly, oh, maybe I can't trust him or her.

So trust doesn't come from a person, it comes from that feeling of connectedness, the sense of connectedness within you. Then you can allow other humans to do what they do, to manifest whatever they manifest out of their particular state of consciousness at that moment, and not equate it with who they are, and manufacture an identity for them, a self, that, and then it's because that's a thought, or a group of associated thoughts in your mind. It's a dreadful imitation, but it happens all the time.

So when you know that, you can continue to meet other human beings in the state of openness, even people you've known for a while. Don't expect them to be conscious continuously, or to express in different language, don't expect them to always do and say the right thing, to be consistent in their behavior, most are not, and in many cases, one single human being is different entities. And it's only when you, sometimes when you know a person superficially, you know one particular level or manifestation of that person, the public persona, or whatever it is, and it's only when you spend more time with them, you live with them, you work with them, that other people will come out of the same human being.

And almost everybody who ever married somebody, at some point, woke up and said, this is not the person I married, something went wrong here. And then if you believe what your mind says, it will already come up with weird judgments like, he or she deceived me into believing he was playing a role, and just to get me, and whatever your mind is telling you, some absurd story, interpretation of this other person now, and then you get stuck in that, and that's the beginning of the decline of the... So of course you can't trust human beings, there isn't even a single human being there, unless that person is totally present, there isn't a single human being.

Every human being is many different human beings. So of course you can't trust them. But if you're in this state of connectedness with being, so you drop down to a deeper level within yourself, and there you have, there is a sense of power and something that goes far beyond anything in the world of form, is peace, a powerful sense of peace and aliveness.

And when you're connected from that, and you can allow other human beings to display their varying degrees of consciousness, to be their different selves in different situations, with compassion, without needing them, needing them to be consistent in their behavior, they won't. So if you need them to be consistent, then there's a discrepancy between reality and your expectations, which is an unpleasant place to be. Imagine the entire life, or going through life with an almost continuous discrepancy between your expectations, how things and people and situations and places should be, and how they are.

It's very frustrating. And you can notice that people who are very deeply trapped in those patterns very frequently use the little word should. Both apply to others and even to themselves.

Should have, should, should not, should not have. That's... He shouldn't have said that.

He should have thanked me. So that is a vital thing. Now, some people have an upbringing where that is relatively stable, where the family, maybe you're born into a loving family, you get support in early life.

Then it's perhaps easier to trust other humans than if you're born into a family that gives you no support and no love. And you have to just almost fight for survival, if not physical survival, psychological survival every day of your life. That's quite a, and this is perhaps the questioner case here.

Well, the questioner mentions one particular instance. So it can be one instance when a human being does something to you and makes you lose trust. Or in some cases, it can be many years of, of finding that life cannot be trusted because in your early years, your surrounding, the people that you are with don't support you, don't give you love.

And then of course there is, then you may be unable to trust other humans, not on the conventional level where people who have experienced relatively stable family background find it easier to trust other humans. But those people still are not necessarily motivated to go to the deepest place. It's, it's when life has deprived you of certain things, like the natural ability to trust others.

Then at first you are in a place of a deficient place, a deprived place, and you could be deprived in, in, in different ways by life. Even some people in early on in life lose one of their parents when they're still a child, or their parents abandon them, or one of the father or mother leaves, or whatever. It is very unstable.

Now one would usually interpret that as a huge handicap resulting in perhaps an injured sense of self for the rest of their lives. And this sometimes does happen, but it's also a great opportunity because those people who have experienced loss early in life, or even a little later in life, or have experienced very unstable family situation, those people's motivation to go deeper is quite strong. They just have to realize that that is a possibility.

So when everything is fine, you have a pleasant upbringing, then okay, then you can, you relate well to people, you can relatively trust them, you don't overemphasize when they do something wrong, you can still have some trust. You can forgive and forget as the expression goes. So that's, that's fine.

So it makes life for more pleasant experience. But also the motivation to go to a really deeper place where, where trust arises that has nothing to do with anything external is not as strong. So it is often people who have experienced disruption early in life, or lack of security.

Those people often are drawn at some point in their lives to a spiritual dimension.

Because the motivation is much stronger because they experience life. It's the life experience can often be painful, more painful than the relatively adjusted person.

But the relatively adjusted person also is relatively superficial until something happens to them because life usually arranges for some things to collapse in your life sooner or later. Even for the relatively adjusted person, they might lose their job on Wall Street. And suddenly, or whatever, the wife leaves him, the husband leaves, the children do something, something insane, the stock market collapses.

I could hundreds of possible scenarios of things, things in ways in which things can go wrong, and do. But so it's a, it's a curse and a blessing to have experienced a very difficult first part of your life. It's a curse because it can sometimes condemn you to a difficult life experience because those patterns are still operating in you.

But it's also, there's also the possibility that your motivation to go deeper is much stronger than a relatively adjusted person. I know that was the case with me. I wasn't that well adjusted.

So if you have that basic distrust, first you need to be aware of how, what your mind is doing to other people. That you need to be aware that every human is many people, unless they are really very conscious, and then you can just get perhaps remnants of personalities, but not, they don't get overtaken anymore by different personalities. That's already a great thing to know and to realize.

Every human has that. Not, as I said, not at, when you first meet them, when you start being, spending time with them. And before I continue, just a little anecdote.

There was a time when I lived in England, in the country. I had a cottage. There were two bedrooms, three bedrooms upstairs.

And because my income was low, I had to rent out two bedrooms. And so I had a succession of people renting over a period of three years or so. And probably about, it was a place where people would spend, come for a period of time and then move on.

I had probably 10 or 11 people. And out of those eight, out of 10, sooner or later developed, when I got to know them, lived in the same house with them, relatively small place, be displayed, there were areas in their behavior that were quite dysfunctional, almost called insane. And I don't just mean quirks of their personality, different ways of doing, no, some more than that.

Patterns that led to complete distortion of reality in certain areas of their lives. And that wasn't just one person, it was eight out of 10. And only one person didn't fit into any of these.

Two people stayed relatively, displayed a higher degree of presence. There were certain variations also in them, but they didn't get taken over by personalities, temporary personas, sub-personalities, they're sometimes called, whatever you want to call them. They didn't get taken over completely, leading to almost total distortion of reality.

I had one person, however, that she came, stayed for two or three months and was quite peaceful. And a friend told me that she had told him living at Eckhart's place is like living in a float tank. Float.

And the moment she moved out, I heard secondhand accounts, she was involved in huge drama, including physical violence with men and other women. And she was known for always generating huge drama in her life, except when she stayed with me. I didn't know that, otherwise I probably wouldn't have invited her in.

So somehow in the energy field of presence, she was able to to drop into or rise into presence. But the moment she left, the old patterns came back. Now that was an unusual case.

Mostly you find humans are not one single being. This is the point of the story. Once you know that, you can no longer perhaps misinterpret when humans shift and then do display behavior that is not conscious.

So, and instead of then creating a thought in your mind and allowing this thought to survive and even proliferate in your mind and start complaining and so on, you can recognize that every human does that, has that to a greater or lesser degree. Okay, then let's step forward to that realization. And then you can allow them because you probably are the same.

There are different people in you. There's a more conscious you and there's a more unconscious you. And then the more unconscious you has many different facets to it, different sub, different ways of being unconscious.

And then you can see, okay, now we know that we can't trust people, except in the sense as Byron Katie said, I trust everybody, said I trust everybody to do what they do. So you have to, you can't trust them to display consistently conscious behavior. That would be absurd.

So you go to a deeper place and see what the real trust is not, doesn't come from people. The real trust is finding that place of depths within yourself that does not. And once you're there, then you can relate to humans from there.

And you no longer say, I demand that you are conscious all the time. And if you're not, I'll hold it against you and then I'll never talk to you again. So it all comes back to that place of dropping down into where the mind activity subsides.

And instead of always being trapped in your thoughts and relating to the world and to people through your thoughts, plus the emotions that accompany the thoughts, you go to that deeper place of just feel your own presence. Let's put it like that for a moment, feel the presence that you are, the beingness of you, the most, that deep level of I amness, the presence, the only thing that cannot be doubted, that it is absolutely real, that exists, that is the isness of you. And if that is in the background of your life, then you can allow others to do what they do.

The likelihood is when you meet others from that deeper place, their behavior will become a little more conscious. The very unconscious sub-personalities may manifest themselves less. Because when you erroneously mistake a person's unconsciousness, unconscious sub-personality or whatever you want to call it, when you erroneously mistake that for who they are and mentally focus on that, you also bring it out more in them every time you meet them, because those are the expectations.

And quite often, unless humans are really present, they oblige and they give you what you expect them. If you expect dishonesty, you're more likely to find dishonesty in humans. When you expect violence, you're more likely to find it.

So trust, really another word for it in spiritual terminology, is faith. Because what is faith? Faith is not belief.

Belief means you have a story and you say, this story, I believe this story to be true. And of course, you have no idea whether it is true. But you say, if you knew it was true, then you wouldn't say believe anymore.

You can't say, I believe in this table. You don't need to. It's here.

So belief would be belief in some abstract story or whatever it is. It could be an ideology, something your mind tells you. But faith is very different.

In some languages, belief and faith, unfortunately, are the same word. Faith is trust. Faith is a sense of deep connectedness with being.

From that deep place of connectedness, you can also manifest things. But let's not talk about that right now. That is the conscious connection with source, the source of life, which is within you.

But, and it's so easy. It's, you just become still and direct your attention to what? You direct your attention to nothing in particular.

You're just aware of attention and that's it. So if the attention is looking for your true self, it doesn't realize that it is your true self because it's consciousness. You are consciousness.

And knowing that, that's trust suddenly, because you're no longer dependent on the continuously shifting things out here for your sense of the beingness of who you are. Because not only humans are continuously shifting, but even things around you, they come and go. Situations continuously come and go, change.

Impermanence, as the Buddha called it, fleeting. And so as long as you look to externals for any sense of security, including humans, can I trust him? Can I trust her?

That's very precarious. And usually when I would say, no, don't trust him or her, trust yourself. But then you're no longer in a state of distrust.

No, trust then arises, but not from, from him or her. It's such essential teaching, but not many people seem to realize it yet. Now at that deeper level, really many things that are different concepts on the external level, they really all, they merge into one.

So when we speak of trust or when we speak of presence, beingness, perhaps to put it more accurately, we'd say the connectedness with beingness is presence. And out of the presence flows trust. And out of the presence also flows, and that's also inseparable from trust, flows what you could call goodwill or benevolence towards other humans and other life forms.

Because when your mind is telling you something about another human and fixes, constructs an identity for that human by selecting the unconscious, one of the unconscious aspects of that human, by selecting that, then manufacturing a mental identity for that human, and then for the rest of your life, continue to relate to that human through that mind form, then you can, there is no, the goodwill cannot flow.

You can, there cannot be an outflow of goodwill anymore. It's blocked by the mind pattern. But if you no longer trap the other human and yourself in the mind pattern, then there is an openness for the outflow, let's put it like that, the outflow of benevolence towards the other person, the other human being.

And while you could call it love, but it's not the conventional, better maybe to call it loving kindness. And that is a wonderful thing to experience in relation, it makes human contact much more pleasant if you can feel an outflow of goodwill, even towards a human that you might not meet very briefly, and even there, sense that for a moment when you're not, there's no thought, there's just a presence, and you're looking at another human, and you feel an energetic, one could say also an energetic connection for a moment, and it's an outflow of goodwill, no matter who, what their function is at that particular moment in your life, there's always then an added dimension, otherwise you reduce other human beings to whatever their function have, whatever function they have in relation to you, the man who is selling you something, is he only the man who is selling you something? Is that, are you reducing this person to the function that he or she performs at that moment in relation to you, or is there a deeper dimension so that there is a human being that you recognize?

And the way I, as you may, I don't know if you have heard me say that before, the way what I, how I interpret human being is, you might have, might notice that there are two words in the English language, in a way at first I felt it's a pity that English doesn't have one word for human being, it only has man, and that's supposed to include women, so when you, often when you read, when people say men, it's supposed to include women too, but it doesn't, but it still means men, so some languages like German, they have a word that is, applies to man and woman, mensch, so that would be, mensch is man or woman, but English language you need to have two words, you have to say human being, at first I felt, well that's a pity, but then upon looking more closely at human being, I realized, oh, that's actually quite wonderful because there's a deep truth there, you have the human and you have the being come together, the human is a form, it's the physical vehicle and it's the psychological form, including all the imperfections and all the accumulations and the conditioning, the person, basically the person who you think you are, the person who other people think you are, the person that you've been told you are, and the person you believe to be, the person, ideas in your mind about who you are, that's the person and that's the human. Now most people only know the human, they think they are the human, they don't realize that they are also the being, but you have to know both really to be awakened in this dimension, you need to be awakened to the being dimension in you, so that you can be in the balance between form, physical, mental, emotional, psychological form, the form who you are, the person, and the transcendent dimension, the essence of who you are, which is the being, and your identity to awaken spiritually means that your identity shifts from the human to the being, and when your identity has shifted from the human to the being, the human becomes a more pleasant human, and it's more comfortable for yourself to be this particular human in that life, this particular lifetime, and it's more comfortable for others to be with you as that particular human, and that's because you also know the being, the transcendent dimension, so that is, there have been cases of humans who, extreme cases of spiritual realization, humans who completely wanted to give up their humanness and disappear in being, this has happened in the past in early Christianity, people who withdrew into the desert, solitary meditators, the desert fathers, they were called in early Christianity, in India for thousands of years, there have been humans who wanted nothing to do anymore with the world of form, and withdrew completely into being. I myself have been tempted a few times to go that way, but since I'm not living in India, nobody's going to come and feed me when I sit there, and I don't want to be put away into some institution, and you don't want that either for yourself, so I would suggest the balance between the person, which includes all the doings of the person, and the being, and it's only then when there's a balance between the human and the being that you become a true human being, before that you're not, you're on your way, but you haven't become fully human yet, because you can only become fully human when you realize the being also, and so there are still millions on the planet who most certainly are not yet fully human, and that is why they create so much suffering for themselves and others, so the majority still of the population on the planet is a work in progress, haven't quite arrived yet. God, as I saw the other day, the bumper sticker that I saw on the car said, be patient, God isn't finished with me yet. Evolution continues, the human continues to evolve, and in a strange way, the discovery of being, or the realization of the being dimension in you, means that the person, that dimension of the human becomes far less dense, it's almost like it half recedes, disappears, and then the being shines through.

Without the being, the human is very dense, dense karmic accumulations, so what is your purpose in life is to become fully human, but when we use the word to become, that seems to imply it's a long road ahead, but it's not really. In fact, you only become, there's lots of paradox in spiritual language, you only become fully human when you realize that apart from becoming, there's also being, you're no longer trapped in continuously becoming, becoming, becoming, that's the human, trying to become more of this, more of that, so you realize there's the being also, and you're not continuously trapped in becoming, then you become a true human being.

So to know this, that humans are not fully human yet, this is wonderful, because then you can allow other humans to be on their journey, and compassion can be there when you realize they are not fully human yet, but without coming from a place of superiority that thinks, I'm fully human, but they are not, so that sense of superiority is usually a sign that you're not there, because as you become a full human being, you're no longer identified, that's the mark of the full human being, you're not identified anymore with the form, the form, you are able to use it and be it to some extent, but you don't derive your identity from it, so superiority can only, superiority or inferiority can only come in as long as you're identified with the form of you, mental, psychological, physical, but once your identification is with being, there's no longer any comparison, because immediately you realize that is the being that you share with every other being, it is the one being that appears as many, so how could you feel superior to another, although you may recognize that they are not fully human, yet it means they haven't realized their beingness, they are already in a way, they are already, but they don't know it, and so they are trapped in the world of delusion, so you continuously get feedback from other human beings as to your level of consciousness, and that's good, if you lived alone, you wouldn't know, you could easily think you are fully, you have arrived and you're completely enlightened, because you can meditate for so many hours every day, well, I feel that this session is complete now, it was, every time the one truth expresses itself in slightly different ways, I'm always surprised how it happens, and it's wonderful to see.

Eckhart Tolle On Rhonda Byrne The Secret book PowerOfAttractionVsThePowerOfNow--

My question to you is, in the book, The Secret, it's based on the Law of Attraction, where you attract everything into your life, whereas your book, The Power of Now, is being in the moment and letting the universe guide your life. So I just want to know your thoughts on that, on the difference. Thank you.

Well, as we can see, if we look around, the universe, or life, creates life forms everywhere, wherever we look. So the universe loves to create form, it seems. It can also create form through the human form.

Humans can create as they do, and humans are not separate from the totality of the universe, so there isn't human creation and the universe creating. It's all one. It's the totality.

We are the universe. You are the universe. So when you create, or when I create something externally, whatever it is, any structure that you build, from a simple thing, building something, or using your mind, your thoughts, to help in the act of creation, to create something on the mental level, before it becomes physical form, that's a way in which the universe can create through the human form.

One could almost say indirectly, or secondary creation. You may have heard the expression, we become co-creators with God. Your question is really, is it up to us to initiate the act of creation, or should we simply rest in presence and then see what happens?

The foundation, of course, for creation is resting in presence. That's the very foundation, because resting in presence, that is touching the source of, true source of creativity, and the true source of fulfillment or satisfaction, which is not form, but the formless life itself. It is essentially fulfilling to sense the timeless presence that we could call I am, to sense that directly in yourself, not as an object in your awareness, but as yourself.

So it's a self-realization of consciousness. Not a subject-object realization. And that is essentially happiness, if you want to use that word, aliveness, fulfillment, and that is essentially your identity, your true identity, which has no form.

That's why the Buddhists say there is no self. Self in the sense of anything that you consider yourself that has form, psychological or physical form, is not who you are. The essential self, which the Buddhists deny and just call emptiness, or which in India is called the Atman, that is the formless, and that's the very basis.

If you create before having consciously realized the source of creation, then you belong to all those billions of humans who create out of the state of identification with form, which we could call the ego state. But that's also the universe. If the universe did not want to experience itself as the egoic entity also, then it would not be, the ego would not exist.

So it seems the universe loves that dream, which becomes a nightmare sooner or later, of the egoic consciousness. So whenever you create because you believe that the object of your creation is going to make you happy or fulfilled, then you create out of the egoic consciousness, and it's stressful and frustrating and never really fulfilling. But that's the dream of the ignorance of who you are, and perhaps the universe needs to dream that dream and then wake up out of that dream into a conscious realization of itself, and that also is happening through the human form.

So the humans can create out of the ignorance identification with form, in which case also they create a lot of havoc. Of course, they create a lot of conflict, because the more deeply you're identified with form, the more you come into conflict with other forms that are also deeply identified with their form. That it's not just the individual forms, it's also the collective forms of tribes, religions, religions within religions.

You see what's when you listen to the news, you can see one Islamic sect is killing another one, and this evening, even within the same religion, they hate each other. And this has happened. And that is complete identification with form.

It has happened in Christianity. In Christianity, at the moment, they may not be killing each other. They did not enough of that in the Middle Ages, but many still hate each other, and whoever does not agree with your little group, of course, is the anti-Christ.

That's a nice word you can pre-impose on others. Buddhists haven't come up with that yet. I have never heard of the anti-Buddha, Buddha.

Laughter So, and that's within the totality, that's fine too, because that's the dream of identification with form. And how do I know that? Because I've been in that dream, and I've come out of that dream of identification with form, and what is true for the individual is true for the totality.

So it's a collective dream. It's also an awakening that happens when the suffering and the madness becomes so pronounced that it forces you to open your eyes. And then you look and say, What am I doing?

What are we doing? What have I done? What have we done?

So this happens when the suffering becomes very acute, as happened, for example, on a very large scale in the 20th century, when after the First World War, when for the first time the tools of technology and science were used in warfare. There had been warfare for thousands of years before, but now it became magnified through the tools of science and technology, bombs, gas, poisonous substances, artillery, tanks, submarines, machine guns, and suddenly they created havoc that they'd never seen before on such a huge scale, millions and millions of dead, and nobody actually remembered how did it all start. What was the beginning of the First World War?

They just drifted into it totally blindly, identified with their little tribe, their little nation. That's one way of creating, and whenever you have not touched the source of life within yourself, touched it, realized it, lived from it, then you create and add to the karmic burden on the planet, because whatever you create has negativity attached to it, and karma creates further resistance. It provokes resistance, creates more resistance, and so contributes to the continuation of the dream.

So, to put it very simply, when you think something is going to make you happy, if you create this or that, that's not going to happen. That's the ignorance. If you're looking for fulfillment through something that you imagine you're going to create, it's not going to fulfill you.

It can't. You have to come from that state of fulfillment already. Then a different kind of creation can happen.

You could, of course, just sit for the rest of your life somewhere and hope that somebody will put some food into your mouth. If you go to India and you truly emanate peace, then that will happen. They will put food into your mouth.

If you do it in a Western country, it probably won't happen, but they'll put you away, and then they'll put food in your mouth. That's the thing. Laughter Most people find that even if they rest in presence, at some point the impulse to act will be there.

It could be action on a small scale, very small scale. It could be action on a larger scale. It may not immediately be action.

It may be an inspiration or an idea or a vision that suddenly rises into your mind, and then you contemplate that, and it feels empowered. And it is not something that says you need to achieve that in order to become happy or fulfilled. The energy that goes with it is so empowering that it is the same as if you had already achieved it.

That's the act of creation has that energy that flows with it. It is as powerful as the actual achievement in itself, if not more so, because the actual achievement is already the end of the creative process. The moment you have completed the creative act, you're already at the end of it.

And what now? So the empowerment is in the doing, not the arriving. That's the egoic delusion, is that the empowerment is in the arriving, but the empowerment is in the doing, in the act of creation.

It's not just the empowerment. It's also the joy and aliveness that comes with it. So you don't need the, as it's called in the Bhagavad Gita, the fruit of the action.

You're not looking or are more focused on the fruit of the action, as it's called in the Bhagavad Gita, which means the outcome, the desired outcome. Your attention is not mainly in the desired outcome. Your attention is on the doing itself.

Although, yes, you have a vision of what it is that wants to come into being, but your attention is fully in the doing and the enjoyment and the empowerment of doing. It can be very intense, the act of creation. The energy that flows into it can be very intense, so intense that it might even look to an outsider as if you were stressed, but you're not.

But there can be that intensity of creation. So when something comes through or you, in whatever form, and that's beautiful, then you are the universe, the creative, the one intelligence, the one creative intelligence is creating through the human form, and that's beautiful. So it's this deep enjoyment in the act of creation.

It's the, the motivation is not egoic anymore. The motivation is not a sense of lack or fulfillment or unfulfillment, but enjoyment. So in that sense, this, the secret, I don't remember if the secret talks about that, the book, that the foundation is the present moment as oneness with that.

And then creation is fine when you no longer believe that certain things that you add to your life or create are going to make you happy or fulfilled. And so that's the difference. So the question then, do I need to make plans?

I can't answer that as such. You may be one of the few who will rest in being for the rest of their lives in this bodily form and just sit somewhere or walk around, and that's fine too, but it's less likely. There are very few.

It happens, maybe in India, it happens more than in the West, just as well, because the environment there is more receptive to that kind of thing. As for example, Ramana Maharshi, some of you may know, the famous wonderful spiritual teacher who passed away in the early 50s, he just sat, when he was a young boy, he left his home. He had a realization of being, of awakening, and he sat next to a temple away from his hometown.

He left his family. Nobody knew where he was, and he just, there was no movement into action, just being, no speaking, didn't want to eat, just bliss of total oneness with the source. But after a few years, he started to put food in his mouth, and then he started to speak.

So a little bit of doing happened even to him, but no planning. So in his case, he didn't say, okay, I'm going to set up an ashram. That happened by itself.

The ashram organically grew. So it can happen to some people who are just either totally present, and then something happens around you. In most cases, some kind of doing will be involved.

It could be a spontaneous unfolding of what is happening already. Let's say you're playing an instrument, and you love it so much that you just, you enjoy playing it, and then gradually music comes to you. You compose something or spontaneously play, and suddenly, without any vision of what you want to achieve, things can grow.

This can happen, it has happened to people, just the intense enjoyment of the doing leading to organic growth into form. The Beatles loved making their music, and I don't think they had necessarily a vision that we are going to be the greatest ever, but it happened out of the deep enjoyment and the intensity of that act of creation.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Retreat May the Mind Be Servant of Awareness 11hour44min part1

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:00)

Welcome.

Those of you who've been here or on other retreats before won't be waiting for the retreat to begin. It's begun already. You may detect in yourself as you sit there, occasionally, an urge to get to the next moment.

It's quite normal. It's the normal state of consciousness. And that normal state of consciousness and that urge to get to the next moment are continuously being frustrated here.

If you don't have the urge to get to the next moment and you're not falling asleep either, that's important. That means a different state of consciousness is already arising from within you. Falling asleep is another possibility and it may happen to some of you.

It happens even to monks in Buddhist monasteries, occasionally. But to detect in yourself that urge, that need for the next moment, that's really all that is necessary, to notice that, oh, and that already is also, that is the arising of a deeper consciousness. From where that urge can be observed.

So it's not necessary to create a dilemma on top of the urge to get to the next moment and say, I should not have this urge to get to the next moment, but I do. And you have another personal dilemma and you can think about that for the next few days. And add it to the problems that you have.

As if you didn't have enough problems out in the world, you can create some more here. And it's the human mind, it likes to do that, because then it has something to do. So simply to see it is enough.

The seeing frees you from being trapped in the conditioned mind, the conditioning of the human mind, which is not a personal matter. It looks like me and my problems, but it's the conditioning of the human mind. It comes as a personal sense of self, an exclusively personal sense of self.

Me and my problems. Me and my need for the next moment. And what is arising here, as you observe the conditioned mind, is the arising of what we could call unconditioned consciousness.

Which is simply to be aware without labeling what is. Very important throughout these days here is the silence. The words are secondary.

The words are not here to give some alternative philosophy or explanation of the universe, but simply to point to something that is beyond words and beyond thinking. Accessing a dimension of consciousness that is deeper than thinking. You could also call it higher or deeper, depends what perspective you use to look at it.

A dimension of consciousness that is deeper or higher than thinking. And that, in many of you, is already arising. And that I sometimes call the new state of consciousness.

It's not really new. Maybe new to you. I've seen a secondhand shop that was called new to you.

It's also relatively new on the planet. Yes, Buddha talked about it, other teachers pointed to it, but it's still relatively new on the planet. It's not new in the truest sense because it's timeless, so it can't be new.

But if you start looking into words and analyzing each word that I say, that will lead you astray. It is another temptation of the mind to take a word or a statement and say, yeah, but that's not quite right. Of course not.

No word is quite right. So if you expect words to be totally right, then you get drawn into another dilemma, which is disagreeing with something, not realizing that it's only a tiny perspective. It's only a little pointer.

It's not it. It only points. All the words only point beyond themselves.

To what? To the new state of consciousness, which isn't new at all. And that is the state in which you're no longer trapped, totally trapped in the stream of thinking and the emotions that go with that stream of thinking.

What arises is already arising in many of you is that state of simple, pure, aware presence. And we are here to deepen that, for this to enable to deepen. Or in some of you, perhaps for the first time, to have a glimpse of that.

It doesn't matter in some of you, it's a deepening of what's already happening. Or for some of you who are sitting here at this moment and wondering, what is he talking about? If you sit here for long enough, you may suddenly get a glimpse of what it is that the words point to.

And then the next moment, the mind will come in and try to understand the glimpse. And immediately, the glimpse will have become a problem. Zen has been trying to teach that also, of course, for a few hundred years.

And not many got it, because they tried to understand it through thought. And so this is why I'm saying the words are secondary. Throughout these days, if you can be aware, not just of the words, but the silent spaces between the words, which is not something that the thinking mind would be interested in, because in the silent spaces between the words, there is nothing much to think about.

Not only the silent spaces, the undercurrent of silence or stillness that is there when the words are spoken. That is our practice, part of the practice here, as you sit here, so that you are not here to listen to a talk, that's only peripheral, on the surface. But you are here to enter that different state of consciousness, or allow it to arise, is perhaps a better way of putting it, allowing it to arise.

And as you sit here, this happens simply by being attentive to the silent spaces. And all that means is notice them. It's not that difficult.

And to the thinking mind, that is not very significant. Okay, so what comes next? Okay, you've talked about the silent spaces, now what's next?

Each time you notice silence, there's a little space of stillness inside you. We don't need to measure it in terms of seconds or minutes, three seconds, who knows, three minutes, three hours, it doesn't really matter, time isn't involved here. What is more important than how long that space is there inside you, we could say is, what matters is whether it's there at this moment, or how often it comes, the arising of that inner spacious stillness.

And all that is needed as you sit here is to notice silent spaces. The noticing is the arising of stillness inside you. Which is consciousness without thought, just conscious, unconditioned, true intelligence.

The most important event in your life, if we can even call it that, all words are limited, the most important event in your life is that, the arising of that state of consciousness. And the strange thing is, that most important event doesn't come with a lot of noise, fire, there it is, it's coming, drums, trumpets, the mind says, where is it? What's happened?

Nothing has happened. Enlightenment, a concept, if you're here to achieve it, you probably won't, because you're already making the next moment into a desirable goal that is more important than this. And as that dimension emerges, more and more you find that thinking no longer dominates your life, still happens, of course, but doesn't draw you in totally.

One could say that a space develops between you and your thought processes. A space develops between you and the flux of emotions that go with thinking. And again, those words are limited.

It's not really a space between you and the words, that's another little perspective on it, it is the realization that you are that space in which your thinking happens. In which your emotions happen. And that's all that's required this week, is that, to know yourself as that space.

The arising of inner spaciousness, which I sometimes call space consciousness. That sounds like science fiction. Outer space, inner space.

Space consciousness as opposed to object consciousness. And that is amazing, because if you consider that on the planet, even though the shift is happening, the majority of human beings are totally trapped, totally absorbed by object consciousness. Objects, things.

Object consciousness, of course, is thinking. The arising of an object in the space of your consciousness, a thought, which draws you in completely. So people's lives are consumed by, absorbed by objects, the objects of their thoughts, the thought processes.

But on an external level, it manifests as a continuous preoccupation with things that need to be dealt with. And material things, events, you know how life is when you, your normal existence, the world making demands on you, this is matters, this is important, and then the next thing is important, and then you have five things that are all important. And this is what consumes people's lives.

But it goes down to being consumed by, totally absorbed by the objects that arise. Because really, it's not the external world, it's really an inner phenomenon. Philosophers argue whether there's actually anything out there.

Because all we know is the inner world, where sense perceptions get translated into nerve impulses that reach the brain, then the impulses become decoded, and some kind of image emerges of what the external world is like. What is the relationship between that image and the actual external world? Is there an external world at all?

Is it all a dream that's happening in consciousness? Leave that. You were waiting for an answer.

So, your attention being totally absorbed by thoughts, because it comes down to thoughts, even the things that seem to matter so much in your life are not really the things that matter, they are thought forms. Each thing becomes a thought form, a mental image, and that absorbs your attention. Even if you might be concerned about your shares on the stock market these days, or maybe you've given up already.

And so, you're not really concerned about the stocks, it's the thought form of stock that absorbs your attention. There may be no stock market there at all, it may be a figment of your imagination. It could be the collective dream of Wall Street.

But whether it is or not, we don't need to take a position here and say, yes, it's real, and then half the audience will say, it's real, Wall Street exists, and the other half says, no, it does not exist. Whether or not it exists out there, what really one cannot argue with, that what absorbs your attention is not the shares, it's thought forms that have many associations that are to do with me, and my future, and my security, and my old age, and what's going to happen to me. So it's the thought form absorbs your attention.

So all the things that absorb your attention, expressed so nicely by Thoreau, Henry Thoreau, who said, our life is frittered away by detail. Simplify, simplify. And really what he was talking about is the continuous, the world of things that we inhabit, which really is the world of thought.

And our life is frittered away by that, totally absorbed by that. Details. Another beautiful quote about details.

Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God, the rest is details. It's true, the rest is details. And so this is why we are here.

The mind of God is consciousness. Know that. Everything else that comes out of the one consciousness that you are is details.

Of course that will go on, that's fine. So here, realizing, most of humanity's state of consciousness is dominated by objects. The objects of the senses, the objects of conceptual thought, object consciousness.

So much so that they have made themselves into an object in their consciousness, a me. A problematic object, consisting of a conglomeration, a coming together of many objects in consciousness, a little bundle of memories, conditionings, reactive patterns, and it's called me. A person.

And that absorbs my attention completely, because I'm such a problem to me. And everybody's sense of me is problematical and it's a dilemma. Whose life is not a dilemma?

And there is a need to solve that dilemma of me. And that's a, there's a myth of Sisyphus, I believe. It's somebody who has to roll up a big boulder up a mountain.

And he pushes it up the mountain and when he gets to the top it rolls down again. It's a, to solve that self-created dilemma of the self is an impossible task. Although a few times you might think, now I've solved it.

When the stocks suddenly go up. Or you've fallen in love. So to be absorbed by that, and now the possibility is there for humanity, for the first time on a larger scale, to access a deeper level of consciousness.

Not object consciousness, space consciousness. Unconditioned intelligence. Which already some artists, anybody who is creative, has a little bit of access to that in their field of creativity.

Where they become attentive, alert, almost listening. And then the creative impulse comes, the insight comes, the realization comes. Or the activity happens suddenly out of that space.

Intelligence is at work. And you then find yourself doing or saying something that you didn't know before. It just happens.

So a few people have access to it in their little area of creativity. But this is different. This is the arising of that state of consciousness as a shift, not just in one little area of your life.

But something that arises and transforms your whole life. From this limited sense of problematic little me, to something deeper. So that your attention is not totally absorbed anymore by object consciousness and the exclusively personal sense of self.

Which is the dreadful present. So there are two movements here. The arising of that, and the movement of the old.

And the conditioned consciousness, the entity, the mind made entity, the me, is still there. It has momentum. It's a conditioned mind form.

And the fact that you are here on a retreat doesn't necessarily mean that it doesn't come here also. You didn't leave it at home. It's here.

And at times it may not be here. Very powerfully at times the new consciousness arises. And then suddenly you get totally drawn back into the old conditioned object consciousness.

Some thoughts absorb your attention totally. And the thoughts might be saying, What are you doing here? It's pointless.

You left all these problems at home. You should be dealing with that. You should be at home.

You should be somewhere else. For example, many other things it could say. The self, the mind made self.

But here the opportunity is there to notice it. So that your attention is not totally drawn into it. There is an observing presence.

As the old conditioned patterns come up, because they will. This is a few days here is enough to experience all that. Don't expect to experience only bliss.

Perhaps you will. You will experience probably the entire range. Not only externally.

You probably experience all kinds of weather during these days here. We also experience all kinds of inner weather while we are here. And so noticing that, the conditioned self with its patterns, wanting to draw your attention in again totally, and occasionally perhaps succeeding.

You can recognize it. And an important characteristic of that self is it doesn't like this moment. There is something not right with it.

Either it's something completely wrong with it, or I need to get to some more significant moment. So you notice that. And also it likes to complain.

Fault finding. With whatever it may be. Something in your room.

Something in the food. Something in people around you. The weather.

Well, today it's more difficult. Complaining. The self loves that.

That sense of personal self, the mind itself, likes to complain. Internally or out aloud if somebody listens to you. And if you find somebody who agrees, you can strengthen each other.

And this sounds relatively harmless, but this lies at the root of human madness, which in its harmless manifestation is somebody at a retreat complaining about something. That's the most harmless manifestation of that. And then you go, how is that related to the madness in the world?

How is that related to the Middle East? How is that? Well, let's see.

There's a little me complaining. What does that mean? Why is it complaining?

It's complaining because whatever it complains about is irrelevant. It means, me, I am right. That which I am complaining about is somehow wrong.

That's the essence of complaining. And I'm not talking about genuine complaint, which isn't a complaint at all. It's a fact and says, please, this is no good, what I just bought.

I want to exchange it. That's not complaining. That's stating a fact or saying, this soup is cold.

Please give me a hot soup. That's perfectly fine. That's not complaining.

It's stating a fact. In certain things you need to say something. It happens.

So this is not what we are talking about, but the inner whining and complaining and the pointless complaining that is designed to put yourself, the self, the mind-made self, in a position of rightness. And someone else, which could be a person or a situation or a place, put someone else in a position of wrongness. And the mind-made sense of self, always looking out, looking to enhance its always deficient sense of self, for a moment feels stronger when it has complained about something or someone or a place, whatever it may be.

Because your sense of self gets strength in the fictitious self that consists of object consciousness. If you can have a mental position of being right, of course it implies, unfortunately, somebody else has to be wrong. Something or someone has, for you to be right, something or someone has to be wrong, otherwise it doesn't work.

So, for a moment, if you are very alert and attentive, you can sense a strengthening of me in your complaint. And that's unconscious, usually. And so that's a movement that the egoic sense of self uses a lot to strengthen itself.

It has other strategies, too. Many other strategies. But this is one of the core strategies of this artificial, fictitious self, ultimately, to strengthen itself.

So, unfortunately, it needs, therefore, some kind of enemy, because when you're complaining about something, it's the beginning of having an enemy out there, which is the other person. It may not yet be recognizable as an enemy, but it's the beginning of that mind movement of me right, being wrong. And so you have the same thing, then, in more extreme manifestations, as a collective, a group of people, which could be a nation or religion, a tribe, being totally identified with their position and their sense of self depending on their position of rightness, their total identification with their mental positions, which says, this is how it is.

And their need, therefore, whoever diverges from that mental position, whoever does not agree with your story, becomes the enemy. And you need the enemy because your sense of self would not sustain itself without it, without feeling that we are absolutely right. So you cannot see anymore that all thought is relative.

No thought or no mental position can contain the entire truth. You don't see that anymore. You get totally absorbed by one thought, a few thought forms, which are then invested with self, a sense of self, personal or collective, the same principle is at work.

And so you can no longer, this was in the New York Times a few weeks ago, an Israeli writer talking about the Middle East conflict, which is absolute madness, but no, it's human madness, just an extreme manifestation of what's been there throughout human history. And what he saw there, he saw very clearly why there's no peace there. It seems no possibility of peace almost gone.

People's inability to accommodate, he called it, people's inability to accommodate a competing narrative. And so what does he mean by that? A narrative is the story that you're telling yourself, our position, that's how it is, that's our interpretation, and not to recognize an interpretation as an interpretation.

And this is total identification with mind forms. And then there are other mind forms, competing mind forms, that's the enemy. And so that's the need to be right, to assert your rightness, can be so strong as you don't need to kill the enemy to assert your rightness.

So could that be the same phenomenon as somebody on a retreat complaining internally about something? And related to that, the reactivity of the self, related to complaining, another characteristic of the self that is mind made, that is thought forms, identification with thought forms, is its need to react to something. It cannot be for very long without reactivity.

And this keeps you can also observe here, as you sit here or during the retreat, the sudden coming up of, and there can be a lot of momentum behind that. You could observe it perhaps in a conversation that you're having over lunch. Observe, so one of the, our practices here is to observe reactions that come.

Not to say they shouldn't be there, but to observe them. Not to make them into a personal problem and say I should be beyond those things by now. No, just observe.

Just bring a gentle acceptance because you cannot observe fully without acceptance. To observe any phenomenon fully in your life, you need to accept it. You can't observe it completely if you haven't accepted it.

So to bring a gentle acceptance to whatever arises here, during these days here, whatever arises inside yourself, even if it's a complainer. The complainer of course is the opposite of acceptance. Activity is the opposite of acceptance.

So now, but now we are saying something strange, that you can bring a gentle acceptance into what is in essence the opposite of acceptance. Almost a contradiction. But that is the arising of space consciousness.

In Buddhism they call it sometimes the witness, or the witnessing awareness. And so our practice then is internally to allow what arises as thinking, as reaction, as complaining, as an emotion, to be there as it is. So the primordial practice of our retreat is to bring quite simply acceptance to each moment.

Now each moment is not really the right term. To bring gentle acceptance to this moment. Because each moment seems to imply that there are many moments during this retreat.

But that's not the case. There are only many moments as thought forms that remember or project. But in reality your entire retreat consists of this moment.

It always is this moment. It always is the simplicity of this moment. Your retreat is not going to be many moments.

These are thought forms that say oh it's going to be a long retreat or whatever it says. But if you look at the reality of it it's this retreat for the rest of your life by the way is never more than this moment. It can't be.

That is the essence of our retreat is this moment. And when we meet this afternoon and this afternoon is only a thought form when we meet this afternoon of course we'll check in we'll check again and find out if it still is this moment. It probably will be.

And that is some it's such a fundamental truth of such importance that but to the mind it says well it tries to argue with it or say well I don't know if I agree with that. Let me think about that first. And this afternoon I'll show you that you are wrong and I'm right.

That is also liberating that realization that all your life because now really we're talking about this retreat but it is your whole life that your whole life is never more than this moment. Even when you remember the past it can only happen within the space of now. You can only remember it now or the you project the future it's a thought future cannot be more than a thought form because it cannot arrive as future.

Can't be here. Being and now are one. Life and now are one.

You and now are one. You in your essence who you are beyond thought forms the unconditioned essence you and now are one. And it's an amazing realization to suddenly see how simple life can be when you are no longer drawn continuously when your attention is no longer absorbed continuously by object consciousness which relies on past and future and you realize this is all there ever is.

It's always the space of this moment. Whatever form it comes into this space of this moment it's always this moment. Your life is always this moment.

This retreat consists only of this moment ever. And that's all really all that matters here. So we could say that these days here are a setting protected in some ways where we could call it let's call it a greenhouse where in a greenhouse plants grow protected from bad weather.

Well you may not be protected from bad weather here but this is a somewhat protected environment a retreat setting and you can practice living in a state of alignment with what is now and realize the power that is concealed in the present moment and how simple and joyfully life can unfold when you live in inner alignment with what is now. And that yes to what is is the primordial practice and you bring it to external situations here things it is and in that acceptance you find a goodness a goodness you cannot find that lies concealed often behind the the surface appearance of things concealed behind the surface appearance of things lies a deeper benevolence one could almost say a goodness and that is experienced as what one might call inner peace no matter what the external situation is there is the realm of inner peace and inner peace is the realization that at the core of things there is an essential goodness even though the surface appearance of things may be good or bad at any in any situation the surface appearance of things may be destruction it happens the surface appearance of things may be death at this moment death is happening in nature all around it's the time of year when things die all the leaves falling off the surface is that bad? no in nature you can look at death and see how beautiful it is now in the human realm usually we call death bad and react we bring gentle acceptance to what is the mind might say yes but this obviously is bad yes but with the allowing the isness of this moment comes the realization of goodness even though on the surface it may not appear so even in the face of death that realization of goodness can be there because death is the ending of a form the leaves are forms of life the human body is a form the ending of a form is death and so the realization comes of that which is beyond form that realization can only come to you when you allow the form that this moment takes to be as it is I'm not saying you become passive you're no longer capable of action no it's an inner accepting of this is what is then action intelligent action if it's necessary arises out of that it's the basic the ground the basic realization is the isness and then action is no longer reactive when you do not allow the isness of this moment action is reaction it is not intelligent it is conditioned it is perhaps intelligent in a relative or limited sense but not in a true sense it is not intelligent it is conditioned action it is reaction and that is the meaning of eastern term karma because karma translated means action karma is reaction action reaction which is a continuous cycle that keeps you trapped in the same conditioned existence you reenact continuously so it's only through first of all realizing this is all there is this moment is life itself this moment is as it is because the totality has brought it about whatever event is happening at this moment is connected to the totality of the cosmos nothing is separate there are no separate events and even the physicists these days will agree with that they have seen the interconnectedness of all things buddhists have seen it also even 2500 years ago they saw it and so it is as it is you allow it to be you see the inevitability of is you can't really argue with is is and then that becomes the basis that inner alignment becomes the basis for action if action should be needed very often action is not needed and a simple allowing is enough for a greater intelligence to come into play and you could sit there and things develop in the right way so to allow the form that this moment takes to be as it is instead of reacting to the form that this moment takes allowing this form to be takes you to what we could call the formless consciousness unconditioned not the object consciousness the reaction is the object consciousness so this is a strange almost a paradox people want to reach the whatever they call it ultimate reality the transcendent and usually they regard the forms that surround them in their daily existence as an obstacle to reaching the transcendent or reaching who I truly could be or who I somehow sense I could be the essence of who I am or could be somehow it seems that the universe is conspiring and my daily life and my existence seems to be conspiring to not to hold me back from that I'm surrounded by so many limiting and limited circumstances in my life that there seems to be some kind of conspiracy that wants to prevent me from fully being myself does that feel familiar?

why I want to break out of this this limiting life situation that I'm in and for some people it's their circumstances their living circumstances it's for some people it's their work situation for some people it's their physical body which is beginning to be limited can't move that fast anymore what is this?

I want to break out of this where to know myself fully as that which is beyond form and yet all the forms that are in my life are limiting me impinging upon me from all sides and when I free myself of one limiting form for a little moment and then then the next thing comes in and that's in the nature of object consciousness one thing after another and so that's and so people then live in continuous reactivity to now to a limited extent yes you can improve the forms around you to a limited extent this is true you could be living in a very unpleasant little noisy place dirty hole and then through incredible effort and energy ten years later five years later you finally made it and you live in a mansion this is nice and of course you will have created a different life circumstances you're in a different life situation now and then after a little while of feeling you've made it the new life situation will manifest as other limitations you will find other limitations on you through your perhaps you created a business empire that's why you could afford the mansion and then lots of things there impinge upon you the stock market becomes important a few people I've spoken to told me that they experienced recently they said the dark night of the soul I said what happened they said the stock market well don't know perhaps perhaps and so in your new situation you find other limitations that's and then you try to get free them so there comes a point when you realize yes to a limited extent it's good to you can play in the world of form but without expecting self realization or self enhancement through finally achieving a certain configuration of forms in my life that is absolutely perfect and right it can be for a little while and then you encounter again the other side that every form has inbuilt limitations once you know that the play of form is beautiful you can participate in it but to know yourself beyond form you cannot the world of form cannot help you and here comes the paradox that I pointed to earlier the paradox is allowing the form that this moment takes to be as it is but internally let's say you are living in an unpleasant place it's cold it's wet or damp or noisy or cramped or and there you are sitting on a chair it is the form that this moment takes and you realize the limitations of that form and yet you allow this moment to be as it is which does some people confuse that with accepting a story they are telling themselves in their head concerning this moment and that is a mistake that some people make I've noticed that when we speak of allowing this moment to be they confuse that with creating some interpretation of this moment which is a story and saying well I might as well accept that this is how it is an example of that would be let's say the stock market has crashed and your wife has left you synchronistic event and then the story comes in in your mind which says okay you've worked for nothing for 25 years all that you've built up is all the energy 80% of it you lost and your marriage has failed you failed at that also you failed at your business and you failed at your marriage there's no point in even carrying on now because at your age what can you do who would want you haven't got enough time to build up another business empire the story goes on in your head it's an interpretation of this moment I failed it's been pointless my life has come to nothing this is a simple story most stories are more complicated than that and that story is then this is not allowing this moment to this the story is not this moment the story is the story in your head so it's mind forms object consciousness so what is this moment what is the form of this moment the form of this moment is not the story about this moment it is the simple appearance of this moment which is chair walls window cold noisy neighbors unpleasant smell but even unpleasant is the beginning of a story so just see just this this is the moment this is now and you're sitting perhaps you still have a chair you're sitting on a chair and that's a strange thing when you just see what happens if I allow this moment without the story and then wow strange suddenly you have by allowing the form suddenly there's a peace that arises from a deeper place and you look around at the forms and it is that spacious presence that is there then when the forms are no longer obscuring that but you can only get to that when you allow the forms that which appeared to prevent you from finding yourself is actually becomes actually the doorway the forms that appeared to be the obstacle become the doorway if you allow the forms not the story the simple form of this moment to be some people have found that without any spiritual teaching simply by experiencing the limitations of their physical form some illness came some disability came to them and at first they had a long story about it their whole life it was their life story became very unhappy their story based identity became very unhappy story the me became very unhappy a lot of resistance to what's happening to why to me why did this happen to me and then after a while the pain just became too much and almost accidentally or by the grace of the divine which is the one consciousness there was a moment of simply staying with the simplicity of this moment pain and not even perhaps call it pain anymore weakness disability just allowing not bringing a no to it but simply a yes this is how it is right now and some people who don't know how much longer they have to live by the way nobody knows but some people in a to some people it's become clear that they don't know maybe because somebody told them you don't know we don't know how much longer you have and so some people can suddenly are reduced by circumstances you are reduced to this moment only this is what life has done to me is the last story the last the last line of your story is this is the sign of an ending story and the last sign of the story that's coming to an end is for example this is look this is what life has done to me all I'm left with is this moment I don't even have a future anymore it's life life is taken away even that from me me and so you didn't realize that you just wrote the last line of your story you don't have a future anymore so where is the story going nowhere you're reduced to this and some people through illness are reduced to just this moment and then oh and suddenly they wake up out of the story of me and absorption in the story and then they they look at you a light shining through their eyes the story has come to an end they may not have an explanation for what happened but just their life has become so simple so easy and if you ask them what happened to you you were unhappy yesterday and now and this isn't it's I don't know they may not be able to say anything about it so I've met a few people it's wonderful it's so beautiful to meet people without spiritual teaching or teacher it happened to them the illness became their teacher that's what's left is this which means what happened the story collapsed in the absence of future there wasn't much to keep it going anymore the story of me collapsed it doesn't mean that this person no longer remembers their past but they have no self-investment in their memories anymore so who are they they are the aliveness of this moment they are the presence the spaciousness of this moment they are consciousness itself looking through these eyes unproblematic and so that is beautiful when a story comes to an end not your memories self-investment in memories not even your reactive patterns they have a momentum they may go on for a while but even there self-investment and self-identification with the reactive patterns comes as simply the reaction is seen for what it is there is a spaciousness around it because you not only allow what is externally you allow what is internally emotions reactions thoughts come and go that's the form that this moment takes so demanding here to have a certain experience of enlightenment will stop you of course from having it because nothing is needed beyond the form that this moment takes it's that simple nothing is needed beyond the form that this moment takes not in essence to know yourself nothing is needed beyond this form as far as your form reality is concerned which is secondary things may be needed but not at this moment otherwise you wouldn't be sitting here so this is a gentle coming to an end of the story the story based identity and the patterns associated with it our practice then is simply gentle acceptance of the moment the form of it and then you go beyond form to a deeper goodness we will spend of course time also inside part of the retreat some of you may not want to speak at all during this retreat that's fine your mind of course will still be there the internal dialogue may still be there for those who don't want to speak there may be a few tables in the dining hall for those who don't want to engage in conversation i will announce certain periods during our retreat when we are going to keep noble silence not throughout the whole retreat some people say why can't we be silent throughout the whole retreat well you could it's good to not to learn to bring that spaciousness into interactions we may be addressing that also to bring the spaciousness into interactions with people questions also if there are any questions left in a couple of days you have a question wait a day or two if it's still there please ask unless it's something that you need to ask immediately concerning this retreat i'll be very happy to address questions during this week later on not yet today but answers may come also who knows you may find that quite a few questions subside as you go into the retreat the totality the totality of the situation here is the teaching the totality not just the words the silent spaces walking between here and your room not making this moment into a means to an end not making this step into a means to an end to the next step or getting there but just being with what is we'll also be talking about nature making that part of the teaching especially at this time of year when nature seems to be breathing up breathing out it's the out-breath of nature the fall it's called fall in American English I used to call it autumn but fall is more immediate because it's falling it's nature is breathing out out the cycle has come to an end death in a way and there's beauty hidden there spring is different manifestation everything is moving into new forms are manifesting thousands thousands of new forms manifesting and now the manifestations many of the manifestations of nature are coming to an end the forms go so it's the in-breath is spring of nature the out-breath is now and the out-breath is beautiful for going beyond form because it's when forms dissolve I will ring these bells the opening of our retreat a little bit late but it's fortunately it's still now one or two people sitting here maybe feeling unhappy for some reason if that is the case allow it let me be unhappy then it's not that bad that's a strange thing to do allow the unhappiness to be there okay unhappy unhappy you could look upon yourself as an actor and it happens to be that your part the part assigned to you at this moment is to play the part of an unhappy person play your part through this little allowing suddenly there's a little bit of space around your unhappiness just a little at first and then you allow more and then you notice considerable space around your unhappiness here's the unhappiness which is really it's the self the not of the self and there's space around it

bell an ancient device is the call to attention presence awakening out of identification with mind forms out of thought a person was studying with a Zen master and it was time to leave and go home and so he came to the master and said can you write something something in my book something that I can then remember remind myself of some something important about Zen it's already a sign of course that he didn't get it and so he gave him the book and the Zen master wrote something in it and he looked and he saw he had written attention in Japanese presumably just one little symbol probably shorter than our language just is that all he said surely can you say a little bit more please and he gave it back to the master and the master wrote something else and he looked and he said attention attention and he said oh come on surely there's more than that to Zen and he gave it back please just a little bit more and he got the book back attention attention attention what is this attention and he said well it's interesting but anyway what does attention mean anyway he asked the master what does it mean and the master said attention means attention with Zen stories you never know whether that's the end or not but that is the end now you notice this is an interesting story you can notice two things the mind's need for more say a bit more and then the need for further explanation what does attention mean he wants more explanation of what it and so that is why he doesn't get it because he's seeking the answer in the realm of thought still that's why he's asking really saying give me a little bit more to think about so that I can understand what Zen is through thought and of course the essence of Zen is knowing the dimension of consciousness that is beyond thought not that that is something that you can achieve or attain another obstacle is that belief but that dimension is already there that's the strength of the strange paradox in you so to speak ultimately within and without are one that dimension of consciousness is already there it is to a large extent obscured by thought by constant preoccupation with thought but without it thought couldn't even be there it is one could say the medium in which all thought forms are floating and it is there in between two thoughts that may be very brief in many people these gaps it is there in the first moment of perception it may be there when you wake up in the morning and the machinery of thinking hasn't started up yet the first moment of opening your eyes at that moment there is certain things already that are being perceived but there is also that beautiful field of still attention in which the perception takes place that is sensed as a kind of background peace the foreground is that which arises in the first instance sense perceptions then thoughts perhaps arise in it thoughts are rising here at this moment present but they haven't taken over so even though thoughts are happening that dimension that is beyond thought is as present or more present here than the thoughts and it is possible to live in such a way that you are conscious continually of this background field even when thoughts happen it does not depend on whether thoughts are there or not that frees you from excessive identification with and attachment to the forms of this life whether they be external forms that come into your life things people situations circumstances or thought forms it frees you attachment excessive identification with the thought forms and the emotional forms also there's the flux the continuous flux of phenomenal existence within and without ultimately it's all within the entire world one could say it takes place within you and it's all happening against this background one could compare it perhaps to water that's everywhere and all these things swimming in it and then the fish says where's the water I've been looking for it all my life and the water makes up the very essence of the fish it's not just around the fish though the fish too is mostly water just a little analogy this is something very obvious subtle yes but so natural could be potentially for a human being to live in connectedness with that dimension and not to sense that not to know that not knowing in a subject object relationship but to know it as the essence of I no longer I am that not to because that refers to some kind of form or name or identification just the essence of I am not to know that is really to be deprived of the most important thing of all which is a no thing the only thing that absolutely matters in one's life is to know that everything else may matter also but only relatively whether you are healthy or ill matters but only relatively whether you are in prison or in a beautiful home matters but only relatively if the prisoner in prison knows that dimension within then he is much better off than you are in the mansion and if the person in hospital bed knows that perhaps even sensing the approach of death and it may have come because there is the impending undoing of the physical form which for some people is one way of encountering that dimension it's a little bit late but it's fine and from there your whole life your whole past suddenly makes sense because it brought you to the flowering to that point the old past which otherwise perhaps is a some meaningless accumulation of events and in some people's lives even seemingly meaningless absurd events or a series of what looks like mistakes a series of things that shouldn't have happened to me were not really meant to happen but they happened people are trying to make sense of their life on the relative level but you can't whatever edifice you build up mentally something will come and you will no longer be able to make sense of it collectively it can happen when a collective disaster happens such as last year in September not far from here and suddenly people cannot make sense anymore the explanations fail let them fail it's good when the minds attempt to explain to form some philosophy on which I can base my life fails it looks like bad news to the mind but it's good and here it's also failing as we are sitting here I'm taking away from you well not really you are voluntarily letting go of identification with all that I am my name and my story and my thoughts and my emotions me so this sitting here is so easy if you are fully here and that's all that's needed for that dimension to emerge from within you and it's so subtle where is it it's there the moment even if you say where is it and instead of thinking where it is you so to speak listen to find it where is it listen really is an analogy for attention where is it and your attention is there as if you were listening that's it pure field of attention that's why Jesus used some of these parables of somebody waiting for somebody to arrive waiting not in the usual sense of waiting of impatience when is it going to happen but of alertness when is he or she going to come that kind of waiting it's the same state you might notice that is there when you look at something in the state of a tree a flower in the state of attention so no matter what happens in your life there are always two dimensions one could say in your life now most humans are lost in one dimension completely that's the dimension of the manifested world the world of form the world of phenomena the world of time of thought they're totally they don't know anything else and then there's the world the dimension not the world the dimension of the unmanifested the one life prior to form the one consciousness that underlies the all life no matter whether it's life on this planet or somewhere else on the in this galaxy or one other another galaxy of those billions of galaxies the one life prior to form the one consciousness one could almost say that which was there before the universe happened continues to be there even now scientists ask and puzzle over the question what was there before the big bang big bang is the they say is when it all started out of one point or out of nothingness came a whole universe and what was there before then and what was there before time started the mind stops so scientists maybe haven't quite realized that they come up these days physicists come up with koans zen questions that have no logical answer all you can do is the mind it comes to a stop and when the mind comes to a stop that's the answer that's the that is the stillness of the unmanifested and compared to the mind forms it is so subtle that at first you say well um uh and it's the most powerful the only the only power there is the only the essence of all life forms is that and it is that it's only when you know that within yourself as the deepest I am in its deepest sense a simple sense of presence or I am-ness that's left when you forget your name and when you forget your story what's left is the that which always was the essence of your story the one thing that gave you your sense of I so precious and that got mixed up with form with the story of me so your your sense of identity then you think it's in the story of me but really it it is hiding beyond the story it just gets mixed up with the forms the memories the thought forms because so the innermost essence of who you are even the story of you is true that innermost sense that there is something so precious here that and then because it gets mixed up with form people have this fear that they could lose that through death but that's the one thing that is not lost the essence it is consciousness itself so that's what's left when the form goes and some people need to experience death to find it death means a form dissolves and leaves another formless that's why death is sacred now the opening may not be there for very long it gets covered up quickly and that's why even there are sacred places where great humans who early flowerings of human consciousness as I call them who broke through to that dimension and the place where they died is considered sacred but any place where death happens is sacred because a form dissolved and the form that moment of death the formless shines through that opening and of course there is such a thing as psychological death which is when the identification with the psychological me disappears dissolves sometimes through intense suffering caused by identification with the psychological me it's a beautiful paradox nothing that happens is not right it may look mad but even within the madness the universe is unfolding as it should so the essence of your identity I am that's what's left when all identifications have gone presence beingness I have difficulty with names remembering names because they don't seem that important the being underneath the name that's a different matter that's why I got the name wrong this wonderful artist who does these flower arrangements here his name is Anthony and whenever I meet him there's no I don't meet a name there's simply a meeting on the level of essence on the level of consciousness that's why I didn't remember the name and so the world is then recognized as relatively important but it loses its overriding importance seriousness and heaviness and it's I feel there's so much compassion when I see people how they how important things are to them how what importance they give not only to physical things how much importance they give to situations and what happens or doesn't happen or a circumstance or how much power they place there in the world of form and it always they expect something from it that only the formless can give they expect to find themselves somewhere in there they expect happiness through the world of form it can give you happiness briefly and then it takes it away so you become dependent on what happens or doesn't happen and sometimes it's the littlest the tiniest things that make people unhappy and they I asked why are you unhappy well this this has just happened this what does it matter so it's the the impossible expectation that people place on the world it says fulfill me make me happy the world means places people situations circumstances circumstances doesn't matter all that means the world so they make these they have these expectations and demands and no place no person no situation no circumstance can meet those demands for long and this is why life is experienced by most humans as very frustrating almost designed by some some devious god to frustrate you and many people experience their life as it's designed to frustrate me continuously I've tried so hard and always something happens to frustrate me of course there is an impossible demand beyond being placed upon the phenomenal universe and that demand is not only make me happy because true happiness in the deepest sense is simply knowing yourself who you are beyond the forms true and lasting joy and happiness but they are looking for happiness through some imagined configuration of forms when my life when those forms in my life those circumstances people places are in the right configuration then it will be fine and it could even happen that for a brief moment they are in the right configuration you just moved to a beautiful new home you just fell in love and the stock market has just gone up and you are told the doctor says you are the most healthy you have the most healthy body I have ever seen everything is just right and then probably you would claim the ego would claim some merit or achievement it would say I did that and because the world of form all the forms look solid this is the illusion when you walk around especially in a city the solid structures man-made the solidity of every form looks so solid and that's an illusion we don't realize that the world of form is very much like vapor or mist physicists know that too they know there is nothing solid here even the most solid building can collapse in a moment the most the grandest edifice whether it be an office building or a temple can collapse at any moment sometimes they do so the apparent or solidity of form is an illusion to anybody who hasn't been to India I recommend at least going there once to experience that the physical universe the solidity of the physical universe is an illusion in India it's much easier to know that because things are not that solid in the physical realm things could go wrong at any moment and it's beautiful and that's maybe the reason why India has produced the greatest sages from the very first spiritual awakening of humanity happened there perhaps because the physical realm is less solid or the illusion is less the illusion of solidity is less there than here so because of the illusion of solidity that's you believe that there can be something permanent in the phenomenal realm but very quickly here too things shift change leave you or make you unhappy today it makes you happy tomorrow it makes you unhappy that beautiful position that you got the husband or wife makes you happy then makes you unhappy anybody who has been through more than one marriage and even those who are still in one marriage know that the person who makes you happy is also the person who makes you unhappy so the demands that people place upon the manifested world are impossible make me happy and when that the only way when that demand is dropped and sometimes this dropping this letting go of that demand can happen when the world has totally frustrated you totally so much has gone wrong so to speak which means not really wrong but against the expectations against what I wanted and needed that you let go of any further expectations not in a negative sense because if you let go of any further expectations in a negative sense that means then you are saying who cares I don't want to know anymore I'm done with the world you're not there's still a lot of attachment but a true letting go perhaps you even smile or laugh it's all crumbled once again and no further expectations are being placed upon the manifested and suddenly you sense this enormous peace what is that everything has gone wrong and yet there's this deep sense of rightness so that can happen in cases where people become totally frustrated it can also happen in a spirit of spiritual teaching to see when you are ready to see that readiness is there because the frustrations have already been there you wouldn't have come otherwise that's already been there and then suddenly you see the demands and part of the demands very essential part of this demand that is placed upon the phenomenal world is the demand that the future should make you happy because that is very the next moment the need for the next moment and it is a great act of letting go when the psychological need for the next moment is relinquished that's always an essential part of coming to an end of placing expectations because every expectation that you place upon the world to some extent implies future and so it's a wonderful thing that demands that are made upon places people or situations or circumstances are not there and then you are comfortable with places as they are because no matter what place you go to it could be ideal in your imagination when you actually get there something will be there that is not ideal any whatever place you go to and person and circumstance and that's the thing that frustrates you and that demand is not made anymore it could be a simple thing even demands you place upon people understand me he doesn't understand me my parents don't understand me my children don't understand me so is that so bad they understand what they can understand their stage of evolution they understand just enough for them to understand they are okay with not understanding you don't realize that nothing is added to you by having somebody understand you except a psychological thought form that you then say oh it's confirmation that I exist he's confirmed that I exist what is that existence that needs confirmation that you exist or confirmation of the world some people think they need fame fame is totally overrated there's nothing in it that's why some famous actors are interested in this teaching they realized how empty that thing is called fame if fame fulfilled them would they come to this teaching what for they're fulfilled by fame by recognition everybody recognizes how beautiful or great they are so isn't that fulfilling no you think it's fulfilling when you don't have it and when you have it it's fulfilling for a little moment and then it's no longer fulfilling and you see it's another way of finding this dimension one way is being totally frustrated and getting nothing another way is getting everything and being totally frustrated and some famous actors go to drugs they don't they try to deaden the frustration that they feel which ultimately is a form of pain they try to deaden it that way famous people many have been very unhappy committed suicide but some others see that so it doesn't really matter whether it's through achieving everything or achieving nothing you find the opposite for most of you it's kind of a mixture you've perhaps experienced success to some extent and failure to some extent and you've experienced success turning into its opposite so that is the realization that everything in this phenomenal world is fleeting the Buddha came up with that realization impermanent every thing that you encounter he said there are three characteristics of human existence everything is fleeting there's no self in it if you're seeking a self in any situation there's an enhanced sense of self this is why people make these demands make me happy make me feel fully who I am make me know myself fully because happiness is knowing yourself in the deepest level so when you say make me happy you're saying to the world help me to find myself enhance my deficient sense of self this feeling of not enough yet yet this feeling of lack not being fully myself yet please help me get there this person maybe if they understand me they'll add something to me maybe if the world recognizes my worth I can add that to me and that will do it some achievement and nothing works so it's a self-seeking this demand that is placed upon the world is ultimately a self-seeking in the world through the things of the world the forms the phenomenal and that's why it's frustrating there's no self in any of these things that the Buddha said anatta is the word in Pali uses the characteristic of all conditions is anatta no self and another characteristic there's three characteristics there's one is no self and that was a long time ago one of the first flowers of humans humanity saw that no self impermanence anicca and dukkha is that sounds negative at first but this is exactly what we've been talking about it means the third characteristic suffering it makes you suffer what that means dukkha suffering suffering is one translation another translation is misery another translation is unsatisfactoriness and there are other translations some are quite funny but they all point to that basic element that you find no matter what condition you encounter externally in this life you'll find that somewhere that's why it's so frustrating dukkha anicca anatta the three characteristics when you do not know who you are he didn't add that he just said that but then he pointed the way beyond also now when you know who you are and that's a strange way of putting it all that it means is knowing the realm that is beyond form beyond thought the stillness that is here now what the buddhist sometimes call emptiness which is fullness also but does not contain forms fullness and emptiness prior to forms it is that which Jesus points to when he says I want you to have life in its fullness sometimes translated as abundant life that's what his teaching also is pointing to obviously he's not talking about proliferation of things that was not part of the teaching because that is mistaken when you are only aware of things and not aware of awareness because that's what it is when you are only aware of things not aware of awareness self aware I am when you are not self aware then when somebody speaks of the fullness of life or abundant life all you can think of is more things and this is why the western civilization that kind of lost its way from the source but that's fine too it's all part of how it should be getting lost is good too that's why western civilization came up with shopping malls because all they can think of the fullness abundant life must be more and more things so let's create more and more shopping malls and fill them up with more and more things and this must be the kingdom of heaven that Jesus pointed to but all the people who are running around shopping malls feeling frustrated somehow they are perhaps beginning to see that that is not the fullness of life hmm you can by the way there's nothing wrong with shopping malls you can enjoy walking through shopping malls when you don't need them anymore but when many humans don't need them anymore then I don't know what will happen to them I sometimes enjoy for not too long walking through shopping malls and just looking at the world of form so many forms and then it's enough so that's why the fullness of life is not more of things but it does not refer to that dimension it refers to the dimension of depth that fullness that is there already within you for which you don't need future the fullness that is already the essence of your being now how could you need future to get there so these three characteristics that the

Buddha pointed to impermanence no self and misery that is true as long as you don't know the dimension of depth you don't know who you are beyond identification you don't know the I am before it becomes a story before it becomes a thought then yes then life is suffering and every situation if you go into you will find it there somewhere but when you know the unmanifested the I am then the expectations that are being placed upon the world people places situations circumstances are not there and the strange thing is that then when the expectation is not placed upon them people places circumstances and situations are quite pleasant you can actually quite enjoy them you enjoy places without the demand that they should be in a particular way you can ultimately it comes down to you can enjoy the neediness it's a beautiful play of form the neediness isn't there and it's only then that you can truly enjoy so it's not this teaching and the true spiritual teaching any true spiritual teaching is only one is not a rejection of that dimension of the world but it becomes accepted it becomes you embrace that in the vastness of who you are that world of form is playing itself out continuously fluctuating forms you can enjoy it and even amazing thing is you love it but you love not the form I love the flower I love

knowing your story or your name because what I love is the formless essence that I can sense only because I know it in myself I can sense it in you and sensing it in you sensing what is my essence in you is the realization that we are ultimately not separate and that also applies to any living thing and even all things are living but let's talk about nature it applies to the flower it applies to the tree the cat the dog I sense myself in them you could say God sometimes there is a term a Christian term which is beautiful loving the creator in the creature loving the creature is loving the form that really isn't loving it's attachment my form seeking to enhance itself through adding your form to my form and completing me somehow that's the illusion but loving the formless in the form is recognition of oneness and that is love and so that is how even what you experience as the world of form undergoes a change when you know the formless within yourself what you experience as the external universe takes on greater harmony your world your life takes on a more harmonious flow you are still for a while on this mad planet well the only mad thing about the planet is at the moment humanity but the planet is beautiful and humans are beautiful too it's just a temporary mental illness because they have come to the end of an evolutionary cycle and it's turned into some well the end of a cycle becomes dysfunctional because the new cycle is a deepening is happening the end of this evolutionary cycle yes looks like madness things are not working things are breaking down things are great that's supposed to happen and the madness increases as the mind identified state of consciousness based entirely upon thinking where humans derive their identity from thinking that is coming to an end and so that's beautiful and you don't even need to believe that most of the things I say here don't require belief because you can you know for yourself that is true if you don't believe if you believe that it's not happening that's fine too the only question is here is it happening here the shift and it is so yes you're still on this planet you witness dysfunction you can also still feel to some extent the pain of this planet sometimes you can still feel it it's no longer it's not personal matter anymore you may still encounter pain body collective pain body manifesting in you it's not your personal problem anymore it is recognized as human pain it is accepted for what it is gently compassionately you have compassion with your own emotional pain which isn't your own at all just looks like it it's human pain you have compassion with that you accept that also and so you realize that acceptance of all the openings into that dimension perhaps the most beautiful the one that works immediately without the need for any kind of time is acceptance that takes you to knowing the unmanifested within yourself acceptance of the manifested if it's pain that's what it is the spacious ness of the unmanifested is there as soon as you accept something fully and then it changes then this is why I'm saying when you live in connectedness with that state even the external changes yes it's still mad but things around you places and people around you unfold more harmoniously and it spreads your consciousness spreads out and affects the world around you which becomes a more harmonious place a place where love is there you see love suddenly because it comes from within you and then you see it reflected coming towards you from others and that's a little miracle when you don't need the world of things the phenomenal to be in a certain way suddenly it turns into a more harmonious place when the need is gone for it to fulfill you it becomes quite a pleasant place and even that which is not pleasant at first sight in this world you will be taken into situations sometimes that are manifestation of the dysfunctional mind identified consciousness and which perhaps contain a great amount of human pain pain body and your presence in those situations will be a decisive factor in bringing about a shift it could be your presence at work your presence in your family your presence wherever humans come together to meet even your presence where there's heavy conflict it may be some of you may be taken to a part of the world where the manifestation of human unconsciousness is particularly extreme and your consciousness there you cannot imagine how important one realized point of consciousness is in any situation one point of consciousness who is not who is no longer totally identified with forms and is no longer reactive to forms but comes from the gentleness the compassion the love that is there when you are there as the formless presence I am and there you sit or stand while conflict may be going on around you and you just watch you look upon it in the state of attention no strain in it relaxed alert attention whether it be a conflict situation that is there happening next to you or whether it be a conflict situation a challenge that affects you directly there is the ability to look I am using the word look here in a wider sense we already encountered looking how important it can be to look in the state of attention at a flower a tree or anything here I am using looking in a wider sense which is embracing it with your attention which is a field of stillness and there that is the current of awareness so to speak that flows through you onto the situation which may be involve a person or several people so there is that intelligence comes into play in that situation the unmanifested intelligence not reactive not analytical not trying to work out what can I do to change this situation or even trying to work out what can I do to help these people a greater help comes when you enter that consciousness and then suddenly perhaps words come or suddenly action arises not perhaps even from within you it may come from somebody out there you are the bringer of space so to speak space consciousness the spaciousness of presence so it is an enormous thing to realize what power there lies in pure attention pure looking beyond just visual looking even a blind person can look in that sense which is simply placing awareness embracing it one could say with awareness which implies allowing it to be as it is at this moment because it already is and that becomes the basis then for change so that's the most powerful thing in yourself is to discover that still power that never fights anything or anybody but embraces everything and everybody and yet is also the most powerful agent of change also transforms the outer so it becomes a more benign place less hell it approaches heaven a little bit more certain polarities will remain in the outer realm they keep the outer going hot cold high low but they are benign polarities they are to be enjoyed as the multiplicity of the phenomenal universe to be enjoyed the multiple forms so life can appear in so many forms so this is so simple and this is perhaps why it's remained a secret for so long take this consciousness anywhere and you immediately become a healer and again I'm using the word in a wider sense that whatever enters that field of spacious presence becomes transformed and if it is not ready to be transformed will remove itself it's not ready yet and that's fine too people will come to you now as this is arising from within you more strongly many of you will find and many of you are already finding that people come to you and they don't know why and they ask a question you might meet people seemingly accidentally maybe in an elevator or anywhere and something that you say or they ask there's something there they are seeking something from you something within them can sense something that there is something there they don't know what it is so people will be drawn to you and there's the temptation there's the possibility that your mind will re-enter the stage and say I've got to do something might say I've got to help this person how can I help this person that's a natural temptation to come when people come for help to try to figure out how to help and a far more effective help is available when you become comfortable with that state the simple state of presence in which it seems that you don't know anything there's simply a being there simply a listening an open field of attention the person may be speaking and there's an open field of attention that is a very fine energy vibration that is intelligence out of that intelligence whatever is needed comes through words realizations action insights sudden insights or simply sometimes the arising of peace in the other person and so that is the greatest transformative agent it's the frequency of awareness and so the mind then takes secondary place it steps back and it becomes the servant so to speak thought still operates sometimes when a realization comes it may need to be expressed in words so it becomes a thought and that thought becomes the words that's beautiful then the mind works beautifully it doesn't take over it may try again because it's been running the show for so long but then it subsides you have to because many of you live in have one foot in the new consciousness one foot in the old it can still happen that mind takes over it happens even to great spiritual teachers it can happen that mind comes back in identification with me as special comes back if for years if for ten years everybody tells me I'm special because they confuse the essence with the form if for ten years people tell me that I am special then maybe if I don't meet especially if I live in an ashram never meet anybody else who doesn't tell me I'm special eventually I am special I must be everybody's telling me enlightenment is nobody's possession or attainment it is simply there in the absence of the density of a mind identified sense of self in the absence of that density the condition the state of enlightenment is there it's always been there even before the sun just shines through now and the sun could become obscured again because it's nobody's possession nobody says I am in possession of the state of enlightenment now who are you?

it's in the absence of you that it's there the absence of the mind made you so the mind may come in and want to run the show again and then at some point you will notice it this may this state of consciousness it's important to when you talk to people even in situations that involve no that are not problematic casual conversation even there the mind can easily take over and you lose the spaciousness in any human interaction the decisive factor only real important question in any human interaction is is there space or is there complete or is the entire interaction dominated by object consciousness which means is the entire interaction dominated by the activity of thought and you can see how you get drawn into that it's the mind the mind stream taking over no space left it's full it's like living cramped in a room cramped full with things and then comes the next thing and then the next because when you're in a mind stream one thing leads to the next one thought leads to the next and there's no end and some people many people even when they are alone it happens to them and then they get exhausted after a while because it burns up so much energy that and then they look for somebody else to talk to and in any interaction so you can observe is there space or has space been lost now space can never really be lost but there's complete unawareness of space which means there's no awareness of awareness there's only awareness of things there's only awareness of thoughts but awareness has become the thought identification with thought awareness has been born into thought forms consciousness has taken birth and is taking birth continuously as thought forms a continuous stream like you know when some some life forms give birth in rapid some fishes that come out of when I was a child I had an aquarium and I could sometimes see a fish giving birth the fish would just come out of the mother fish this is the universe giving birth to form and this happens on the level of thought the consciousness the one consciousness giving birth to form is born into form one after another rebirth rebirth rebirth and you are in each rebirth there is me complete identification with the form the thought form that is rebirth that is you're condemned to be reborn it's not some abstract buddhist theory rebirth rebirth is a concrete thing happening at this moment into the next thought form and the next and the end of rebirth is not some abstract buddhist notion that says you need another two hundred incarnations approximately to come to the end of rebirth the end of rebirth is the possibility for that is here now not to be reborn into the next thought and then suddenly space is there a little bit of space around the thought watch people interacting or even better watch yourself interacting and see are you there as a thought form perhaps wedded to an emotion that goes with it particularly if you're trying to be right or reacting to something the person said or reacting to a place or situation and so how much space is there in you any? even that question can be helpful because that question is a little pointer the question of course is still a thought but it's pointing beyond itself how much space is there is there any space in me at this moment and when you ask that question you come to the end of thought because to know whether there's any space in you which is the space of awareness which is the space of no thought that very question is there any space in me at this moment that question in order to answer it you need to listen, watch and be alert and attentive to find out whether there's any space in you and that is the space that's why the question can take you there to answer it the space needs to be there is there any space in me this is a similar question to the question we asked yesterday is it still now now these are beautiful questions because to answer them you can't think to answer them there's no answer in thought if there's an answer in thought it's a mistake it's wrong if you give that answer to a Zen master he'll hit you so that's a beautiful little thing and in any interaction if you simply remember that question and then you will notice stopping for a moment because you have to find out and so you can learn to interact noticing the mind stream you will notice it more often when you're being dragged along in a mind stream and then you're out spaciousness is there and it's good if you can when you speak to people one can be aware that you've said what you had to say the statement has come to an end and then you can step back into spaciousness from there that's a beautiful thing to do you've said you've given your opinion what do you think of such and such

well

[Speaker 1] (2:50:51 - 2:50:56)

what do you think of political situation

[Speaker 7] (2:50:56 - 2:50:56)

well

I think it's like this like that I think he's right I think he's wrong I think he's great I think he's mad there's the mental position and you've said it and then you step back into spaciousness okay you've said what you had to say you can still have mental positions your sense of self is in the space not in the mental position and then if he says I disagree with you totally he's not mad he's doing the right thing there's that's another viewpoint you can still defend yours you can say I still think you're wrong because this and this and this without the self defending itself and then you're already creating an enemy there the person who's disagreeing with you becomes your enemy because he's attacking your sense of self that is madness it's very normal and it's mad so you can play around with mental positions you don't need to give them up you may have favorite positions I'm a republican I'm a democrat why not?

or whatever it's fine and your position maybe is more right than somebody else's who knows it may well be history will show that either he's mad or he's doing the right thing so not to become trapped in in mind forms because you are part of the madness even if you say that he's mad and you get mad because somebody else disagrees with your viewpoint you're part of the madness anybody in whom space consciousness is not arising is really part of the problem and then you see certain things of course from space consciousness insights are there you can see quite deeply into things and there's compassion in the seeing even if you see somebody's doing a mad thing there's compassion in there in that and again compassion is not weak compassion is an aspect of the unconditioned it arises out of that I suggest between now and the next afternoon meeting we keep noble silence perhaps even beyond we'll see between now and this afternoon a space of silence in which you are alone with your mind and be compassionate with your mind accept it be aware of all the many little things as you walk walking around and aware of the field in which this is arising which is you this is what we've been waiting for you often hear of the term renunciation in spiritual contexts and the question arises what do I need to renounce do we need to renounce the world and traditionally in all spiritual traditions renunciation in one way or another has been practiced renunciation of food reducing it to a minimum renunciation of sexuality renunciation of possessions personal relationships in most of these cases what the most fundamental renunciation has been forgotten and that is why in most of these cases renunciation hasn't quite worked and that's the most fundamental renunciation once that's been renounced the rest doesn't matter and that's to renounce time and more specifically future because all those who have renounced other things use their renunciation as a means towards an end a future state to be achieved an enhanced version of myself hoping that through different ways of renouncing I can get to that to renounce the future is really the only true renunciation and that is to renounce the next moment what does that mean? to recognize this moment as the central core of your life this moment not to make it inferior to a projected future moment in your mind simply by giving full attention to this moment and always realize the how fundamental this is you automatically renounce investment in future seeking something in or through future that's a continuous beautiful practice at first then it's a way of being of living always a continuous return until you dwell in the now you can still deal with future as part of your practical life making appointments plans for timetable when it's needed without losing yourself in mental projections I could plan where I'm traveling next year now I have to so look at the calendar it's still the present moment if I project myself mentally to the next event in a year's time then either some desire or fear will arise some desire that that event is finally going to make it make me I'm finally through it going to achieve an enhanced me or fear arises if we meet again next year and I project myself to that I might be fearful say will I have anything more to say when we meet again what am I going to say to them then what I've said it all and then they'll be dissatisfied they will go go home and so the practice is simply to return to the simplicity of now and always stepping out of mind and the conceptualized story and identity that wants all your attention that includes simple things when you're traveling home from here which you're not at this moment not projecting yourself into the situation that you're going to encounter at home but be there in the car or the plane this moment don't miss this can be very beautiful too when you when your attention is there the simplicity of this moment you deal with it your problematic situation whose situation is not problematic when you get to it and the problematic situation is not that problematic when you deal with it whatever challenge there may be in this moment when you get there then you look look look attention what is it that this moment requires then action comes or no action Zen has even been defined once by a master as doing one thing at a time another beautiful the famous story of Zen when the disciple comes to the master and says a disciple of somebody some other master no how does it go no the disciple goes to the master and says they met somebody else another master they said who can walk on water so they asked him what can you do that or can you do things like that or what can you do and then of course the master comes up with a famous Zen and it's now become a famous Zen saying when I'm hungry I eat when I'm tired I sleep and one other related Zen saying is when you stand just stand when you sit just sit and above all don't wobble don't move it's an amazing thing to do something completely just this honoring this truly honoring it is honoring life this whatever this whatever form this may take and it's a we'll come to questions in a minute I'll stop in a minute questions if there are any left so it's a stepping out of the conceptualized universe in the head with its past and future into this stepping out of that abstraction making yourself into a mental abstraction making your life into a mental abstraction and carrying what ultimately is a burden a great burden of mental abstraction never that never feels it has completed itself it always feels something important is missing in this abstraction of me but what is it how can I find that missing piece in that abstract abstract version of me you don't know when you're identified with it you don't know it's an abstract version of me you think it's me it is me how can I find that which completes me and then you look and this is the search everybody search on a material level or whatever level search for me through something or other and on that level completion is never reached it always feels incomplete the me the conceptual me sometimes you think it's complete now and then something falls out of it again a big chunk that held it all together falls out life does that and again it feels incomplete not to be absorbed in that abstraction that conceptualized self and the only way to leave it is to enter now that breaks the continuity between past and future the continuity if it's not broken the future will be very similar to the past slightly different forms but basically the same old thing even the future of mankind would not change technology yes changes superficial changes but basically the same warfare conflict I don't unless a shift happens here so the razor's edge of now that's where you walk and then you feel the pull of past and future which is a mental pull which is the pull of thought because past and future you can only encounter through thought not as an actuality ever so you feel the pull of past and future which is the pull of thought wanting all your attention again conceptualized self that lives in and through past and future you feel and sometimes you wobble or more than that you get lost in it again and then you notice it return to the now this becomes then a new way to live to walk on this razor's edge the whole world becomes transformed through that and even the complexity of your life situation loses its harshness becomes softer loses its overriding importance that's the sense that this matters so much to me how this event turns out whether i get this or not anything it matters so much the heaviness and seriousness of things so serious if there's nothing else that entire identity is in that then it becomes life is such a serious business and with the now comes the space and with that comes a lightness and a point then comes when nothing is ever that serious even death is never is no longer that serious and it's only then that you can truly care for the things of this world including other human beings that quality that we call care can only be there when there is presence is awareness now awareness it is inseparable from care whatever your attention shines upon always that that attention that is awareness that current of awareness contains that element of care loving care one could say that flows to whatever attention moves to it it might be a human being it might be a situation and that is care it is not care care has another meaning in the English language the cares of the world there's a care can be a heaviness too but this is loving care love care even for the world of objects when you relate because when you speak of relationships and think exclusively of relationships as relationships to other human being but equally important as relationships to nature very important for human humanity how humanity relates to nature if humanity does not find a right relationship to nature it's the end of humanity so to find a right relationship to nature and even a right relationship to the world of things to have a relationship to an object that you pick up and if there's an attention there there's a certain care if there's no attention all objects in your life are means to an end nature becomes a means to an end and you just begin to destroy it you don't see it you don't know what you're doing then because all you see is a means to an end what can this do for me how much is this forest worth what can we do with it its future using it and then you don't see the forest as it is which is a sacred space because you're not in touch with that dimension within yourself the space within how can you see the sacred space in the forest all you see is a commodity through the mind it becomes you are trapped in object consciousness so you bring that to the forest and all you see in the forest is the object in the forest three trunks you measure them and then you know how much it's worth so truly the destruction of nature that humans are engaged in truly the words of Jesus apply forgive them for they know not what they do they truly don't know what they do the space isn't there to know it and that's why that transformation of consciousness where you realize the essence of consciousness and the essence of yourself to be space why that is so vital otherwise no change true change is possible I'll start with one or two questions that people have given me on a piece of paper and then we'll go on and ask questions here if there should be any whether there'll be answers I don't know maybe and I love Ramana Maharshi the Indian teacher who very often would not give answers to questions so person came asked a question perhaps had prepared it for a long time and this is a very important question and asked the question and he just sat there it's like the question falling into a void and sometimes the the ego of the questioner didn't like that and felt offended is my question not important enough to merit an answer but at other times it happened that space arose in the questioner sitting in that spaciousness that came through him and then the question disappeared in it or spontaneous answer arose in the questioner's mind out of the space

usually I didn't know it was that simple I have been diagnosed with a so-called incurable though not fatal virus how can I improve my health without using the modalities as a means to an end thank you this may be an important question for a few quite a few of you disease fatal or non-fatal those are just perhaps concepts or beliefs attached to conditions it's very easy for a so-called disease to immediately become another concept in the mind especially a so-called serious disease can very easily become a concept in your mind and becomes incorporated into your sense of who you are you are someone this is happens very easily you can also if you have observed humans you may have observed that some humans for some humans who have had a disease for a long time their disease becomes almost the central part of their sense of self I know once overheard a conversation in a bus a woman talking to her friend there was pride in her voice when she talked about the important doctor who was going to perform the operation for the third time on her the next day or the day after there was that sense in that egoic sense of self that is always looking for more to enhance itself it can easily happen that it uses a condition such as an illness in order to gain more attention in order to gain a deeper sense of self because this sense of self is always deficient so then I am a such and such sufferer and when I speak of surrender which means acceptance of what is I'm not speaking of acceptance of an illness or acceptance of yourself as someone who has an illness that would be strengthening the mind made sense of self and strengthening the concept of illness acceptance applies only to this moment not to some situation in your life only this and whatever may manifest at this moment as an illness could be part disability or discomfort or weakness and this condition of this moment is as it is at this moment and that is what you bring acceptance to what you and with that space arises when there is acute pain that is not easy acute pain seems to fill up the entire space of your being but what else can you do except allow it to be there because it is there and it has happened in quite a few cases that pain burned up the conceptualized structures of your mind pain burned up the ego became a fire in which the egoic sense of self became consumed and for a few people this is what happens there may also be disability in movement or you may have an illness that you simply know you are ill but there may not even be any particularly serious symptoms you just know that there is that whatever it is the question is important not to make it into a means to an end which is the practice of accepting the isness of now in whatever form not in order to achieve something in order to get better but then it's not complete acceptance but surrender to this let the illness force you into the present moment that is a beautiful thing then the illness becomes the teacher it forces you into and particularly if it is a fatal illness so called it may not be and of course in a wider sense each one of us has a fatal illness of course it's called mortality an extremely dangerous virus and it's just a question of time before it hits and even knowing the fact of the mortality of your physical could be of the same purpose if you could remember it every day as they did in medieval times some people they had a skull on their desk to remind them of mortality so whenever you sit there you look at that but an illness or in Buddhist countries they Buddhist monks in certain Buddhist countries regularly visit the morgue so they are let in and then they sit where the dead bodies are and they sit there for a few hours that forces you into the now that's an amazing thing don't try to do it here they'll think there's something very wrong with you the illness allow whatever the condition is to force you into the now the illness becomes unhappiness the illness becomes an unhappy self when you leave the now then it really then it becomes a me who is ill who has an illness who is an ill person and particularly if you've been told by the doctor that you only have a limited amount of time to live whatever he may have said one year six months this is perhaps the worst thing that in the normal state of consciousness that could happen to anybody you go to the doctor and you say I'm sorry maybe six to twelve months he's basically telling you that there's no future for you you have no more future if this doesn't force you into the now well and it's happened I've met people who are in that condition and it's an enormous accelerated transformation has been happening inside them they are on an accelerated course of realization because ultimately none of us has that much time left it doesn't it seems it may seem still you might think oh well thirty years I haven't probably twenty years forty years maybe I even have fifty years left it seems a long time but time is a strange thing it's very fleeting and before you know it you're faced with very little left was that it?

I've been waiting for it to start and now it's come to an end being forced into now by some condition an illness can do that if used rightly and the amazing thing is that healing is much more likely to happen in that state of surrender to now acceptance because there is an energy field there that is very healing that is space so there was a well known doctor who wrote a big book on healing and the modalities of healing and he came to the conclusion by in research and talking to people that in most cases where healing happened it happened when there was acceptance and miraculous healings have happened but this is not why you accept and this is why the question is important if you're hoping for healing you're not yet totally here because in a deeper sense when there is complete alignment with the suchness of this moment you're healed already in the deepest sense so it could be an illness that forces you into the now it could be some other unpleasant condition such as being in a prison cell that forces you into the now any condition that in the normal state of consciousness would lead to a very miserable sense of self any such condition can force you into that it could even be somebody close to you going through extreme suffering such as illness or somebody very close to you being in prison being condemned for a crime being some form of madness somebody very close to you and perhaps that person very close to you is not yet capable of surrender and is in extreme suffering and then you could easily you could be drawn into suffering yourself and again here again you can allow such a situation of suffering in your immediate vicinity so to speak that is happening to somebody who is very close to you and he or she cannot yet see the possibility of acceptance so you do it for them and that also often produces miracles but that's a byproduct you surrender for them if they cannot surrender whether it be your child or grown up child who is involved in some madness whether it be your parent or your partner somebody close to you having a serious illness why can't they they can't they are not perhaps ready yet you surrender give them space let that force you into the now because if you leave the now you suffer the moment you leave the now it becomes very painful it becomes conceptual painful conceptual reality I spoke to a couple last year whose son has been condemned for a serious crime that is great suffering he may not yet be able to surrender but you can surrender for him my friend Satyam Nadin who was in prison for a few years reports reports after having spent quite a long period in the worst prison in the United States probably overcrowded overheated violent you never even knew whether you would reach the next day because people even got killed in there very miserable life situation especially after having had wealth and luxuries and there you are in hell and he was miserable his whole life had collapsed his child taken away the threat of being put away in an orphanage he didn't know whether it would happen or not his possessions taken away and there he is in hell in Florida a little window no air conditioning ghetto blasters playing loud heavy metal day and night this takes you to the limit the limit of suffering this is one way and suddenly a point came when there was a letting go of resistance because resistance was futile you can resist the pain becomes unbearable the pain that is resistance that is a non-acceptance and finally this is as it is it just is just this and what collapsed were the conceptual structures of the self just this and suddenly there was peace in the midst of hell in the midst of all that uncertainty what's going to happen to me and what is happening to me it happened just like that by being taken to the limit so what is called can sometimes be called a limit situation if you should encounter a limit situation if you're not yet totally in present moment awareness now then that will just give you the final push life knows what you need and if you should not need that you'll probably get it you may not need it anymore because we're doing it here it's only those you need it who get it life is not absurd it only looks like that on the surface let's see if there are any other questions but before we do I just mention certain questions are more helpful than others and those are questions concerning yourself perhaps someone close to you your situation less helpful questions are questions that are mental or abstract such as what was the Buddha's incarnation on the planet Mars or I need to know this or questions such as your teaching does not conform to the standards of Advaita Vedanta school of philosophy and the discrepancies are as follows you say there is a doer but Advaita says there is no doer I need to know

I work as a career counselor I have difficulty reconciling the need to meet one's inner purpose and the need to motivate people to meet their outer purpose using their unique talents their skills so for me there is maybe a conflict or the reconciling is difficult for me to grasp yes

[Speaker 1] (3:40:45 - 3:40:55)

uniting the inner purpose with the outer purpose do you feel that has happened in your life the inner and outer

[Speaker 2] (3:40:55 - 3:41:00)

up to now I've been more concerned with the outer purpose

but I presume you are bringing consciousness presence awareness when you work with people when you counsel them

I really care about them reaching harmony with who they are and what they do

yes thank you let's see what answer emerges whatever you do in life it's not so much a question of what you do but what let's see to put it in the most simple terms it's not so much a question of what you do but how you do what you do so to guide people into finding out what it is that they need to do not putting the focus in your case because you guide them you counsel them not putting the focus on the what what is it that I can do for this person what is it that this person is supposed to do what am I supposed to say really not to put the focus on what kind of help am I supposed to give this person but to put the primary focus on your own state of consciousness as you sit with another human being so not to question the what but to make sure that the primary condition is met and that is in the presence of another person you are in the state of presence out of that state and this is why this is important having come to our retreat here because that's the only teaching here to embody the state of presence when you are sitting with another person is primary anything else that comes is secondary and anything else that comes any advice realizations insights or any knowing or knowledge that comes will come out of that state what to say how to help or enabling that person to find the answers for him or herself which is even better than answers coming from you enabling that person to go within and find what it is that would be right for them that is your task there and to be able to fulfill that task I cannot tell you it would be futile for me to tell you what to say to this person because that to be alive and truly an expression of the one intelligence needs to come out of the space of that moment what it is and if you bring that space and you have been learning it here very often you will notice a shift and a spaciousness arising in the person that you are sitting with so that is primary then out of that the realization the insight may come what it is that they need to do what is right for them it may come from you too it may come as a guiding question that you suddenly find yourself asking so you explore but it is not you don't you no longer have the structure of meeting these people will become less and less important to you so you may if you have a list of things that you ask you may use them less or spontaneous questions may arise from within you that are not on your list of questions that you usually ask that person because they are right for that moment so it is beautiful to help a person find what is right for them to do but more important than that is to help a person find their more essential being and your presence is part of that so bring that go into and this applies not just to you there are many people here who are working with other humans doing some kind of counseling this may be a little frightening at first but the most powerful help you can give is to dwell to allow yourself to dwell in the state of not knowing while you sit with someone and then allow the more vital knowing to come out of that either through you or the other person or even as some external factor and this is not easy it's a shift it's like jumping off a cliff you get to the edge and because you go into the region of not knowing anymore there's an instinctive withdrawing from that anybody who has gone into speaking to a group of people with prepared scripts knows how frightening it would be if you suddenly lost your script and what are you going to say and it's happened sometimes to people who know of one case a man who was supposed to give a talk and he was in a hurry in his hotel room and he got a folder and when he opened it up and he arrived it was something total it wasn't his speech at all and there were all these people waiting and he had to say I'm sorry I haven't got my script here and so there was a moment of panic and he was and suddenly he gave the best speech he had ever given subsequently he didn't use scripts anymore so not to have another word is an agenda even as it's me and this is because you're in a helping profession it's not easy to step out of the mental concept of me I have to help this person somehow I have to be of help to do something to help this person see how powerful it is to go into that state of not knowing and be comfortable with that with not knowing that is just amazing just sitting there first you listen the other person is speaking then some questions may come so allow it to arise out of that then you will be doing more than career counseling then career counseling will be the excuse for your spiritual work and that by the way applies to any job you do as you bring consciousness to it whatever external activity you may become be engaged in is no longer the overriding concern the overriding concern is the state of consciousness that you bring to it that the activity becomes secondary and is a kind of it's dressed up in that form it's only the form so there's the form of your activity and there's the essence of your activity and so it could happen that the form is not very conducive to embodying essence that's rare you might be working in a noisy discotheque and you there may be an easier way to embody presence but if you can't get out of it maybe they've shut you in there it was the case in the prison then you do it there you may be working in some slaughtering animals probably you would remove yourself but in most cases the external form is secondary when the transformation of consciousness happened as it is happening in you now the form may remain the external form of your activity or it may change if it remains this added dimension will flow into it and it will become secondary if the form has been unsatisfying if you thought I'm only a waiter I'm only this or I'm only that then suddenly presence will flow into what you do and you're no longer only that it's only an excuse and very often change then comes by itself it's beautiful

you spoke earlier about living without relying on thought and gave us a couple of examples remaining seated until we find ourselves standing up and then we would know it was time to stand up or being in an oppressive organization and without going through a decision making process awakening one morning and realizing this is it I wonder about the place of planning a course of activities designed to produce some set of forms in the future particularly when they require coordinating the activities of many people making a movie for example I think I understand the seductiveness of thinking that making that movie will in some way enhance the self my career has been helping organizations to create visions and goals and plans to bring certain configurations of form into being and you mentioned well okay in the course of daily events you need to plan appointments and such but if our future is to live without reliance on thought how do we coordinate activities designed to move into the future without relying on thought or am I leading people in the wrong direction thank you thank you

using thought but not relying on thought that is the way one can live using thought for certain activities many activities thought will come in at some point even here the words would not come out of this mouth if they were not thought then becoming speech so even here thought plays a role as a function that which is being spoken comes out of presence so thought is linked to that dimension so for example you mentioned film making and that kind of thing involves people who coordinate that kind of thing it involves hundreds of people things that need to be dealt with spoken to coordinated and you might think you need a lot of thought for that for many of these things if you watch any master let's even a master filmmaker you may find that as they are engaged fully engaged in their work a large part of that what they do is a spontaneous arising a director for example a good director who watches is in that he may not be in the rest of his life or her life but in that field of his activity if he is a master or she is a master that director is in that state of alertness when engaged in giving instructions telling people what to do how does he know what is right the master doesn't know it thought plays a tiny part in that the master knows what is right and then gives it then it becomes words speech and then he will say it it arises anybody who has achieved mastery in any field if you observe how they work you will see that a large part of their work does not come from thought and all the creative element is not thought the rest may involve thought so those things that do involve that is maybe an aspect that is non creative perhaps when the director gets home to his office there is some paperwork to deal with he may need to dictate a letter but even there where does it is amazing when you live in that inner state of alignment it is not that thought doesn't operate anymore you use it even that isn't right you don't use it I don't use thought there is no planning you might have noticed here and each time I come here yesterday for example as I was coming here I thought it's questions today that's good because I have nothing more to say and then words came and there were no questions it's not so much that thought doesn't operate anymore but thought becomes the servant of something deeper you don't lose yourself in that because if you lose yourself in that let's say in film making for example then you become a director who people fear who perhaps a lot of the time is angry and because things are not going the way they should and or a director who is trying to figure out what the best way is to how to what can I do now that's the difference between a master and somebody who is just doing his or her job and so it's a new way to live get to it's more sensing and feeling how that works rather than trying to understand what function thought is going to have planning isn't part that everybody needs to do and there's no reason why you should lose yourself in thought or future by doing any planning you simply give attention to this to the calendar the drawing board the computer screen what it is what is it that this requires

when I stood up I think I was ready to argue in favor of that we need to rely on the thought form of our schedules at least and I've realized as you were speaking that one of the things that I may be able to do with the people the organizations with whom I work is to help them have a different relationship to those schedules

that's right yes the schedules are mind forms that's right it's a it's just a wonderful way you cannot learn it the other way around it's always strange when people come and observe those who have mastery in their area and then try to observe the externals what they do and then try to make it into a system so you approach it from that end and that is not quite it although sometimes if you go through the right movements that can also get you there for example I'm nobody knows this but I sense that this is true this is what I sense you're all familiar with Tai Chi things like that Qi Gong Tai Chi for example which is slow movement beautiful practice to do it well you need to be present with every movement no movement is a means to an end you're not trying to get to this place because you're at this place and you're moving completely at each place no not one second is a means to an end otherwise you're not good at it and how did that happen how did anybody ever come up with that I'm sure it happened because someone who lived in that state spontaneously began to move and perform a very slow dance as a joyful expression external expression of that state and then somebody came and said what's he doing and then people gathered around him it feels so good to just watch this and after a little while somebody clever came with a piece of paper and said now he's lifting his left arm now the right leg is going up and then he began to teach it wasn't quite but fortunately in the case of tai chi because that movement forces you back into that state so to some extent it can still work then they did it to psychotherapists there were three effective psychotherapists who were so good like everybody all the patients were cured or whatever they wanted to call it and finally somebody came and said how do they work let's observe how they work now their eyes go up this way now they are in the same body posture as the patient and if they asked the therapist they didn't know they were doing it it just happened because there was so much alignment with the person that sometimes when the patient sat like this the therapist would go like but it was spontaneous spontaneous becoming one and then it became a system it loses something of course but even that can be helpful it's no longer it doesn't arise out of the core of being but even that can be helpful but let's really go to the core and see where the core of mastery lies and that you can live not just in the performance of your professional activities but live in that state when you're going about relatively insignificant doing relatively so called insignificant things in your life traveling from here to there not doing anything in particular interaction with other humans be there so it's a beautiful challenge to bring that presence into whatever situation you're in and then see that yes thought is still there and yet it has lost its overriding its primary position a deeper intelligence is informing thought and then it operates and then you don't one characteristic of any action that's being performed is that you're not reducing it to something inferior to where you want to get and that is what the Bhagavad Gita calls but really it is when whatever you do is not a means to an end but your attention is fully in the doing that is karma yoga consecrated action you could call it not inferior to some thought of future achievement and then that's thank you and that's mastery okay yes do we have another microphone okay so we can shift one side then that side and then that side

my turn okay

[Speaker 3] (4:05:00 - 4:06:53)

hello my question is about children um my son who's 13 is here with me this week because an exception was made to allow him to come and uh we went through a lot of suffering and um I was listening to your tapes in the car and one day my son said don't take that out mom I need that that pain body thing makes sense to me and that was his beginning of a journey into embracing this work and he's watched a lot of videos he's been to some support groups um where he's the only kid and he's now helping me run a presence group and so far he's the only kid but I would love to know what your thoughts are I guess your knowing is about how we can bring this and offer it to children um because I see in him what a beautiful um really special group for children um maybe some of the teenage kids whose parents have come to the adult presence group and I've talked with a number of other people here at meals and in the informal gatherings about groups and I noticed some other people had an interest but I haven't yet met anyone who's led a group for kids particularly except to use it in you know they're working with kids in whatever way they work with kids if they do whether it's athletics or teaching

[Speaker 1] (4:06:53 - 4:15:09)

good thank you well perhaps this gathering is the beginning of a few groups like that starting and maybe you have planted the seed for that here but I do know that more and more people who work with children are bringing this into their work school teachers people who work with younger children some psychotherapists who work with children are bringing it in a few people are working on books written for children to embody their teaching and quite a few children I hear from people are exposed to the tapes a lot of the time and some of them have gone through a shift because the tapes whatever the teaching is so simple that of course children can understand it sometimes better than adults and I've had reports of children who've gone through an enormous shift simply have been exposed to that whenever they are driving their mother is driving they have to listen to this tape I know of one mother who her child she had to listen to it all the time and then for the first time she got a video and so her child said oh mum is that power of now the movie so it is the answer to your question is already in this room it doesn't need to come it's already in a few people in this room the answer to your question is already in you it will emerge what it is that you need to do perhaps even one child of course but comes into contact with other children and a child who already experiences that transformation will affect other children naturally whether or not in your case there's going to be a more formal structure where you meet with children or children meet your son meets with children the answer doesn't come from me but will come from you and it'll come as an insight into what it is and this is a beautiful thing when what is right will come as an answer from within you some people are writing books I've already seen one or two books that seem to embody some aspect of the teachings such as pain body a book I saw that was written in French and somebody sent me the Italian translation of it was a book of drawings that shows a little child getting home and experiencing a pain body attack it's not called pain body it's all pictorial the pain body is seen as a monster in his belly and then that monster comes out of his mouth and he's shouting and screaming and going to his room and there's this big monster energy looks menacing but yet also benign at the same time filling his whole room and going berserk in his room throwing everything and finally the monster subsides so it's a child reads that and recognizes something in him or herself that is there as a pictorial symbol and by recognizing it finding a space between that and the other space is already there through seeing it out there so many of you especially those who work with children or who have children you're already doing it if there's teachers some teachers already when they tell me what the beautiful things that happen in the classrooms as they bring that in and how children respond and ask relevant questions how children become there's one child who has been forced to listen to the tape through her mother who's become her teacher who's been saying the most amazing wise things and that dimension in many children is not yet as hidden obscured by mind stuff as it is in some adults so they respond more quickly so it is enough that you embody that and that is spreading to your children to your child and from there it will spread further go within and see if there is any more that you can do not you as a limited personal self but how that can come through you through whatever means writing organizing this or that but don't make it into a mental thing that thinks I need to do something ask the question and this is the beauty of true answers ask the question and then become still is there more is there anything else I can do let the question the question becomes like a pebble that you drop into a still lake the question then disappears in the stillness and then don't pursue that anymore just become still few days later ask the question again whether there is more to do become still and suddenly you know what to do and this is again it's arriving at decisions that are no longer decisions no longer relying also on some external answer this is really I'm not answering your question in concrete terms because the answer the true answer of what it is right for you to do will come from within you and it will unfold from there but don't forget it's unfolding already so it's simply a further unfolding of what's happening and when it's so grateful for what's happened and is happening already when you see it you cannot not be grateful for what the change that is already happening has already happened and out of that state of gratefulness it grows more that's the beauty of it

thank you thank you

[Speaker 1] (4:15:14 - 4:15:18)

I don't know whose town it is now

[Speaker 2] (4:15:20 - 4:15:21)

I've been

waiting for many many months

to get here and ask something about it actually my original question has changed since I've been here but it still relates to the same thing which is this pain body which reminds me of the suffering that Gurdjieff talked about what happened that was a change is I've got a band sort of around my chest it seems that when there's any kind of release there's massive anger grief fear stuff like that that's held in place by some sort of strange band I've been to doctors this year they said there's nothing wrong with me my lungs are fine one of them said he thought it was emotional anyway yesterday as I was trying to climb up the hill that black dog that had been in here yesterday I couldn't breathe it was like I will never make it up and it was raining and I thought what am I going to do the black dog passed me he looked at me I looked at him and the second I noticed him I was surprised to see him there was no problem

laughter applause

[Speaker 2] (4:16:29 - 4:16:50)

and then I realized there was no problem so the problem came back laughter and actually my question at this point is if I physically try to push through this with exercise do you think I can maybe make some headway so that I can breathe again or laughter

do the exercise only if you truly enjoy it but not as a means to an end if you truly enjoy the exercise it's beautiful and it may do something but the enjoyment is that which makes it effective not an exercise because you think you should be doing it for some reason if without the enjoyment why do the exercise then that there is something this is mainly at now because there is presence in you this is on a feeling level semi-physical as far as I can see what you feel is physical emotional somehow where these two meet it could be an emotion it could be purely physical but you feel it very much here it's no longer so much associated with that there's a danger that the mind will make it and you've given really the the key already yourself the danger is the mind will make it into a problem of mine and try to solve it as a problem and then it becomes a dilemma I need to get rid of this and it could take years or it may never happen if that is the case so it is here this is the when the dog was teaching you the dog taught because that's how dogs live to be completely with what is so for that for a moment you were completely with the suchness of that including that and that was a freeing it was liberating to see that there is no problem don't give it the heaviness that the mind will endow it with and make it into something that needs to be solved say yes to it it is appearing here at this moment make friends with it whatever comes into the space of now make friends with it because it is that is the most powerful healer because it is obviously an energy field there so it is life it has a particular form that form may have something to do with certain mind forms from your past so it has a the form is temporary life is eternal it has a particular vibrational frequency which is part of its form and that is something to do with certain thought forms partly personal but ultimately all collective from the human collective mind that created it and there's not really it's not a personal fault of yours at all that became created it's a temporary form and it's alive and it is as it is at this moment so the key to transformation to make friends with this moment what form it takes doesn't matter say yes to it allow it be with it oh that was the dog's teaching I'm just translating it into words and that that was the same dog we were coming in the golf cart that was running after us and I had a brief encounter with him too we looked at each other briefly it was beautiful beautiful moment and I knew that he knew we may have to carry on with questions if you can remember those of you who are waiting to ask if you can remember to come up this afternoon as the first people who come up it is now the clock the hands of this clock are pointing to the number twelve let's enjoy this beautiful day and this beautiful moment we may have more questions this afternoon in a little while not all questions perhaps can be asked or answered but you may have noticed from some of the questions that were asked earlier that very often concealed in the question the answer is already there the questioner really has already found the answer and just wants confirmation that that's right so often the answer is already hiding in the question you know it already you may not believe that you know it somehow i found a piece of paper in my pocket contains a question so we can start with that i'm just starting to follow the shambhala tibetan buddhist path do you think this is the right path it seems to have a lot of form but i'm drawn to the essential practice of kindness and enlightened society are all buddhist paths helpful daily practice in the formal sense if so how should i choose the tradition i will practice thank you well you've already chosen this one or it has chosen you for the time being the question of form is an interesting one in these very old traditions the form maybe quite heavy there's a lot of form that's what the questioner says forms of practice things to study perhaps so the form what about it if you practice one of those traditions at least with buddhism the formless essence usually still shines through in many cases but yes the form is heavy and the form could be a help or a hindrance three years ago we had a retreat in a buddhist place i arrived a day early and some of the people staying there buddhist practitioners were talking amongst themselves and i was listening and one person said he had that day just completed one thousand prostrations where the head goes to the floor he had a backache but he felt good about it as he carried on talking i realized that in his case the form had become a hindrance because his belief was that he was accumulating some kind of merit improving his karma spiritual body building and this is a good example of the form becoming a hindrance he was getting bigger through the practice he felt superior to somebody else who hadn't managed those prostrations that I had to give up you could do those thousand prostrations also in a different way because prostration is a beautiful thing it is an act of surrender a symbolic almost one could say act of surrender so there could be that surrender there could be the letting go in each prostration instead of the accumulating through each prostration so there's the question then is not so much the form but how the form is used if you surrender maybe you don't need a thousand there's the story of a Sufi master Sufis are also very unconventional people sometimes Sufis to Islam is like Zen to Buddhism original Zen is breaking traditions and so the Sufi master everybody was prostrating themselves at the time of prayer and the Sufi master was just standing or sitting there and everybody was shocked and they asked him why don't you prostrate yourself he said I prostrated myself a long time ago and I never got up when you're in touch with the essence with the space within then the form you may use it you may not use it with these old traditions a lot depends often on who is the teacher whether the teacher is identified with the form mainly or whether the teacher has gone beyond form the teacher who only knows form can only teach you form the ability to know is there in you now to recognize whether this is just form or whether the essence is shining through in any formal practice that applies to other things too to other kinds of form you could go into a book shop spiritual book shop and pick up a book and open it read a few lines and you will know whether those words were written from presence space the deepest that that unconditioned consciousness or whether the words come from an intelligent knowledgeable mind able to rearrange accumulated information in a very readable format in that case the book may still convey useful information it will lack the power to transform which only those books have that came from that place and so as you develop that inner ability to recognize the essence you can save a lot of money by not having to buy books uselessly just save twenty dollars it's sometimes people find it strange they read a book that seems to don't quite have that ability to tell whether a book is spiritually empowered that's really what it is and so some books are so very intelligently written and the person who wrote them understands very well certain things between traditions and practices people with wonderful intellectual understanding and sometimes I've been told people when they finally go to a talk by that author that impressed them they are not impressed anymore because there's so much mind or even a prepared script so also when you go to a tradition go to the listen to the teacher who is teaching within that tradition listen from that deeper place and you'll know whether it's right for you or not well let's have some more questions if those people who were already standing before we finished could start please don't be disappointed if you don't get to ask your question it's not that important important but not that important maybe we could start on that side and then we go on to the middle and then to that side I was told that's the best thing to do at the beginning of the book you wrote of the unfolding of the divine purpose of the universe and then near the end I did read the middle as soon as I found out I just wanted to find out who'd done it and then I went back to the middle near the end especially in the writing about possible mass destruction you wrote about universal laws and then this morning you used the phrase life knows what you need so what I wondered is what do these words mean in the moment to moment living and this tiptoes in the direction of course of determinism and free will so I'd be interested in your comment

oh yes could you just repeat the last statement which I didn't hear for me these three questions tiptoe in the direction of the discussion of determinism and free will

oh yes yes yes thank you thank you determinism and free will of course are both concepts and they are both true and untrue they are simply different perspectives and different ways at looking at reality the mind doesn't like that it says this cannot be either one or the other must be true they are simply two different viewpoints it's a bit similar to is it a wave movement or is it a particle it depends how you look at it so on a practical level on a mental level the mind would like to know whether everything is predetermined or whether there is free choice on a practical level there is this moment the form that this moment takes and that and that applies both within and without this moment the form it takes may be a thought the form that this moment takes may be an emotion an external event may be the form that this moment takes may be an emotion the form that this takes an emotion the form moment takes may be an emotion that this moment takes may be an emotion that you can choose and you are meant to feel that that is part of the the way in which the universe is organized the sense that you are able to make a choice at this moment you can say I'm going to lift my right hand I can choose either to lift it or not lift it and I'm choosing to lift it you can say this is a clear demonstration that I have choice and yet where did that initial thought come from why did suddenly the words or the thoughts appear in my mind that I can lift my right hand where did that come from so you need to see whatever it is that arises at this moment always couldn't be otherwise and that includes your ability to choose in reality when you think you are choosing and it's good that you feel that you are choosing that is how the universe operates on the deepest level there is no you who is choosing anything because you are not separate from the totality there is only the appearance of separation because you have this temporary physical form but you are continuously connected to everything else you are continuously connected to the sun to the earth to the air everything is flowing in and out of you on a subatomic level and it's mostly floating space what appears to be a solid person connected to everything else the very heat in your body is the sun and all kinds of influences coming together in one there is one temporary focal point where all these things meet temporarily the totality meets in this focal point and that focal point of consciousness for a little while thinks that's me a person so it's just it's a focal point in the vastness of the whole there's a little flash of light where many things come together in this beautiful and then it transforms itself again into something else but for a while it is a person from one perspective and that person is meant to be a person at that moment and meant to be deluded otherwise that person wouldn't be deluded it is that also is part of the totality and it is good for that person to believe I have choice in reality the totality is acting through me even when I say I'm going to raise my right arm who is deciding it's everything maybe the sun is part of that decision that is the heat in my body and intelligence too and maybe the sun is deciding is taking part in that decision that this arm is going to go up and innumerable other factors and perhaps as this arm is going up synchronistically and simultaneously in other parts of the universe other things are going up and on other dimensions who knows so of course there is no no separate entity with a separate will ultimately and yet there is humans operate in such a way and the sense that I can choose is part of this form the very sense is form identity that I can choose and that is fine this is why I say the most important and the only true choice is you can choose presence that's the fundamental choice but who is choosing that moment of realization I can choose to be present right now is the emergence of presence here through this opening and when as presence emerges at this moment I this so called entity believes it's choosing something and that's good it's even helpful to see that yes I can choose if presence were not arising you couldn't say that you can only say it because it's already arising so there comes the appearance of choice and that is good you see of course you can see beyond it and can see that ultimately it is not up to me because nothing ultimately is up to me because I'm not a separate entity I'm just a temporary expression of the one I am the totality so where does that leave us it leaves us with choosing presence the one true choice which ultimately is not a choice but it's a good it's a perspective to say it's a choice you can see and then as presence operates in your life it begins to inform your actions it inspires your thoughts it comes as even as an energy emanation then you realize more and more this isn't me it's not there's something greater than me which is yet is me I in its deepest sense is doing it and it's happening the happening and me doing become one as presence takes over your life and then the question doesn't really arise anymore is there free will or not the happening and the doing merge into one and so things unfold spontaneously words come spontaneously without a prior intention they just come who is giving these talks me the person the form that walks in here with the limited human mind with its limited little accumulated knowledge most of which it has forgotten no the it simply happens it's a phenomenon that simply happens consciousness you can say the totality is speaking through the form the form hasn't got that much to do with it it's the job of the form and especially the form identity the me to make room for that to get out of the way or one could say to be transparent enough so that that can shine through and then you realise I'm not doing it Jesus used the expression I'm not speaking the father is doing it the father pointed to the same thing totality the one consciousness I'm not doing anything he always emphasised I'm not doing anything I'm not speaking it's not me and so it's it's beautiful when that comes into your life and you realise that you are being lived by that greater consciousness instead of struggling to make a living struggling to survive even to survive psychologically as an entity to survive in your sense of self that's the real struggle to survive not financial the struggle to survive as a self entity of me against all the other selves that are impinging upon me want something from me or want to take something away from me want to diminish me and I want to be more as that self so as presence arises then it gets easier you can actually take a backseat one could almost say you as the formal you the temporary form that consciousness has taken becomes an open opening and so that's it's a beautiful way to live and so your what is determined and your choice become one there's no longer a split of my free will and what is determined by the totality they merge into one they are one and how does that happen get to practical inner alignment with this moment then you're aligned with the totality inner alignment with the totality may not look significant or may not look that great and yet there comes a yes that's all that's required that's the essence of this teaching then you become powerful but not as a separate entity intelligent whether you're educated or not no longer matters that much so that's the question on determinism and free will

[Speaker 1] (4:52:41 - 4:52:42)

thank you

this is somewhat related to that last question there's a great emphasis in the new age movement to create the life that you love to get your heart's desire and techniques such as creative visualization and affirmation are taught and taught and taught and I'm wondering how if at all these methods and this type of thinking is working with the new consciousness okay

thank you thank you yes thought of course is quite powerful it creates a reality seemingly external reality out there and so humans have discovered and that's a wonderful thing that the habitual thought patterns their conditioned thought patterns and what they experience as their reality or their life are related thought patterns that includes also of course the more deep seated reactive patterns and it includes the emotional conditioning that can't be separated so humans have discovered and it's a great discovery that the inner and outer are connected and many people here discovered at some point perhaps that their thought processes were they discovered many negative denying things in their thought processes my thought processes were extremely negative for many years i didn't know it because i was those thought processes completely immersed in them at some point the realization can come that you are thinking certain thoughts and you suddenly see the thoughts the patterns especially old thoughts that you think frequently you suddenly realize that these thoughts are happening inside you that already is the emergence of something that is beyond thought if only from in the background then you can change thoughts once you can have observed that you are having certain thoughts you can change thoughts and many of you have done that and as your thoughts change very often reality changes also thoughts about yourself thoughts about others who i am so you can improve to some extent your world how you relate to yourself this is the stage of affirmations when you wherever you walk around in your home you there is an affirmation sticking somewhere

are a beautiful radiant being the bathroom and it's good to some extent it works it improves that conceptual sense of self it feels better little bit better much better sometimes and then you find you can even create certain situations improve them and when you finally get there you often find that once you have achieved your desired place or state or possession or position for a little while it's great and then it's that's not quite it either and even within it certain contradictions emerge it has a good side and a downside to it and so you find that you're beginning to encounter the limitations of rearranging your thought processes I met some people who got extremely good at rearranging their reality they got exactly what they wanted and then exactly what they wanted and made them happy and then made them unhappy and then they had to get out of it and so the emphasis in this teaching is not on that but it's on going deeper where there's no conceptual reality at all where you no longer have a relationship with yourself because a relationship with yourself is a relationship with a concept of me and that's a strange thing that even it is even possible to have a relationship with oneself talk to the black dog about ask him or her whether he has a relationship with himself he won't know what you're talking about that's the beauty of animals they are themselves completely themselves no role no problematic relationship and no need for affirmations they they don't carry the burden of a conceptual self so you break through that what emerges is a state of we go beyond the state of thinking but many of you have been have already been through also that state of re-arranging thinking and it's been good that was already the even the fact that you were able to see your thought processes means already what is the essence of this was already arising in the background so it was already the arising of this but you didn't quite see it clearly yet it was just in the background and so you were able to see what your mind was doing to some extent so what happens when people do their affirmations visualizations in order to create their external reality in many cases who is doing the practice is still the mind made self wanting through some improved situation to enhance itself to feel better about itself to feel more recognized to feel more prosperous more of something or other more more more of me so then that was the motivation so if you look closely often the motivation for doing these things is that you want to get reached there and once you get there because you are not yet fully able to enter the now that place or that attainment does not quite live up to its expectations now is there a role is there a function for that kind of thing created by your own reality in this new consciousness that emerges it is possible that you wake up one morning and you have a vision of what it is that wants to be done and that vision is joyful and it feels as if it were happening already it's not there's not the feeling that I need to get to that place to achieve greater self fulfillment I had a vision early on of a book I saw it in a dream that had my name on it and then many years passed before it became reality visions came can come in this is what I have to do this is what I have to do oh yes and that may imply who knows that this is what I have to do where does it come from it's a realization of what presence wants to do through you that's all very often it doesn't come in quite that way it comes in a way that an external thing comes seemingly an external thing comes into your life that asks you to do something and more often than not it is a response to something that arises within the totality in your life an external thing a person a situation an event comes into your life you respond out of that you respond to whatever it is so the need for visualizing is greatly reduced it may come in almost as a vision of something that is in the process of unfolding is not yet manifested but you already see it that can happen but not so much as a goal that I need to achieve or go towards you realize in that vision if it comes it may not come it is not an essential aspect of it that on some level that is already here but mostly and this is the way I live it is simply responding to something that comes to you and then that becomes then the play of inner and outer and the strange thing is it is in that state of consciousness those things that are needed for the unfolding not for your self achievement but that which is part of the unfolding of consciousness comes into your life sometimes from within there is a realization of this is what I have to do that can happen this is what I have to do beyond decision making doubt doesn't come in when it is that clear this is what I have to do and you don't know how you arrived at that realization how do you know that this is what I have to do I know I just know and you may not know why I woke up one morning in England when I was living there knowing I have to move to the west coast of North America didn't know why but it was so strong there was no arguing with it so I got ready to move and I moved and arrived still not knowing why people said you're mad well they'd said it before you're going into the completely unknown what's there for you nothing why are you going there I have to go I have to go after a few weeks sitting around on the west coast the book started to happen I looked at my old notes I had writing had happened before in England but very different writing happened then different energy field to it a stream of energy and then I had to leave the west coast went back to England writing stopped little while few months later went back to the west coast then only at that point did I realize why I had to move for some reason it couldn't have happened in England the energy field there didn't pull the book out of here so it's obeying the impulse and going with it when it's beyond question that this is how it is to be so sometimes it comes from within that happens more often there is the outer coming in as you dwell in that state that which is needed comes as an external thing which to which you then respond and then who knows where that leads it's the trust that is the beautiful thing that comes with living in that way so it would be relatively rare that you have a vision of some concrete cause of action it's possible I know of one or two people who had that who had woke up one morning with a vision of something that was already there consciousness can use all kinds of ways and means and channels so it's not a question of what I want for myself as a separate entity but how I can be an openness for what the universe wants so there comes a point when positive thinking is it's been a stage on your journey a good one and then you step beyond that also and even the affirmations eventually they may come down take them off the wall little pointers because you may fluctuate from being drawn back into the little me and it is sometimes may be helpful to have little pointers here and there to point you back they may be thoughts they may for a little while still be an affirmation here and there from wherever of course in miracles whatever it may be a little affirmation a little sign a little sign post that occasionally as you enter the bedroom in a state of and suddenly you see the affirmation it could help wake you up okay is there any other question

[Speaker 6] (5:11:35 - 5:11:55)

well first of all I wasn't sure if this afternoon after your comments this morning if I was going to be speaking to you or to the black dog I wasn't sure whether to ask my question or wag my tail since it's you I'll ask the question maybe wag my tail later

understanding of how we nourish the pain body through negative thoughts or so called negative thoughts anger bitterness resentment hatred of one kind or another for things that are in our life or that we don't want in some way or another what I want to know is if we also nourish the pain body through thoughts of longing or desire for that which we want to bring into our life

oh thank you good question thank you this is true there are such thoughts that express longing or desire for whatever it may be that I believe would fulfill me they don't look on the surface like negative thoughts they might look quite nice but if you look on the other side of that thought for example say I want to be rich or wealthy that longing for freedom because there's a belief that this will give me freedom I mean to be wealthy in itself is nothing but what I believe would that that would give me is it would give me freedom and it would give me make me more give me more other people's recognition I can do anything go anywhere by anything totally free and other people will regard me highly so that enhance myself so when the statement is made wealthy I like that or whatever it may be I want the ideal partner I want the I that place what is implied with these longing thoughts I am even the thought even if you say I am wealthy which is a an affirmation that would work better than I want to be wealthy a thought any thought has a polarity to it and so there's also underlying this there is the statement that I am poor because if you were truly wealthy would you be saying I'm wealthy you know you're wealthy whoever I don't know who is wealthy these days Donald Trump maybe he's wealthy again if he is in his penthouse in New York he does probably does not have an affirmation on the mirror that says I am wealthy he doesn't need it he knows so every thought really anything I want to attain this or that is already a statement that you lack it and that yes there is pain in that in that wanting in any kind of wanting there is some pain and often considerable pain because wanting implies lacking wanting is the desire desire what in ancient traditions in spiritual terms they call desire the Buddha talked about it desire is the one thing to get rid of so but what is desire a better word is wanting desire sounds a little bit too abstract wanting gives you a clearer sense of what it is and the power that very often is behind that I want which can lead to action but action that always has that the neediness and the negative polarity that is behind wanting that flows into any action that is that I want it and so many people are involved in long years of daydreaming or this kind of longing that you describe there is pain in that also and it is a subtle way not such an obvious way in which emotional pain is also being created through your thought processes as you state correctly not directly but indirectly and that is moderate food for the pain body it's because there is that not enough me a sense of dissatisfaction and there are emotions that go with that neediness certain sometimes half expressed thoughts as me having been treated unfairly and wanting and needing this to complete me so watch you can as more presence arises you can watch what happens in your mind and the thought processes are there and see how the pain body can be very clever in trying to get if it's deprived of food here it will try to get its food through something else pain bodies are looking out and they are the media feeds pain bodies a lot of the films feed the pain bodies that's why they are made and the pain bodies when you become very conscious so the pain body cannot use your thought processes anymore and you don't feed it other things what people consume when they watch a lot of the TV things you see or films violence that the pain body loves this film will make you feel really bad that's what basically it says when you read the advertisement for the film it will make you feel very bad indeed you will witness the most horrible things on that screen and then people run and go pay their money and if all else fails the pain body may create certain pains in your body physical pain

because it can no longer use your mind so suddenly you get sharp pains here or there and you don't know why what is this and it can happen people have told me this when you place your attention on it it can shift to another part of the body because pain bodies don't like to be looked at and so the pain body then hopes that you will react to the pain and the pain could create emotion again it could create thought processes again of unhappiness and then great it's feeding again so this is a good question there are subtle ways in which the pain body can feed even on thoughts that on the surface do not immediately appear to be negative but have that negative dimension built into them a painful me needing and wanting something that's not as powerful food for the pain body as an anger attack but that works too so alertness required alert to watch another way in which pain bodies try to get at you can be through somebody else around you because pain bodies are connected once I had a beautiful session when I was still seeing people privately with somebody who came with an extremely heavy pain body and was sitting there and who was sitting there wasn't there was a pain body sitting there emanating that frequency that pain bodies emanate that a sensitive person can feel even after they've left the room a sensitive person comes into the room and says what's happening here it leaves that behind but we had such a beautiful session that in that session presence arose in that person even while the pain body was still there there was a sudden recognition of pain body as the pain body and in that the pain body withdrew subsided or lost some of its energy field wow there was the clear seeing that that was not him and there was a beautiful session he left almost in a state of astonishment because all his life that was him that was his most essential characteristic everybody knew him as that kind of person everybody knew him as the pain body that was him and that was he left I sat there for a while I felt hungry I went out around the corner to an Indian restaurant I sat at a table and at a table in front of me there was sitting the heaviest pain body I've ever seen and he was shouting and fuming he wasn't going to pay for his food he was in a wheelchair a wheelchair can be for some people has been the greatest transformation to be not to be able to move freely anymore has taken some people into presence has forced some people I've met some people in wheelchairs who became free through their teacher their disability they became free and then he stormed off in his wheelchair out of the restaurant and two minutes later he came back in and he had an electric thing the waitress tried to push him out again there was a huge drama and he pushed his electric wheelchair into forward and he pinned the wheelchair did you do all that it's interesting that the pain body came the moment after the pain body seemed to have suffered almost such a defeat to be exposed as the pain body and then it came back again in another form and said I'm still here it's very interesting how that works in the end I simply sat there as an observing presence in that restaurant in the end a huge policeman came in quite old perhaps nearing he had seen it all and there came the thing that comes when people he in his own way there was presence in him at least in when he exercised his duties he must have been reasonable 40 years or something and he came in he just looked at him he looked at the manager I said has he paid his bill he mentioned no it's okay I don't want it and he just the policeman just a few words quiet words came out of his mouth and the mouth the man became very quiet and left the policeman said goodbye he won't come back beautiful to see in some people in whom presence may not yet operate in the totality of their lives he had achieved mastery and presence in his function as a policeman wonderful to see but the example I gave to see that sometimes pain bodies can come externally to challenge you again through some external form by the way be very careful when you feel pain body is active in you then you actually draw to yourself other pain bodies they will then directly attack you directly go for you because they recognize an active pain body you could go into a shop a store buy something and suddenly the storekeeper attacks you with says what did I do you came as a pain body and his pain body recognized you so the likelihood of an accident happening or getting into some kind of drama is greater when you walk around the city with an active pain body let alone not to mention your place of work where some people at work in some corporations some people have pain bodies that are almost permanently active and very rarely dormant happens beautiful practice pain body practice beautiful teacher and teaching that also becomes an opening becomes a doorway so thank you for that question that was one subtle aspect of pain body nobody had asked that before and it's true perhaps one or two more questions I don't know do we go back to that side now there's some kind of structure here for me

if you want to make this one brief so they can you can answer theirs that's fine I think you touched on this earlier when you talked about that fish tank where the guppies were coming out the little fish were being rebirthed and it brought me back to this question I've had for a while if all thoughts and emotions end with the dissolution of the body then what part of our individualized consciousness goes on afterward and where does it go before it comes back as one of those little guppies in God's fish tank

[Speaker 1] (5:30:32 - 5:47:20)

you may have heard the Zen story the disciple comes to the master and says master what happens to us after death the master says how should I know this is not the end the disciple says well you are the master aren't you the master says maybe but I'm not the dead one the question let's see if this question can be answered without leaving the now what part of our individuality survives if anything that survives whatever survives here after this rebirth after this is the essence that's I'm exaggerating a little because I'm sure a few other things also survive the retreat but what we are going to is what is it that causes you to feel and to know that you are how what is that I am what is the strange thing the one that was the philosopher Descartes who wanted to find out is there anything that I can know without any doubt whatsoever is there anything because he came after the middle ages when people had all kinds of weird ideas and superstitions and weird beliefs it was also an age of spirituality but it was also an age of strange mind structures and then he came and said what is there anything I can know and he thought and thought and thought and finally realized that he was always thinking and then he came up with that idea that I think therefore I am of course that was not true because he hadn't gone deep enough he hadn't realized that the sense of beingness of being you that's innermost sense of identity goes far beyond thinking it has in fact nothing to do with thinking except that it gets mixed up with thinking that at this very moment the question if I ask you who are you or you ask yourself who am I this is a spiritual practice who and then listen within to the you listen for that deepest sense of I of beingness not your memories you could forget them all or your name a deepest just a sense of your own beingness it's hiding underneath all the mind structures it is not it has no form to it and that is who you are that is the I am that is why Jesus said before Abraham was I am there's no past in it I am I am that's the formless being everything else is form you could have a hallucination you could have a dream people often ask is that real or is it not real any whatever phenomenon arises some people even ask they say the world doesn't seem that real to me anymore is it real or is it not real or you have a vision nobody else sees it so they call it a hallucination and you say is that real whatever it is any dream any vision any sense perception there must be something real in it the essence must otherwise it would not be for anything to be it must have an essence of realness nothing can be without an essence of realness the form may be very temporary so even a hallucination requires consciousness in which the hallucination happens the consciousness is the essence it's a temporary form it comes and goes consciousness is that essence of who you are unconditioned that remains here when the when you realize the forms to be insubstantial that is your innermost nature the mind then says yeah but what about me that means the feeling of identity has again been bound up with mind structures what about that me that those are temporary formations I don't want to give any really to utter anything here that goes beyond what can be immediately known because that is all you need what can be immediately known what you can know for yourself and this is the essence of all knowing is that how wonderful to realize that I am not that little limited entity that I thought I was that is recognized as a temporary formation in that wonderful play of forms almost one could say a seed a potential flower for the flowering of consciousness if consciousness flowers when consciousness knows itself realizes itself the universe is becoming self aware now there is no end to the questions that the mind can now ask no end the mind can now ask why why isn't the universe self aware already why can't they start off with can't it start off with self awareness then we don't have to go through all this how long is it all going to take what's the purpose of it all how will it end and what then after that it is the mind what I have said is the absolute limit I rarely go that far where I say the universe is in the process of becoming self aware which is also not the absolute truth it would be absurd to expect to understand the vastness through a few sounds coming out of somebody's mouth how many sounds are there not many and how many letters are there in the alphabet not that many a few symbols and then you put them together in different order you rearrange the symbols or the sounds in different orders okay let's try this one or let's try this and now this is the explanation of the universe of course Woody Allen put it even better you can't even find your way around Chinatown it's the limits of understanding and not even attempting to understand through conceptual thought what forever eludes conceptual thought which is tiny tiny but in the in going within and as space consciousness arises there is somehow a deep knowing in that which cannot be put into words for example there is a deep knowing that life is eternal that life has no opposite that I am eternal and even that is almost going too far even to make that statement because there is no concepts there are no concepts or thoughts in that knowing it is a place of simple nowhere it comes stopped and so it's important understanding on an intellectual conceptual level is not an important part of the evolution of consciousness the course in miracles puts it very similarly it says I don't know if it's a literal quote but it's very close it may be almost insulting to you when you are told that your understanding is not a powerful contribution to the truth and one of the things you relinquish in that great act of surrender of letting go is the desire to understand and that's a you can still try to understand how to get from here to there on that level okay but the desire to understand the great scheme of things there comes a point then and the point is now where you see I don't know and that comes into your everyday life also as an end of the need to continuously interpret the universe around you you don't need to interpret every event and every person habitually the mind does that why not let it be as it is that person that event and respond to it if needed out of that space of space of letting it be the need to figure it out let's have one more question and if there may be other questions arising in the collective mind of this room all questions every question is relatively important but no question is absolutely important if you haven't if you don't get the essence by now no further question will get you there so let's have another question

thank you last year a very dear friend of mine who had a tremendous intellect and was full of much compassion committed suicide that is why I'm here today so in one sense it was a tremendous gift to me and my husband on the other hand it's been very painful now I believe in chapter 7 as you discuss portals into the unmanifested you alluded to death as possibly a portal is that true with suicide as well

thank you thank you I may have mentioned before that the egoic sense of self has built by the grace of the divine has built into itself a self-destruct mechanism so the suffering that the egoic self creates for itself is also that which usually over time erodes and sometimes suddenly destroys it the suffering that it creates is also the agent that erodes the egoic self beautiful and so in the case of suicide the only personal experience I have of suicide is having come very close to it to the just the edge so I know the state the inner state that leads to suicide which is simultaneously where the seemingly opposite functions of the egoic self meet and those opposite functions are creating suffering and needing to triumph in my separate sense of selfhood so on the one hand suicide is the ultimate triumph of the ego in its battle against the universe and it says I will show you this ultimate way of being right is that on the one hand I know that retrospectively from my inner state when I looked back on it that took me to the edge of suicide and you look deep into it it is the ego on the one hand wanting to triumph and prove myself right in the last act of it's like somebody you know people who are in disagreement with a group and they get up shout something and before anybody else can say something they walk out and this is a relatively mild way of the ego triumphing this is my absolute position of rightness and before anybody can say anything you leave to question whether you're right or not so it is an act almost of the last act of self-assertion is that but at the same time it is also the ego destroying itself at the same time so the two seemingly contradictory movements or functions of the ego in an act of suicide come together it is both one could say at that moment the ego triumphs and then and then comes an opening for a moment the portal then opens the possibility of death whenever death happens there is the possibility of going through that portal whether or not the egoic entity destroyed itself totally or whether it can happen that the ego becomes that huge chunks fall out of the ego through the suffering created remnants may remain this I know from observing psychological kinds of deaths that people die because you can learn about death by learning about psychological death when disasters happen to people sometimes the disaster which in most cases is self-created by ego that the disaster can sometimes dissolve the entire ego structure or the disaster can greatly diminish the ego structure so what then survives after if disaster happens in your life you die a kind of death through it but it leaves behind a more compassionate being ego big chunks have fallen or been removed from the ego structure it's no longer that solid after a great disaster but the ego as a structure may survive and could reassemble itself as you recover from the disaster and sometimes it's enough for one little remnant to remain one little identification one egoic resentment towards someone one self image of me especially in some area of my life one little thing can be enough for the entire egoic structure to come back after a few years it builds it up again the disaster recedes into the background but it left an opening even the slightest bit left is very much like the robot in terminator 2 or whatever it was where this thing from the future comes here and it's built of liquid metal looks like a human and you can destroy it as many times as you like if there's only a drop left of that liquid metal it quickly reassembles itself ego is a little bit like that so we can what we know from what happens to the ego when through self created suffering it experiences disaster and then becomes greatly diminished through that or sometimes destroyed the same thing will happen when the ego commits this final act of triumph that is a great disaster it could have the effect of destroying the ego or it is possible that the ego still survives in some form and then whatever it does this energy field that survives that was a person once this energetic formation nothing is ever lost every human being in this room because every human being is connected to the totality of humanity and whether you believe in reincarnation or not doesn't matter every human being whatever any human has experienced you have already experienced because you are only the outcome of the whole past humanity you carry all that within you whether you believe in personal reincarnation or not we'll put that aside you carry within you the past of humanity every human you have experienced it all ultimately humanity is one organism one being not appearing as millions of entities but it is one evolving organism we place excessive importance on the temporary individual expressions of that one organism that one organism is the essence of your being you are that one organism and one day perhaps there will only be one left when humanity has completed its evolution completely that will be one again one divine being male and female in one the end of duality and so you being one with the totality being an expression of the one you have experienced suicide many times you have committed murder and you have been murdered many times and all the other things that humanity has been through we have all been through it many times and so it is all part of the evolving consciousness through the human form nothing is ever lost every life is a contribution to that we cannot fully understand how every life contributes there is an essence in every life that is a nectar and that is left that is the contribution the distillation of what seems like an individual life there is a learning process and some of that learning is through human pain a lot of it in the evolutionary journey of humanity is through human pain and then learning happens also in other ways as is the case now so trust that nothing is ever lost ultimately no one is ever lost it is humanity experiencing human pain this is on a deepest level on an again let's shift to an individual level that what seems like an entity whose life has not worked out that is the surface appearance of things if you look beyond the surface appearance of things there is no such thing as a life not working out every life is part of the learning process and contributes to the learning process of the totality so we need to go beyond that and see some humans temporary forms make their contribution in the form of the pain that they suffer and perhaps they awaken at that moment of death out of the pain we cannot know when that portal opened up the body dissolved the psychological structure the portal opened up the strength the most unlikely humans are ready for the transformation of consciousness and we cannot say that this human being may not have been ready consciousness works in mysterious ways I'm sometimes here surprised that who is ready for this people you would say no what they have done look who they are look at their life look what they've done to others or to themselves they are obviously not ready and yet they may be ready everything that happens seemingly senseless events like that suicide seemingly senseless collective disasters like last year in New York all those events within the totality have a beautiful place every death and every suffering is part of the totality that is evolving nothing is lost when a form dissolves and so from our limited perspective yes certain things look bad from a higher perspective it's fine how do we know what the humans who died in the two towers how many of those in the last seconds of their life broke through identifications that otherwise would have taken a long time to get through when death comes so suddenly and so unexpectedly that shock how many people awakened into a realization in the last moments of to their essential reality as often has been reported by people who face death accepted death and they report that incredible certainty that there is no death that certainty that knowing that deep peace that is suddenly there as death approaches and those who have gone into death and come back report in most cases that all fear left them because fear is only the fear of the form and many of those who did come back from a near death experience had for the rest of their lives enormous trust because they knew nothing was going to be lost nothing was going to be lost nothing is ever lost when a form dissolves that's all that it is and the dissolving of form has its own beauty even when it looks tragic on the surface the dissolving of form has its own beauty and the most tragic event is also a sacred event and that includes suicide it includes any tragic event there is a greater harmony that governs the whole the totality but when you are in the midst of it you can't see that you're like tearing a little fragment out of a huge painting and then you look at that fragment and say what's this all about it doesn't make sense because you cannot see how one life fits into the totality of all life it's impossible but the fact is that it does so with that comes a surrender that perhaps can come to you now to see surrender now for your friend even now your act of surrender now will have an influence on that event that now seems to be in the past the surrender now affects even what looks like past because ultimately there's no past any act of surrender even changes past so your job is to surrender to the pain that was there the pain that you still feel and go into that allow it to be allow it to be allow what is to be allow what was to be and that is your contribution to that what looks like a tragic event thank you let's go into stillness I suggest we spend the rest of the day in noble silence except perhaps for this body sitting on a chair this afternoon words may come some of you may be watching a film tonight and there's no reason why you cannot be silent as you watch the film fierce I believe it is tonight fierce grace about the life of Ramdas a good film and so if you can extend the silence into sleep until sleep happens tonight for those of you who have come with a partner or friend it would be good occasionally also to walk alone out here in nature in silence and awareness that's why it's called noble silence there's silence and noble silence silence means you're not speaking noble silence means you're not speaking and aware the expression I believe originally comes from Buddha the Buddha or Buddhism about many subjects it is said when asked the Buddha kept noble silence which means he didn't give you an answer that reminds me that probably tomorrow morning we'll have a question and answer session questions perhaps answers this morning I believe there was a CD played of meditation music and if you still have it if we could listen as a musical illustration of this morning's what we were talking about this morning this morning's talk I'd like you to just listen for two or three minutes to a little piece and what to listen to mainly predominantly is not the sounds or the tones not the foreground but the background the background of space the background of stillness and with music like that even the act of listening to that because it is the act of listening to an absence the absence of sound listening to stillness brings about inner stillness it's only with that that you can acknowledge the dimension of silence external silence only with the inner dimension of stillness which is consciousness without thought that's what stillness is consciousness without thought only from that dimension can you be aware of silence what seems like external silence that's why that I mentioned perhaps briefly on our first day whenever that was perhaps yesterday the how listening to silence out in nature or in a room can also be an opening into that dimension because you cannot listen acknowledge silence notice silence without the dimension of stillness thinking cannot even notice silence it's a little mystery and it's a miracle the simple act of noticing that dimension puts you into that dimension otherwise you can't notice that so listening to this music we are aware of the background more than what happens one could say the canvas on which the sound is painted and as you do that that pure awareness that consciousness without thought arises so if we have that cd if we could listen to track track two of this morning's meditation cd but the background is more important than what happens the only way the dimension of the sacred can come into this world is through the awareness of the background which is awareness of awareness space inner space we said this morning in any interaction ask yourself whether there is space in the interaction the very question makes it possible for space to open up this is really no different from asking whether there is love in the interaction because out of that love arises the awareness of that is love I don't use that word too often because it's been misused a lot so to see this is the essence of our retreat the essence of any spiritual teaching to see this to realize this truth that is so simple is one thing no thing that's what that realization they call Satori in Zen when you for the first time see and another thing is to live it in your daily life the ability to live it could be called enlightenment and again it's not that helpful a concept because it sounds like an achievement somebody's achievement and one could almost say that the essence of enlightenment is the opposite of somebody's achievement enlightenment and perhaps some of you may have come here expecting to gain something it's not a gain of anything since it's already here it would be closer to the truth to say that enlightenment is a loss of something of that which covers it up so it cannot be an achievement so the question is then how to live it in one's daily life where the challenges pile up one after the other living in this world mad to some extent faced with the challenges of everyday life which are primarily in oneself they seem to appear as external factors but your real challenge is the conditioned mind the momentum of it and your real challenge is not to lose awareness when that starts up not to lose awareness when the pain body becomes active and associates itself with the thinking mind old emotion old human emotion old human pain linking in with the activity of thought personalizing the pain the pain body says don't talk about me I can't stand it so there's thousands of years of conditioning collective mental conditioning plus your personal conditioning from this lifetime which is bad enough in itself and the personal pain from this lifetime which would be quite enough and so what to be aware of in your daily life is of course the movement of thought and the flux of emotions aware means know that it's there so that there's a space around it one could say a space between you which is a space between you and the thought the space between you and the emotion but ultimately you are the space so then the emotion happens within the space that you are knowing yourself as space not as that which happens in that space this is why this music is helpful knowing yourself as the underlying field not that which takes birth and then dies in the field comes and goes so it means not getting not believing in every label that the mind comes up with that's why it's so important to begin to live in such a way that your life is not the aliveness of life is not obscured continuously by labels and concepts that's why it's so important to go for a walk here and perceive clearly aware in the space of awareness without needing the labels why it's so important to sometimes do small things little movements that conventional little activities and bring presence to them a space they happen within the spaciousness of no thought just aware presence even as simple a thing as putting an object from here to there while it travels from here to there there's a space of pure awareness so it's a beautiful gesture it becomes beautiful through that before it wasn't beautiful it was a means to an end I need to put this here it doesn't have that quality to it that comes only with awareness walking across your room consciously from the door to the bed free from thought for that little interval it's just beautiful so this is the beginning of not getting completely drawn into labels and believing that when you have a label you know what it is living in that state of openness which is true intelligence which has the appearance that you don't know and yet all knowing arises out of it all true knowing so here we have this is the beginning little labels not to believe in the ultimate reality of the labels and then of course there's more the human mind there are huge patterns of ways in which you interpret the universe inherited from your personal past inherited from the collective past your cultural past the collective past of mankind of humankind ways of interpretation which are based mainly on separative egoic consciousness the little me interprets the world in certain ways and no longer totally believe in one's interpretation of situations events or people and beware of premature conclusions which the mind quickly reaches about things and people that's how it is so beware of all interpretations of people or events and recognize them when they come because they come recognize them as interpretations as a perspective perhaps a possible perspective never the entire truth and very often a complete fantasy so it's always a standing back from thought into the spaciousness being the spaciousness there's the interpretation and there you stand back a little bit there are many stories in Zen to illustrate how interpretations can mislead you I will tell you a little one it was for a long time the custom in monasteries when visitors arrived in the evening to ask for lodging sometimes other monks or other visitors in order to gain the right to spend the night in the monastery they'd have to challenge somebody who lives in the monastery to an argument and win the argument but it was a Zen argument so it was never conducted with many words and if they won they could spend the night if they lost they would have to move on so there was one monastery where the abbot was a monk and his younger brother who was not yet very enlightened also lived there as a monk the younger brother only had one eye he had lost his eye early in childhood so one evening the younger brother came to the abbot and said a visitor has just arrived and I happen to be standing at the gates and he challenged me to an argument a discussion what do I do he had never done it and the abbot his elder brother knew that that was a risky thing so he said but he had been challenged so he said ok conduct the argument in silence ok he went off ten minutes later the visitor comes and knocks at the door of the abbot and says I'd like to pay my respects to you and take my leave because your brother is so clever and enlightened he completely defeated me in the argument and the abbot said how so what happened he said well it started our discussion started said the visitor with me raising one finger to signify buddha the enlightened one then your brother raised two fingers to signify buddha the enlightened one is not complete without the dharma of the buddha's teaching then I raised three fingers to indicate that the third element is also needed which is the sangha the brotherhood of monks without which it's not complete so here they went and then the visitor said your brother suddenly shook his fist in my face to signify that all arises from the one act of enlightenment the one realisation and so he completely defeated me I'll move on to another monastery and seek lodging there goodbye and a few minutes later the younger brother comes in and says to the abbot where is this fellow I'm going to beat him up he completely insulted me and the abbot says tell me what happened he said well we started he raised one finger to say to make fun of my own one eye then I decided to raise two fingers to compliment him on the fact that he had two eyes and then he dared to raise three fingers to show that even between us we only had three eyes and so I was going to punch him in the face but he ran away different realities different worlds and so beautiful example this of course was the conditioning of the brother and probably how did he get as a child he was mocked many times so there was already expecting something like that to happen and immediately a neutral event was interpreted so basically and this happens to many people still in this world they inhabit a fantasy world of conditioning from the past and looking at events that are happening in the present through that conditioning and interpreting events through that conditioning and in many cases it's complete fantasy but the strange thing is when you continuously interpret the world in certain ways it tends to reflect back to you that interpretation so one could say that what is called karma usually it's regarded as things that happen to you in your life good things bad things good karma good karma bad karma but really how your life unfolds is perhaps 10% of what happens to you and 90% of the reactions to what happens to you and the continuous reactions create their own reality the reality confirms back to you that your interpretation is correct that's how it works so if you interpret human beings as being basically dishonest and out to get you or get something from you that becomes your selective perception of reality that's the way in which you interpret events and then after a while because perception is selective you will get confirmation because you will only meet those people that will conform to your expectations the others you're not even interested in and you might even bring out in people who are not totally conscious yet that which you expect from them or that which you fear from them you pull it out of them if they're not fully conscious so to be aware very much of the way in which one interprets reality that's why this I like this Byron Katie a spiritual teacher has this question that you ask yourself whenever you have thoughts arising about a person a situation an event and you have your interpretation of it do I really know that this is true can I really know that this is true and then you look deeply and say I don't really know if this interpretation is true I don't really know it maybe it looks true to me but I don't really know it and so you're beginning to take a step back from thought any thought so that you can begin to dwell in the region of no thought and have your home your dwelling place there not in the interpretations of the mind have your dwelling place in that field in that pure intelligence and out of there yes you respond to situations and events but you don't react react is comes out of the old conditioning so people carry inside them the past they look upon the present through the eyes of the past and so what then happens is that that provides the continuity between past and future you make sure that the future is going to be the same as the past and this is how most people live and this is the essence of karma is that there is a continuity between the unconscious past in you and the events that unfold you are creating it through your interpretations and total identification with the thought structures which then create that reality nations do it to each other collective bodies entities interpret it in their way cannot see any other perspective except that there is no other perspective this is the truth as the I mentioned the writer that I read in New York Times competing narrative the unwillingness or the inability to accommodate a competing narrative to see that hmm and to hold that in awareness so to see inside oneself the structure of thought and the movement of old emotion that goes with it and step back from it so that there is some space and that applies particularly of course when the movement of thought becomes connected to the old emotion and they become a vicious circle the old pain body the old emotion personal emotions from your past collective pain from humanity as a whole with which even every baby comes into this world most babies already cry when they why do they already cry there's already pain there some babies cry more than others some babies have a heavier pain body than others it doesn't mean those who don't have a heavy pain body are closer to liberation maybe the other way around who knows but that is there and that pain body is an aspect of the mind made self and it is that which makes it hard to step beyond it if it were only thought structures it wouldn't be that hard but it is thought structures combined with a force of old human pain so when the pain body that lives in every human not always active sometimes dormant for periods of time when it needs to replenish itself which it can only do by absorbing energy frequency that corresponds to its own vibrational frequency which is the frequency of pain in whatever form whatever it is this explains it better than concepts concepts create a distance okay anger or heaviness of depression can't can't take any more can't take any more of this when the pain body needs to replenish itself it can only do that by creating energy energy of that vibrates at the same frequency which is pain and so it will move into your mind the emotion rises up into the mind thinking and then suddenly your thinking reflects the emotion it you think along the lines of the emotion so if the predominant energy field of the emotion is anger you think angry thoughts about of course it will be about something here the situation somebody next to you the situation you are in right now it seems to be caused the thoughts that you are thinking with great energy seem to be caused by something around you but of course that which is around you very often is a relatively insignificant event or thing that somebody did or said but the emotion the thoughts and the emotions of extremely powerful incredible force to them out of proportion to the event which was really only the triggering event not the causal event but the mind made self believes it to be the causal event you caused this you did that to me and not surprisingly a very very common characteristic of the self linked with pain body is to see itself as a victim of some personal situation very common almost every pain body has it the interpretation of reality as doing something to me because in miracles puts it beautifully it says beware of the temptation of seeing yourself unfairly treated and that is almost in everyone that is an aspect of pain body and the self mind made self when it links in with pain body something there is doing something even the criminals in prison more almost all of them consider themselves to be victims in some ways one could say they are it's a perspective you can take any perspective so let's see when the pain body needs to feed there is a readiness for it to come it cannot yet come unless it can find some trigger the trigger could be just one thought that goes through your head that's the slightest trigger it can use one a little negative thought a little negative reaction then the pain body can use that and link into that and that would lead to a stream of thinking along the lines of the pain body so just a little even driving in the traffic an upset about another driver oh this when the pain body is ready to come up it will use that moment and that will lead to a train of thought movement that is increasingly painful and the pain body loves it it feeds on every painful thought because the pain body is feeding on the movement of thought and then that is the movement of unconsciousness is there a possibility at that point to wake up yes now there is if there is enough presence in you there is the possibility of knowing what is happening as it happens if you can catch it at an early stage it's even easier just as it arises catch it to see to feel the emotion directly before it becomes a thought if you can do that it cannot begin to use your thought processes if your awareness is there and that requires alertness that requires that if the alertness is there you can watch the emotion wanting to become a thought and you continue simply to watch it on the level of the emotion semi-physical entity beautiful it's no longer a personal matter it's simply the movement of emotion in you and when you watch it it is implied that you accept it because it's here it's part of your acceptance practice which is the most powerful way to go beyond is to accept what's there there it is if you don't catch it at a very early stage you may have to catch it already when it thought is already moving and then you may notice a strong disinclination if that's the word to want to get out of it there may still be a presence in the background a witnessing presence how strong it is then that will determine whether or not you can still rise above it step out of it see it for what it is ah pain body and feel it oh and then it's not replenishing itself through your thinking of course as you I'm sure many of you know it can it also likes to replenish itself through other people to provoke a reaction to challenge somebody else please give me some emotional reaction react you did that to me I didn't you did it to me so it feeds on the other persons it wants to awaken the other person's pain body pain bodies love other pain bodies so partners feed on each other's pain body it's an essential ingredient of most relationships the drama that is a necessary part of relationships periodic drama and after a while the energy the pain body has replenished itself and it subsides and then the same cycle starts again and so to bring consciousness into that requires alertness vigilance you cannot suppress it it would only get stronger for temporarily you could I'm not going to let this pain body get the better of me I'm just going to sit here not a and acknowledging what the mind may call negative emotions is also dangerous the minds might be saying you may have an image if you're still deriving your sense of self from thought you may have an image in your mind of who you are a spiritual person maybe someone who has already gone beyond these things or if you are a Christian and want to follow the teaching of Jesus without having gone to the bottom of it just the externals then you may have an image of yourself as a good Christian or good Christian there's certain things that a good Christian does not feel to be a good and so there may be a clash between the emotion that you feel and your self image and then you deny that it's there I'm not angry at all how dare you even suggest that I'm angry I can go so far as to somebody shouting I am not angry so to watch that because people believe that the emotions that they experience are some personal dilemma that they are not yet advanced enough so that's why they are still there or not good enough people to have those emotions I'm not good enough if I have those emotions it's the belief that emotions are a personal matter deriving your sense of self partly from emotions and partly from thought that's the mind made self consists of those elements and so there is nothing personal neither in emotion nor in thought it's just human thought no different from other human thought another human next to you has very similar thought structures and emotions anger anger is anger in the other person it's very similar to your anger basically the same the stories around it may be slightly different the explanations of why I'm angry may be slightly different from person to person slightly different script in the head but so what people derive their identity from the sense of person personal selfhood is ultimately not personal at all it is human emotion and human thinking and that makes it a little easier when you realize that your emotions are not personal matter they are human emotions to do with the fact that you are a human temporarily a human here on this planet have inherited certain things that are connected with the past of this planet and those things are there that's all so you can by watching an emotion you begin to depersonalize the emotion not denying but depersonalizing it so it is not a personal problem of yours anymore the fact that you get anger attacks once a week or whatever the pain body whatever form the pain body may take then you can actually see that as the fiery emotion of that it's easier to accept it too when it's you realize it as not self as not you it's easier to accept that yes there are still human emotions in you oh how dreadful so with that begins a depersonalization of pain body the pain body wants to pretend to be a person and wants to take me very seriously it wants to be linked to the story of me it gives energy to the story which then becomes a very unhappy story when the pain body is there so and even to see that the story also of me which consists of thought and reactive patterns thoughts reactive patterns memories mental images are thought forms that's concepts thought forms and images that happen in the field of consciousness and again you would be surprised how similar the basic structure of human thought is from person to person when you get to the bottom of it in yourself you know every other mind even from other cultures or in other cultures of course the story may be different but the basic elements are the same of totally identifying with one mental position if you're a woman and you travel to certain countries and forget to change your clothes and you arrive at the airport wearing a skirt and short sleeved blouse then certain people in those countries will immediately interpret you as immoral has no shame is immoral and that is their perspective when they come here you might have some other interpretation about them and they cannot yet step beyond it and see it as one as an interpretation as a perspective they are still completely wedded to that mind form that mind structure and anybody who challenges it challenges their very identity that's the essence of unconsciousness so it's not so your self is not in thought and emotion it is in the space in which the thoughts and emotions happen the one who can allow the thoughts and emotions to be there which is the space which is the I am presence the deepest I am-ness I am is usually followed by some concept or word this or that or a name just a thought form the most frequently used word in the language may be I and usually it refers to the mind made me and its emotions which is the story and when people tell you about I they tell you about their story but the deeper meaning of I I is both the greatest illusion that the word that contains the greatest illusion and the word that contains the deepest truth in language the deepest essence usually when I is used it is the illusion the illusory entity but potentially I is the deepest statement of who you are I am pure aware presence of beingness and you can only know that when thought comes to an end what is left let's say you don't even remember your name anymore or the stories from your past at this moment can't remember my name or the stories from my past what is left is there anything essential that you have lost no in the absence of the memory of your story or your name the deepest sense of beingness is still there which before got mixed up in the stories that you were telling yourself and others this is the amazing thing that that remains and it remains in its essence and that is so precious and so beautiful and that's you I it is the divine in you I it is formless and that's why in the the most profound statement in the bible is God's self definition who are you and God says I am that I am the essence of I am is that and sometimes it comes to the mind who through some apparent accident accidentally lose everything that they thought they were life takes it away from them strips you of all the things that you've been hanging on to and then you're left with this bear I am a deep sense of beingness aliveness of presence everything has been removed from you that works too or here it works in many different ways this in some places they may not come to teachings like this somebody may lose become a refugee lose their homes loss does it sometimes so this is emerging now on a larger scale for the first time on the planet thousands of years ago that realization came to one human being the first flowering of human consciousness the first realization who I am beyond form and it is quite possible that that person was a person whose existence on this planet goes back into the legendary past we know even less about him than we know about Jesus or Buddha and there's the legend in India of Krishna and Krishna may well have been the first human to have realized that dimension within and over time now the amazing thing is that some humans recognized something in in him they recognized something of themselves in him but didn't fully know that that was what was happening they recognized something of themselves a purer version an undiluted version of themselves an unobscured version of themselves and over time they associated the formless consciousness that was emerging with the form of the person and so the person became a kind of God in people's eyes in people's thoughts but of course that realization is the emergence of the formless it is not of a person of a form it does not belong to any form it comes when the form becomes somehow transparent is no longer obscured by the density of mental and emotional structures and so that was perhaps the first flowering and then came others here and there and gradually the possibility of this happening this realization could not come on this planet until now for the simple reason that the need for it was not there yet they were preparations one could say almost for the shift in consciousness the early flowerings prototypes exactly the same happened as I mentioned before when flowers first appeared on the planet millions of years of plant life without flowers and one day one plant developed a flower which is one could say another dimension of plant life thousands of years later another flower thousand years later two flowers until finally suddenly a profusion of flowers all over the planet our human evolutionary stage the way humans where we are now is coming to an end the cycle of thought not that thought will not operate anymore but humans are going beyond having to rely predominantly on thought they're going beyond needing to derive their identity from thought and this is a momentous event why is it happening now? for the simple reason that it has to happen now because the old consciousness is becoming increasingly dysfunctional which is normal at the end of an evolutionary cycle things don't work anymore and so even that is fine even the madness that we witness on the planet now and witnessed in past centuries even the madness is good is ultimately part of what is meant to be ultimately and part of it is also recognizing madness as madness recognizing dysfunction as dysfunction is equally important so let this this is an event that goes far beyond this room because on the surface of things not much is happening here a person speaking some people are listening and yet it is part already of the transformation of human consciousness on the planet not significant enough it is not what fit into the news usually although it can happen it's happened but it's rare it's not to a large extent not yet a newsworthy event although once this teaching was on the national news in Canada but it's rare and they only gave it two and a half minutes but it's a beginning so don't believe entirely don't believe that what you hear or see on television is the entire truth and is the complete news of what's happening on this planet there's a lot happening that is not being mentioned on the news and what is not being mentioned on the news is more significant than that which is mentioned beware of being drawn into reactivity when you watch events happening in the world either into fear or into anger or into despair could happen when you watch the news on television be there as a witnessing presence compassionate that comes naturally with a witnessing presence be there alert just as you watch the tree or the flower you can watch the news or just as you sit with a person who is in pain and talking to you you can watch the news in that way let it happen within a field of peace who is going to bring peace to this world if not you and if enough people watch the news within a field of peace even the news will change it's all happening in consciousness the collective dream of humanity is changing the collective nightmare is changing we are waking up out of the collective nightmare to some extent you could say that all of phenomenal existence is a kind of dream but it becomes a more beautiful dream be careful with the seductive quality of television how it draws you out of the body if you watch for long your attention how it puts you into a semi-hypnotic state how a particular world view is being continuously played out although a few times occasionally something else is coming in these days not often yet if you have to watch it's very helpful to be in the body to feel the inner energy field of body so that you have an anchor that keeps you present and you watch from there something else that pulls your attention out is computer screens staring at it for long periods again it helps to connect with the inner body and at times look away and feel the inner body maybe have a flower next to your computer or a plant something natural if you find it still difficult to perceive without thought which is what I'm here talking about connect with the inner body even if it's only one part of the body and feel the aliveness within that part and then look then you can it is easier to perceive without thought at the same time even at this moment you can look see this room and at the same time feel the aliveness within that's a beautiful way of getting to know what it means to perceive without thought simply in awareness television for many people is almost liberating and it is a little it's a drug it liberates them from their own mind because when you watch television for long periods you're not thinking your own thoughts sometimes you are but a lot of the time when you watch you're simply linking into the collective mind you are forced to think their thoughts so it's not that you become free of mind you become free of the personal aspect your mind your problems but then what you watch is somebody else's problems well that's a little liberation at least it's not your problems very important as this shift happens there are already children coming into this world who are more ready for the shift in consciousness than you and I ever were when we came into this world I wasn't ready a lot of suffering had to happen before the readiness but many children already coming into this world now and they are coming of course still into this culture which is ignorant of such matters no longer totally ignorant because this is becoming almost mainstream now so it is spreading but the structures of society the school system and so on still to a large extent ignorant the structures are heavy they're in place even if some of the teachers become enlightened they still have to work within the structures of the unenlightened consciousness that is not easy and that applies to many institutions it applies to hospitals where some of the nurses bring in wonderful openness and healing power and love and space if it weren't for them the whole place would already be worse than a mental home it's already getting close to it so it's there are humans within the old institutions and this applies to quite a few of you perhaps there are human beings who are already going through this transformation but they are still working within the old structures and only you can know for yourself by becoming still whether to continue working from within those structures and perhaps bring about a transformation of the structures from within simply by being who you are your consciousness by being conscious within the unconscious structures or it may be that you might find that those structures are so rigid that you see little possibility and then you will know what to do you may remove yourself not through decision making but through waking up one morning and saying that's it it could happen or you may transform them from within in some cases that may be possible there's no general truth here only you can know what the truth is in your particular case they are the economic structures they are the corporations we've heard a lot about them recently the big corporations how they operate are they all evil all the big managers are they evil no they are egoic entities like everybody else just a little bigger because of their position educational social structures all those political so some may collapse and some may become transformed from within nobody can predict how it is going to happen do not leave prematurely just see you will know what is right and if you have to leave life will look after you and this is the truth if you have to starve and you won't if you have to starve you will starve beautifully and then other children who are some of them have to be in those old structures and they may not function very well within them so if you come into contact either as a parent or in some other way with children the greatest gift you can give is the gift of space they are just waiting for it they will recognize it very easily they are waiting for you to give the gift of space and then you give it to each other before you know it they may be teaching you it's all one anyway so the greatest gift is the gift of space and even those children who are still burdened so it seems with the old consciousness strongly identified with the old consciousness the gift of space they also long for deep within and in families the absence of space is the worst aspect of family life in our civilization the one thing that matters isn't there and all the entire family is run by the thinking mind object consciousness one damn thing after another never they don't have meals together anymore they just and even if they had meals together there might not be space you know what Thanksgiving dinners are like in families so it's to provide that in your family especially if they are children be there as space not be consumed by object consciousness not be consumed by things that need to be done that pretend to be important nothing is more important than this and so this begins with a little thing like the ability to listen to their child no matter what the child is talking about just listen the pure the act of pure listening is the greatest thing the act of pure listening is pure awareness pure listening is the most beautiful thing you can share with another human being even if they are talking coming from the noisy mind it is being received within the spaciousness of pure listening the most powerful thing anybody who can listen becomes an effective healer anybody who can listen from that space as that space if you then put up a little sign and say psychotherapist and your only qualification is that you can listen you would do very well by word of mouth you might not get insurance though and all effective psychotherapists know that they become only effective when they enter that state some of them do after many years of practice simply they get bored with anything else with applying their their particular thought system to the patient patient applying their beliefs as their grid of interpretation labels and then after ten or twenty years they get tired of the labels and then they just sit there and listen and then they find amazing things that sometimes come out of their mouth and at other times amazing things come out of the person's mouth who is sitting with you it's all part of not relying anymore on accumulated knowledge it's still there for little things yes it's good but not relying on that so let's live this now starting right now starting as you move away from this room walking towards your room one step at a time observing the movement of thought that may be there and perhaps the spaciousness being there as you watch nature around you if you watch the film tonight it's about a deepening brought about through some pain that happens through suffering Ram Dass suffered a stroke and experienced an enormous deepening through that so grace the meaning of the title fierce grace is that grace sometimes comes in that form it takes something away from you for example your ability to move about and then grace comes in a different form like this a moment of silence all practice for the rest of this week and this sentence already contains a paradox all practice for the rest of this week is to stay with just this moment and that is the paradox that on the surface of things time seems to be very real within the depths of yourself time ceases to be real so you always have when one speaks of the timeless dimension of consciousness you are using language which is derived from the world of time paradox comes in the practice then is to just stay with this little moment just this one and it's always this one when you're walking out there stripping one step at a time being in the state of yes to this moment that is really all now the yes to so called beautiful sunny warm weather may be a little easier than the yes to cold wet windy weather and you can extend that as almost a metaphor to the rest of your life the strange thing is however that the yes to the cold wet and windy weather takes you even deeper than the yes to the good weather and the deepest is the yes to death that takes you deepest and death is any kind of death physical or psychological or some loss of something that was important to the me something dies part of your identity dies and then the yes takes you very deep the yes to what is so the space opens up immediately with the yes to what is the space that is beyond mind objects thought the thought the mind the mind made self wants this to be even more difficult it would prefer to have an outline of what I am supposed to do for the next 10 years that finally will get me to a space consciousness it would be very happy if I gave you a folder describing the steps to take because it's very happy with being given additional time future it lives on that and so it is not happy when it hears how simple the transformation of consciousness can be it's not happy that it doesn't require time you mean I'm already enough can't be not me I'm not I'm not ready I have a long way to go surely there's so much that I don't know yet and I still have to learn I've only read a hundred spiritual books there are so many experiences I haven't had yet the fireworks that they talk about well that may be a nice experience but it doesn't last that long and then you are a little me again saying you can be a little me with the added thought form that once fireworks happened to me and then you can live on the dilemma of how to get the fireworks back so the need for more that is built into the structure of the human mind is also here of course but of course realization of who you are is not a more and that includes more knowing knowledge or more understanding which is not necessary that's almost insulting to the mind you mean there is nothing for me to do says the mind if I may quote the philosopher Woody Allen who said I'm always astounded by people who want to understand the universe when it's hard enough to find your way around Chinatown hmm a sneeze can sometimes be satori so the yes to just this just this moment space opens up within spaciousness and miraculously you become truly intelligent I believe it was Krishnamurti who used the expression the awakening of intelligence and that's what it is there's more to intelligence than the mind can conceive the mind being only a tiny aspect of the one intelligence the human mind fine beautiful too except when you seek the totality in it when you seek yourself in it when it becomes all there is you get trapped in a tiny aspect of the totality and that's a little delusion when you're no longer trapped in it the human mind is beautiful too so the practice here is not going beyond what is now with the yes comes space with the space comes and I'm use that word reluctantly with the space comes love not the clinging and wanting love of the egoic self a deeper love the state of love that's inseparable from your essential beingness you love what is and in loving what is the universe actually becomes transformed the universe is not separate from what appears in your consciousness all the forms that appear in your consciousness make up the universe and when there's love that which appears in your consciousness becomes transformed that is the universe and that only works if you do not differentiate between good and bad in your love those teachings have been there for a while somebody else said it in different words two thousand years ago it only works if you don't differentiate between good and bad how do you not differentiate between good and bad the mind the thinking mind operates on the principle of good and bad it discriminates we could call it because that is its essential essential characteristic the discriminating mind the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil the discriminating mind becoming trapped in the discriminating mind and this is why it's so essential to bring the yes to what is an unconditional yes because it is the mind the thinking mind cannot love what is it might love what it judges as desirable and it will reject try to get away from or hate that which it judges as undesirable not helpful judged as no good that's what the thinking mind does it's job to judge so you cannot change the thinking mind in that sense and say I don't want to judge anymore they have tried it because humans heard 2000 years ago judge not your neighbor love thy neighbor as thyself and then they tried not to judge never never saw that the prerequisite for not judging is to step out of the mind it's only from the dimension of space consciousness that there can be the state of no judgment the moment a thought comes in you have judged something thought can be equated with judgment and there's nothing wrong with that that's what thought does and on it's own level it has a certain helpful function if you don't get lost in it so love arises the moment there is space we could almost equate those two space love is space and it's the only way in which the world can become transformed it transforms the world from within because the world is an inner phenomenon an enormous intelligence begins to operate with a yes when space arises so that's the destiny of humanity is to be every what appears to be the individual human being to be an opening for space one could almost say that all the history of humanity up till now was the pre-history of humanity we're not quite human yet I don't know if there will be any history after this but there may be but it won't be very important as history so you look upon whatever you look upon with love and you love your neighbor as yourself your neighbor is whoever comes into your field of consciousness of course and this is essential practice now when facing another human being I mentioned it briefly yesterday is there space just a little bit of space a little space of no thought as you as your attention is there on another human being a space of the openness of no thought not length doesn't matter the space just open the mind comes in and again the stepping back from mind ideally it's there whenever you listen to anybody then it may be that when you begin to speak you might lose it initially because it's a new way of living and so it's easy for the mind to draw you back into the stream of thinking and if you then remember to step back from thought once you have uttered what you have to say you step back again into space and you listen and after a while you can even sense spaciousness in the background as you speak another way of saying it you can sense yourself your essential beingness in the background as you speak the I am this is probably what a very early spiritual teacher as far as the western world is concerned a contemporary spiritual teacher early 20th century Gurdjieff who spoke of self-remembering remember yourself in any situation it's probably what he meant was that he didn't mean remember the story of yourself remember the essence and it's not even remembering it isn't quite perhaps the most the best way of putting it knowing it being it remembering could lead you to believe that it is some kind of something you think about okay I must think about myself so that's and don't be you will be challenged in two ways by the human mind in this because the human mind senses that it loses its control predominance and that's the challenge comes from within and it comes from other human minds which come disguised as human beings most human beings they carry a disguise of mind or the other way around the mind disguises itself as a human being the being is there but where and that is the skill the art of penetrating beyond mind in others of not getting caught up in that density when you are facing another human being not getting caught up in the density that frequency that vibrational frequency that is the human mind because otherwise you get caught up in it and you become reactive which means it stimulates your own mind and that's the normal human interaction you can only penetrate beyond that if you have gone beyond it within yourself it's only then that you can go beyond that in others but with the yes applies here also the yes to what is when what is is a human being right in front of you that is the form that this moment takes and that may be the most difficult yes of all compared to which the yes to bad weather is easy you could be in the Canadian Arctic and that yes would be easy compared to the yes that is needed sometimes quite often when you meet a human mind and here we have really I don't remember who said it perhaps it was Ram Dass who said relationships are the sadhana the spiritual practice for the west the main spiritual practice for the west is in and through relationships encountering other humans that's the challenge the greatest challenge that challenge has different levels to it the more you are linked with these humans for some reason through family ties one could say the more past you share with another human being the harder it may be practice this at first when you encounter relatively uncomplicated encounters with humans seemingly superficial interactions and it's amazing how people reduce all those interactions and of those there are many throughout the day how they reduce them to a means to an end when you have superficial interactions ordering a meal in a restaurant paying for your food buying a newspaper meeting someone in an elevator talking to the cleaner coming in whatever it may be many kinds of brief seemingly interactions that only seem to be a means to an end because in the mind-identified state the present moment is always a means to an end so in the mind-identified state whoever appears in this moment is also a means to an end it's a dreadful reduction and impoverishment of human existence to live in such a way that most of your encounters with other humans both superficial encounters and even other encounters longer other kinds of relationships are really in the mind-identified state a means to some end because you're never fully present in the now in that state you always want something else out of this now the now is a stepping stone to where I want to get so now all those meetings whenever you meet anybody it's a wonderful opportunity for the arising of space in that meeting which is love also and all that it requires is to look at this human being and to listen if they're saying something in the spacious awareness which has no thought in it just that alertness this is why we're here the whole reason why we're here is to know that state of consciousness to look the same way you look at a flower or tree and perhaps at the same time if there is an interaction it's taking place the waiter comes you look up from the menu two seconds one second and then you say what you have to say and then he or she asks the question and you look and then you say what you have to say there's a little bit of space there is part of the interaction where you are not playing a role in that interaction when there is space when there is no space it's almost inevitable that you will slip into some kind of role in a restaurant and this is unconscious in a restaurant you play the role of the customer and there's a subtle difference then in the way in which you speak to that other human being and the waiter or waitress may be trapped in their own role playing the role as waiter waitress and you can sometimes see it when they come sometimes some of them play their role well they get a good tip others don't play it very well either they play their role reluctantly and then there are other roles that humans play and you observe yourself whenever the mind is there there'll be some kind of role that you play even to yourself alone in your room you play the role of perhaps you're the victim and you're thinking about your victimhood and and I'm not saying stop playing roles that would be a big demand but what is possible is to be there when you do play roles to know that there's a role to notice it you notice it for example if you behave and speak differently to that famous person that you meet and the waiter or the person who comes to do the cleaning are there slight or considerable differences in the ways in which you speak to them or interact with them perhaps they are which means you're playing roles which means you're the basis for your interaction is a conceptualized sense of self and you're imposing another conceptualized self on the other person and two conceptualized selves then play their respective roles the famous person may be playing their own role unless they are so famous that they've seen the emptiness of it and they've gone beyond it and you might still persist in imposing a conceptual identity people do it with spiritual teachers believing when they meet a spiritual teacher they're meeting somebody important they're not they're not meeting anybody except themselves they might get nervous when they see a spiritual teacher are you nervous when you're meeting yourself? strange but because they have a conceptual identity of somebody important and then you have another conceptual identity of somebody who is not very important and you may have a conceptual identity of yourself as important or not important or you might not even quite know whether you're important or not important sometimes the world tells you this and sometimes the world tells you that this includes all opinions you have of yourself and that's an interesting thing that's more concepts opinions that you have of yourself are ultimately all parts of roles concepts not real whatsoever is it possible to live without having an opinion about yourself do you lose something important when you no longer have an opinion about who you are in this life you just are at any moment when you live in the now that goes automatically it falls away with the awareness that is there the opinions that you have become unimportant the whole conceptual structure falls away in the immediacy of present moment awareness the entire conceptual structures fall away so you are no longer imposing those structures on yourself or on others no opinions can I live without having opinions about myself am I losing something important your opinions may be predominantly good or predominantly bad and there is a reluctance in both cases of letting go because there is an attachment I won't know who I am anymore at least I know that I am a wretched miserable being and so it is so the liberating thing is that that becomes unimportant the more there is that spaciousness in your life the more those things fall away the conceptual structures about yourself are not important they are not who you are and then you don't inflict them on others that's the beauty of it when they fall away within yourself that conceptualized self you don't inflict the conceptualized self on others which is it sounds shocking we could say it is the first act of violence the very root of violence is to because it's deadening the humanity the essential beingness the essential aliveness of the other human being which ultimately is no other and you will only do that if you have deadened it in yourself first and that is the dilemma of humanity in its present evolutionary stage amazing so to see in some ways we are this is why it's so wonderful to watch an animal because an animal too has no opinion about itself it is that's why the dog is so joyful and why the cat purrs if the dog had an opinion about him or herself that unconditional love wouldn't be there anymore because the dog would then also inflict an opinion on you and it might not be good and so the dog would be thinking oh here he comes again so you are meeting another human being in that space of no thought brief perhaps it's fine and there you there is a true coming together a true meeting beyond concepts beyond roles or opinions and if you should slip into roles it may now be easier to notice it when it happens to notice the subtle changes in your behavior and speech when you relate to different kinds of people according to the concepts you hold in your mind about those people and how you compare your own self concept with their self that self concept is he or she more important than me and that will determine the role you play does he know more than me is he whatever it is and then a little wanting comes in you want something from he who you think is more than you comparison is a continuous thing that the egoic mind structure uses continuous comparison of me with others I can only evaluate me by comparing me to others how do I rate here and that determines the conceptual structure of me and then you try to improve it with all kinds of strange things name dropping hoping that if you are talking to someone you drop a name hoping that in that association with that name which is a concept belief this is a famous person and you know him that your own self concept something is added to it that will give greater worth to yourself this is why the names are dropped in the hope that in the eyes of that other person so you are hoping that this person you are talking to will give you more recognition through dropping the name of somebody else who is famous or has some other high status so it's a hope to gain a stronger self and name dropping is only a small example of the strategies used by the ego to enhance itself it's always looking out for something and so you may observe that even some spiritually advanced people occasionally can catch themselves name dropping when I talk to my friend so and so Ram Das called me the other day so and this is it is whenever you notice something like that it's not really a personal thing either this is how the egoic human mind operates and the noticing it and that's the amazing thing when you notice it there are still many humans in this world who are trapped in these patterns and don't know it they are totally those patterns noticing it is actually the arising of space consciousness from where you can see what the mind is doing and so whenever you notice a pattern a role that you are playing some conceptual game that's a wonderful thing it's not that now this is the mind from the brief insight that you have there the realization of what is going on inside you that could immediately be used by the mind again and then formulate a judgment about yourself which could be oh you see you are still deficient in spirituality you see you can't you're doing it again all that silly you're still playing silly games that everybody else is playing you're no good for example or other things are possible too but if you stay with the noticing that means it's only from the unconditioned dimension of consciousness that you can see the conditioned from within the conditioned after you've seen it you might judge it that's the conditioned again it's only so whatever you see in yourself even the worst so called traits of humanity because all of humanity is within each human being it may not be manifested but all of humanity is within each human and you might discover evil thoughts I think those thoughts I there is no I beyond those thoughts there is the deepest that the deepest I am is not thinking those thoughts those thoughts are clouds they are human thoughts floating around and often people believe all their thoughts are come from them there is only really one human mind there's a collective human mind and it's almost like clouds can float into your mind from other minds and you think certain thoughts and you think it's me all it is it's a collective human mind operating so you can discover all strange things in yourself and the temptation is there to judge yourself as not yet worthy or might never be worthy or you should definitely not be having these thoughts and so you are making them into a problem a personal problem the thoughts are personalized and they become problematic and you give them more power because the making them problematic is further thought activity is further self self activity the mind made self it loves whatever dilemma you can find it loves it and the more complex the dilemma of yourself the better surely I need twenty years of psychoanalysis to get through all this to get to the bottom of it all well if you examined the mind bit by bit yes it would take a long time where did this thought come from oh so whatever you notice in yourself is beautiful because the noticing the seeing is already liberation from being completely identified with whatever thoughts or emotions are happening inside you and so you can just stay with the seeing and seeing it is human the human mind that's all it is and you just watch oh that means you are more interested in seeing being the witness than getting into the thought or reacting to the thought which creates further thought it draws you in and the amazing thing is when you see patterns especially repeatedly they tend to drop away after a while by themselves don't have to do anything patterns that are no longer invested with sense of self but are recognized as patterns they drop away it's only through complete self identification with patterns that they go on and on and on and so the recognition comes with stepping back so now let's go back to the interactions there is a human being the question is even in the briefest of interactions it is your life is made up of these things your life is made up of what relatively insignificant moments the moments that the mind tells you are significant are relatively few and it might be waiting for one it might have been waiting for a long time I'm waiting for a significant moment in my life then I came to a retreat I thought that might do it there's a watch they have the advertising slogan I don't remember what watch so maybe it's not a good slogan it's a there's the watch and somebody is looking at it and is saying significant moment significant moments so I suppose whenever you look at that watch that moment becomes significant presumably it's an expensive watch and so your conceptual self becomes significant when you remember that you're wearing it a lot of the consumer industry works like that to enhance your sense of self through an image a fiction yeah of course but they don't know it's a fiction it's their self so life consists unless you have an expensive watch of insignificant and one of the things that people are waiting for because in the normal state of consciousness you're always waiting for something and really you're waiting for something significant to happen and not that often does it happen and it doesn't last very long the wedding comes and goes and then daily existence is there breakfast every morning so and then you're meeting all these people these insignificant people in your daily interactions hoping to meet somebody significant and not realizing that you are missing the whole thing you're missing your whole life in the waiting game in the conceptual waiting game you're missing your whole life and every encounter with another human being is potentially a beautiful meeting with yourself is potentially the most significant event there could be even the briefest encounter when there is a recognition of the other as yourself which is there in the space perhaps brief space of no thought which of course implies no concepts no roles no mental positions there is the end of the illusion of separateness the illusion of separation which has been there for so long and so you meet the ticket collector a casual person you meet on the plane or whatever brief encounters in the day and each time there is the possibility of being there as space not as a little me and its role so that's and that is a beautiful practice which then becomes extended to those people with whom you share more past and the past that you share is of course an accumulation of concepts in your mind about them otherwise there would be no past that you share there may also be certain emotions that are linked to the concepts about concerning those people so you carry a little mental emotional form formation one could almost say entity because thought forms are entities emotional fields are entities they have a life span they are born they die and so you have a for each person with whom you share past you have inside yourself a little mental emotional formation and that is the conceptual image that you hold in your mind for that person when you only know you are completely identified with mind then to you that conceptual emotional image that you hold that is based on past is that person you are completely trapped in that conceptual emotional formation so this is you have constructed it unconsciously not that you have done it it's been done it's done automatically a little entity a little mental formation that when you are totally identified with that to you is that other person is your wife your ex-wife your ex-lover your lover your father your mother your aunt or whoever else it may be with whom you or the person you've worked with for a long time your boss whoever it may be you have that you carry that and that wants to remain in place what tends to happen is then all your interactions with that human being happening through the filter of that conceptual mental entity that you have because you're not seeing who is there you have there will be things in that human being that you cannot see because they're not part of the image that you hold and certainly you cannot see the deeper reality of that human being which is beyond any concepts any story part of the concepts is the concepts form a little story too that's part of that formation so when you're totally identified with that then that is the agent through which you interact with that person you're really interacting with your mental image another thing that tends to happen is all you see from that person then after a while is what corresponds and will strengthen that image that you already hold of that person other things you may not even see because they are not perception is selective so they will be that is how your interactions with other humans become very limited and become totally mind dominated and that is how do you step out of that that prison which first you have constructed for yourself you put yourself into a prison because you have formed the same kind of image for who you are the me the little me as I call it the little me with it's story it's memories it's patterns it's reactive patterns and then the little me forms little other me's around it and that's that's the the prison cell that people inhabit you may not become immediately free of all that but freedom is here as you step out of conceptual thinking that's the beginning of that losing it's overriding hold upon you all those conceptual structures and of course there is a reluctance the conceptual structures these little formations almost entities isn't it amazing that you have a you have a little a little human a little being in there that is called my ex-wife and she lives in here my ex-husband whatever or my wife or my husband after many years of marriage it is not uncommon for partners married couple not they hardly see each other anymore they just have the image of the other there is nobody there just in the distant background there is a body sitting and there is the image body image the old you may have noticed it happens sometimes that when as people become more conscious many of the old conceptual patterns behavior patterns fall away this I am sure has happened to many of you already through the arising of the unconditioned consciousness many of the old patterns become less empowered they just lose their force and then you might meet somebody you have known for a long time family whoever they don't see they to them if they are totally identified with their image they won't even see what you have changed they just continue they want to project the old image they are refusing to let go of that and you might want to say hello I am here they may also resent that somehow they can feel that there is now a clash between who you are and their image and they might become angry because the image doesn't fit anymore what have you done I don't like the way you are now I don't like you are too conscious so with those this is a beautiful challenge those humans with whom you share a lot of past to bring in that openness in your interactions the cause in miracles speaks of relating to another human being without past easier said than done you might say in this moment that human appears in front of you and you are giving that human being an full attention the same attention that you give to the tree or the flower that human being may be going through their conditioned behavior and yet you are simply giving the most powerful thing there is simply giving being attentive listening and looking listening looking to be able to do that there needs to be a yes you have to allow that human being to be here at this moment you might as well because they are here at this moment they are right in front of you I noticed a little to illustrate this a little anecdote I once knew a woman not in a personal not in an intimate relationship an acquaintance who was regarded by most people as one of the most obnoxious people around what here comes trouble would be when she comes you would know she would be accusing you of something wanting something wanting you to get involved in her problems complaining constantly so those were her patterns and I noticed once I was living in a small town where that she also lived two or three times I noticed there was basically only one high street as they call it where the shops are main street in the town I was walking the high street and more than once I noticed myself as I saw her coming the other way was crossing over to the other side but then once or twice or more than that it happened that as I was approaching a corner she was coming around the corner too late and then I noticed a very strange thing the moment she stood in front of me there was space and love the person that I wanted to avoid if I could but when I couldn't avoid her anymore there she was and there was spaciousness and love and next time I would avoid her again but when she couldn't be avoided it was beautiful and a few times in our interactions she felt something something fell away from her and she walked away as if some weight had been lifted there was actually love there it was penetrating and it was beyond those mind structures simply spaciousness was there just a strange a strange thing I somebody noticed once that I crossed to the other side and then asked why are you doing it well it just happened there there was no decision making involved it's like it's very much like avoiding a thunderstorm or downpour of rain if you can if you let's say if you walk this way around and you you this perhaps is similar it's a kind of but if you get caught in the rain and if you say yes it's beautiful so there may be human beings in your life that you would not perhaps choose to interact with and you don't have to unless life puts you in a position where you do have to and then at that moment the totality has determined that this is the ideal situation for you and for that person otherwise that person wouldn't be there so you do not need to seek out those people whom you can't stand but it may be that for some reason this person keeps coming up in your life and the universe is not insane the human mind in its present form perhaps is insane but the universe there is an underlying intelligence at work and that underlying intelligence knows what it is doing things are connected at a deeper level all humans are connected sometimes it comes to the surface as a synchronistic event as a coincidence and you see how is that possible and what you see is only a tiny flash that is coming to the surface of things to show you the interconnectedness of all things on a deeper level so whatever is at this moment is part of the totality and could not be otherwise it is because it could not be otherwise and to so to see the inevitability of is which might mean this human being that I would rather not be with it is challenging or difficult for some reason he or she is in my life and that is your teacher then if there is a human who is there that human must be my teacher what is he or she teaching me what is this unconscious person going to teach me it's teaching you this giving attention listening looking allowing to be this moment as it is and thus going beyond conceptual structures in your interaction and you may well be ready for this even to practice some of you may have a long standing issue perhaps with a parent or somebody very close to you a long history of judgment of resentment carrying that inside and the other person carrying that inside and it may well be that before you do it in the actual presence of that person to be there fully in that spaciousness you might the image may arise in your mind of that human being and you give attention and allow that image to be there in the spaciousness that you are and perhaps you begin then to penetrate to go deeper than the conceptual entity in your head forgiveness is really that ultimately forgiveness is letting go of conceptual identity for yourself and others give them space give them space which is yourself recognize the feelings that you have and the thoughts that you have as formations as formations that live a formation that lives inside you the recognition of it means there is now through the seeing of it as a formation there is space around it that means that is forgiveness that is freeing and because all things are interconnected it is not uncommon for people who do that on an inner level for suddenly to happen that that person suddenly experiences something similar to what you experience some letting go not always the case you don't need it you don't need the other person to go through that also that's a bonus might happen but it has happened and people have reported it as miracles in some cases it's happened that the moment that shift happened when they saw the limitations of the conceptual identity they were holding and space arose which is love around it you don't love that conceptual you don't love the conditioning that entity that you might want to cross the road to go to the other side of the road for you love the being because the being is space and you are space that essential beingness and it's not uncommon for humans who've done on an inner level that shift happened and five minutes later the phone rang and it was that person I've heard similar stories more than once the phone rang and after years of no contact that person rang how is that possible?

because of the interconnectedness of all things so Jesus already pointed to the fact how important in your spiritual life what he called your enemies are how important love your enemies now they understood that in a very limited sense and tried to do it through the structure of thought ok, I've got to try and love him ok ok I just can't I hate him or you hear that and you just but you exclude two or three people from that I love of course him or her don't even mention so that's a beautiful challenge bringing that into those relationships long standing that have passed that spiritual practice so those people who keep cropping up in your life you can't get rid of use them as teachers or presence you're supposed to be with them otherwise they wouldn't be there in some cases it's family members grown up children parents doing mad things you wouldn't associate with them you wouldn't want to be with them in the same room in some cases this is how people feel if he weren't my father my mother we would have nothing in common except for the fact that he or she is my father or mother some people feel that or daughter or son or some other close relation and they're there for a reason you may have more in common than you realize yes you certainly have more in common than you realize this is beautiful the rain the truth being spoken and realized here the possibility of going within could there be a better moment than this moment if you start thinking yes if you don't think no then you realize the goodness of this moment the depths of it the incredible goodness but if you start thinking you will think about a beach in Hawaii perhaps or some other place it's always some other place could there be a better moment can lead you into thinking let me think yes there could be or the question could there be a better moment can take you deeply into this moment and the beauty and sacredness of this moment something that thought cannot capture and so awareness it is known through awareness it's inseparable from awareness so there's always that dimension of the sacred that now is always sacred and that is amazing no matter what form it takes and of course naturally as you become free of the conceptual heaviness you look and listen more attention arises to sense perceptions the sacredness isn't perhaps in the sound of this rain it's underneath it the mind says there is no mystery here water molecules are dripping and when they hit the ground they produce a sound that's the illusion of knowledge you still don't really know what it is the sacredness of course is the space that is inseparable from you in which this happens the world that is arising in you at this moment the phenomenal it's arising in that space the background the noise foreground but it's almost these natural phenomena like rain it's almost as if that space were still coming through even the phenomenon somebody once put it beautifully and said god made everything out of nothing but the nothingness still shines through still and so the nothingness the no thingness the one life beyond form shining through this rain too make the rest of today a time of stillness of going within and also being present without and with just this this moment stay with it it is unlikely that anything significant according to the mind will happen today but go more deeply into the seemingly insignificant and realize how significant that truly is there's not even a tv here so definitely nothing significant will happen we'll address any questions that have survived in your mind tomorrow in the now laughter the only teaching this week has been learning to look and listen in the state of openness not to get entangled in further concepts. There's always the temptation of making a spiritual teaching into a new conceptual structure. Demanding also of a spiritual teaching to answer all questions, to provide a framework through which you can look at the world, which is not the state of looking and listening, the state of openness.

Demanding the security that is provided by a conceptual framework. And that demand is embedded in the human mind, which works in that way. And that way, you can notice it perhaps in yourself by feeling the pull or the push within your mind.

And there may even be some emotions that go with that, because it's all aspects of the mind made self. Noticing the pull or the push in your mind that manifests as a need or more on the conceptual level, a way for the mind to function. And that can be very strong.

And made them into conceptual structures. And the essence of all true spiritual teachings, of course, is to take you out of that trap, to realize who you are beyond the stream of words, thoughts, concepts in the mind. And then the mind comes in and makes a conceptual structure out of the original simple signpost that points the way out of that.

And then come in more and more demands. You demand that how interpreting through that conceptual framework. Philosophy develops.

There's nothing wrong with philosophy. It's a beautiful play. It doesn't take you to freedom.

So wherever humans meet and wherever spiritual teaching happens, arises, the teacher and the taught are one. Wherever spiritual teaching arises, there also arises confusion because the mind will come in and will somehow try to make the mind into concepts in its search for greater security. I need to know this.

And so, of course, there are 100, 200 vital questions that the mind could ask. Some of them, I have them on paper. Others are in the head, some of the heads.

Vital questions, they look, they are important, yes, on their own level. This needs to be addressed, yes. But it is the need for the mind to build something up.

If it is vital, you will know the answer from within. Observe in oneself, observing in oneself, this need to have the universe, reality, arranged so that you can know where things are, how they fit in. That's the need of the mind-made self.

When you step beyond that, you step into the unknown, also the unknowable, into the state of not knowing, which is deeper even than not knowing. There is a knowing in it, not through concepts. This is why we are here.

So the reason for being here in that sense is limited to that, limited to the bare essential. The rest, as Einstein put it, is details. Any further questions?

Of course, the details are very interesting, but no further answers or further questions would enable you to go more deeply now into what's already here. They would only take you more into a conceptualization. If the answer is vital, the question is vital, the answer will be there from within you.

But we are learning to go through life in that state of pure, aware, looking and listening in which the need for immediate interpretation, an immediate need to immediately fit it into, how does it fit into my belief system that is relinquished? It's only there, when that is relinquished, that true intelligence can emerge, and that is an intelligence that's not even recognized by the human mind as intelligence. It goes beyond it.

The mind still functions within that vastness, and yet it's far beyond what the mind could comprehend. We could also say that nothing that has been said here is the truth, because the truth cannot be said. And with most statements, if you look deeply, the opposite is also true, except perhaps, this is true for all thought, except perhaps for thought that denies itself.

This is traditionally the way of Buddhism, teaching through what the truth is not, showing you who you are not, what the truth is not. No positive assertions are made. And one could say this is an extremely wise way of teaching that leaves you with nothing on a conceptual level, potentially, however, the mind is so clever that it has used even Buddhism.

It's taken a few hundred years, and made it also into a big conceptual structure. The original teaching of the Buddha took everything away. It gave you nothing.

That's why the Western scholars who only approached it through the discriminating mind called Buddhism nihilistic, life denying, because it didn't give them concepts to believe in. It took away concepts, left you with the empty space. Can you say something about God, they asked the Buddha.

And the answer was, did you hear the question, they said. So perhaps the only way for thought to be not subject to the polarities or to the opposites, which are also true, is for thought to deny itself, which means that this last statement that I just made is the closest to the truth you can ever get, that it is true for thought, and thought denies itself, then there's some truth there. On a conceptual level, you may disagree or agree with certain words.

It's not that important. But beware of the mind's fascination when it has found something to disagree with. The mind is when they have a beautiful carpet, a huge carpet, huge pattern, beautiful.

And there's a little thing there that shouldn't be there. And you cannot help but continuously look at that. And that in your mind then begins to assume it becomes a thought form that obliterates the carpet, the rest of the carpet, nothing personal in that.

That's what the human mind does. So it sometimes happens during a talk, a statement is made that somebody disagrees with or positively knows that that's not quite true. That's not easy to find, not difficult to find such a thing, a statement that you don't disagree with or you find fault with.

And then you don't hear the rest of the talk anymore because the thought form that objects, takes possession of your mind becomes. And then you might be seething, waiting two hours for the end of the talk, and finally, something that was said to the first five minutes, easy to miss the rest. That's how the mind works.

It's, if this were an academic setting, that would perhaps be very important because that, it works exclusively on that level. But this only, the mind ultimately is only here as a means, the words are here as signposts, not much more than that. And as such, they're not that great either.

It is a wonderful thing. We're not speaking here of content because there's the fascination with the content of your mind. We are speaking here of observing, there's the possibility of observing the structure that is at work underneath whatever the content of your thoughts is.

There's the structure of the mind. It's a wonderful thing to observe in oneself the workings of the mind. When you look underneath the content of mind and then you discover things that I just mentioned, how one thing, it can become fascinated with one thing that assumes importance and obliterates everything else.

You can observe its reactive nature when there is something that you object to that clashes with what you know to be true and you may be right, but observing what that does to you, the fact that you are right is not enough to observe what that rightness, how that operates in your mind, how it obliterates everything else, can easily do that, wants to do that because that's a way of the mind of remaining in control. It's beautiful and wonderful to notice that in oneself. It doesn't mean that there's something wrong with you.

When you notice it, there's something right. So this is part of this teaching, of course, is to see the mind and its workings, to look at it, to notice it, and say, ah, yes, there it is. That's what it does.

That's fine. So this gathering has never been about content. It's not about that, of adding, about adding some content or some information to your mind.

I have no information. And if some information has cropped in here and there, maybe it was even wrong. I really, there is no information.

What is there to say on the level of information here? And so it's not about any kind of content of mind, although it looks like it on the surface. Some outside observer peering through the window might think that all week you've been learning new things because this is an institute.

But that's not really the case. You haven't really been learning anything. I sometimes, I might use that word.

I say we are learning to look and listen, but that's really letting go of that which prevents you from looking and listening. It's an unlearning, perhaps. It's certainly not an adding to here.

That would be dreadful if you went away with your feeling that now you knew more. Watch your mind, as they sometimes say in Buddhism. Be there as the witness.

Don't get too fascinated by the content of the mind, but watch the structure of the mind, what it does, how it does it. The mind wants you, which is thought, wants you to become fascinated by the content of thought. They have a beautiful way in some Buddhist monasteries that I visited, when a monk gets angry with another monk, or nun, for things.

Somebody's talking too much, and in the monastery, when conventionally, you would say, why don't you shut up? But in the monastery, you can't say that because you are practicing loving kindness. So all you can say then, instead of shut up, is watch your mind.

And then the other person goes, that could be an awakening. It could also lead to immediate reaction. And then the words before he knows it, the words come out, why don't you watch yours?

Yes. You can observe how fast and how efficiently the mind may itself goes into, when its sense of self has even been slightly diminished by some comment, something somebody said, or did, or insinuated, or might have insinuated, or said openly, or criticized, or judged you, or situation somehow diminished you, how quickly and efficiently the human mind may itself goes into the repair mode, when its structure, the structure of the self has seemingly been diminished by some comment or judgment, criticism, how immediate the reaction is, and that is the defense mechanism that immediately comes into play, that is designed to repair the injured, sense of self, which is all the structure of thought, the conceptual entity, of course, it's very vulnerable.

So any kind of criticism and so on, leads to, when you're not alert, there is an immediate reaction, which is designed to repair the structure of self, and if possible, as part of that repair job, to diminish the self in the one who just attacked yours. Often, that's what the entire repair consists of, in you diminished me, now I'm going to diminish you, in your sense of self, and that could go on for a long time. Some relationships work on that level of, in companies, corporations, institutions, and so a wonderful thing of those things that you observe within yourself is defensiveness, defensiveness, which is an essential aspect of the mind made self, how it jumps in immediately, cannot tolerate any kind of diminishment, because it's, although nothing really has been taken from who you truly are, but in your conceptual self structure, you have suffered a loss when somebody calls you an idiot, to give a simple, often it's more complex than that, or not as direct, perhaps, but to take a simple example, when somebody either calls you an idiot, or which is the same thing, calls you wrong, you're wrong, that's an, it's an enormous insult to the mind made self to be wrong, and unless there's this, you are there beyond mind, there's an immediate and automatic defense mechanism that comes into play that will defend your position. Whether or not you're wrong doesn't matter anymore, because you're defending your sense of self, and often it's done by saying, no, you are wrong.

You're trying to pull something from him or her, he or she tries to pull something from you, demolish the self. Observing defensiveness in oneself, how automatic it is, and then when you see it, you may no longer be totally dominated by it, and then you can be open to being wrong, and say, me wrong? And you look and see it might be true.

You may be right, or yes, you are right, I got that wrong. I often get things wrong. The more you speak, the more likely that is.

No ultimate truth, even in spiritual discourse, as we know, is possible, so even a simple thing, like saying, I don't know, is very hard for some mind made selves. They must know the answer, because even to the mind made self, even to say, I don't know, is a little diminishment. When my younger brother was 17 years old, and his ego was growing, as it does at that age, I noticed he could never say, I don't know.

Whatever question you asked him about anything, he had to know the answer. Sometimes a complete fabrication that he invented on the spot. And then I suggested that he should try out what it feels like to say, I don't know.

And I said, next time, I'll remind you. And when something came up, and I could see he didn't know, and he was about to explain something that he didn't know about, I said, remember, try it, just try. Say it.

And finally, very reluctantly, he said, okay, I don't know. And I looked at him, and I said, and you haven't died? No, I'm still here.

And as presence arises, emerges from within you, you may even find now, as that awareness is there, that the automatic, unconscious defense mechanism, the self-repair mechanism, may at times no longer operate. And somebody criticizes or says you're wrong, or either designed to diminish your sense of self or could be interpreted as diminishing myself, and there's no automatic reaction anymore. There's simply what one could call allowing the seeming diminishment of oneself, not resisting it.

Of course, you're not being diminished at all. You're diminished in your illusion of self. This is why even that in itself is a spiritual practice.

Not defending yourself, the conceptual self-structure, and allowing what appeared to be a diminishment of yourself, but of course was only a diminishment of the structure of the mind-made self, and that is allowed to be without resistance. This is only possible in the simultaneous arising of presence of space consciousness, because already you sense the deeper levels of your being as space. From there, you can allow the diminishment of the conceptual self to happen, and it's actually a beautiful thing not to resist that.

That somehow was also part of Jesus' teaching, being of course misinterpreted and misunderstood, and that's a wonderful thing when that begins to operate in your life. Then you can actually welcome what is, after all, only a diminishment of the illusion of self, because life, in many different ways, going beyond purely personal situations, life does that to you anyway in many ways. You're going towards that anyway, no matter how you try to build up the self.

In the end, life, one way or another, will demolish it. And that simply happens because you gradually go towards the dissolution of the form and the greatest achievement then also comes to an end. So life, and you go through life and things will happen.

Life will do that to you. Even an illness is such a thing, really. I'm not in control anymore.

The mind will try to somehow fit that in also, and sometimes it manages to fit the illness and enhance my sense of self even through the illness. So clever, the mind-made self, you can do even that. But potentially, the illness can be something that seems to diminish you.

You're not that powerful anymore when you lie in bed. And I've observed in some humans who have a strong egoic self that when they are ill, even a slight illness, a flu, they become more pleasant. They have some insights that they don't have in their normal state.

The ego gets a little weaker. They just, energy isn't there. And they say things they wouldn't have said, and then the health comes back and they're in control again.

The diminishment of self has also in different spiritual traditions been a spiritual path to be practiced as an active thing rather than a passive thing, but that becomes dangerous. If you are actively attempting to diminish yourself, that's dangerous. I don't know how often that has worked in the history of spiritual evolution.

In a few cases, it may have worked, but I don't recommend that because there is behind that somebody who wants to achieve something through my diminishment, and there's a hidden, very easily, a hidden ego that wants to enhance itself through becoming humble, through becoming the lowest of all. Surely I am the lower than you. Surely nobody's as humble as me is implied.

In some cases, in very exceptional cases, perhaps it may have worked. St. Francis perhaps practiced that, but before that, probably some big diminishment happened to him anyway. He was in a war in a very, he suffered greatly and something happened to him there.

He always said, I'm the most miserable of all creatures. Why does God speak through you? They asked him, why does God manifest these wonderful things through you?

They asked St. Francis, because he said, because I'm the most miserable and the lowest of all, and God likes that. He talks in very simple, talked in very simple language. It's, in him, it seemed to have been without ego.

It was genuine. And so there's the, what these, the great teachers leave behind, but it's also your, really the opening is also happening with you. Those are only precursors.

They leave behind, even after their death, an opening, a space. I saw that very clearly this year. We were in India visiting the burial place or the Samadhi, whatever they called it, of Ramana Maharshi.

They were, I don't know if it's, it's just where people walk around every day. They walk around it, hopefully not to gain merit, but to be surrendered in every step. And it's, I was sitting there watching, and it seemed that they were walking around a hole, an emptiness, an open space, being drawn to it.

Three weeks later, we were in Italy, visiting the tomb of St. Francis in Assisi. And the same scene, there was that tomb, and people, continuous stream of people coming in and walking around it. And again, I sensed they're walking around, not a person, not the memory of a person or the remnants of a person, but an emptiness.

They're walking around that, drawn to it, because within them, that same space, which is one, is also emerging and recognizes itself there. So that, of course, to be the space, rather than the object in space, is not what we have learned here. We have unlearned, and we are still unlearning to be the object, to see ourselves as the object in consciousness, the mind object, the mental me.

And we are seeing who we are beyond that as the object, as the space, not the object in space. That's the greatest realization. And that knowing and that seeing can be there every moment, in every sense perception, that happens within the field of spacious stillness.

In every human interaction, that spacious stillness can be there in the background as the essence of your being, as intelligence, so that the foreground of your life, which includes thoughts, which includes whatever arises in your field of perception, includes situations, events, people, the foreground in your life is no longer absolutely important and deadly serious. There is no longer, it loses its heaviness. It is balanced by the other dimension of life, the unmanifested.

And so you go through life having one foot in the unmanifested and one foot in the manifested, a bridge between form and formless. That's your function. And you thought you were a person and you turn out to be a bridge.

And please don't make that into some new concept. The mind then will say, I don't agree with you, this concept of bridge. It's not quite right because you're right also.

Or we are all wrong, comes to the same thing. Space consciousness, to use that term again, just a little pointer. It also, it spreads.

This is a beauty. Each one of you is also a seed for that, the seeds of space consciousness going out, seeds that have already sprouted, even better. Seeds that have already sprouted and you go out into this world somehow, if not yet fully, but somehow embodying that dimension.

Somehow within yourself, you have gone beyond and you are beyond the personal dimension, the exclusively personal sense of self. Even though the personal may at times still manifest, reassert itself from time to time, and yet that deeper dimension of consciousness has already emerged. That cannot be reversed.

It can be obscured temporarily, but that process cannot be reversed. It's happened. It has emerged and it will continue to emerge.

And if it becomes obscured for long, it will push through one way or another. It's even pushing through in humans who are not drawn to any spiritual teaching. It may require some external event to crack the shell of ego.

And it's pushing through. Gently, just like a plant. A plant doesn't, a plant, they say, some plants can go through cement, through concrete.

A plant has enormous power, but it is so gentle. It's just very, very gentle. There's no, it's just enormous power, but extreme gentleness also.

So what comes, forms of leading, and one of the forms is our retreat. There's the external form of our retreat, which is coming to an end, dying, because every, the end of every form is a little death. Even saying goodbye to somebody is a little death.

Each time, little death. That's why in many languages you need to affirm that you're going to see them again. Au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, see you again.

See you, see you. So this is a little death too, as the form comes to an end. Now, that's the form, of course, it's fleeting.

It wasn't that long ago that it started, and we said, this is the now. And then we said that at some later point, we will check in just to see if it's still the now. And now the form has come to an end, and we can check in again.

Still the same space, it's still now. And the essence of our retreat is the timeless dimension, of course, of consciousness, is inseparable from who you are. That cannot end, the timeless cannot end, the essence you carry within.

So, nothing of true value is ever lost when a form dies. And in a little while, this chair may be empty. That's beautiful, because you can then see more clearly where these words came from.

It's a beautiful thing for those years as humans who follow a teacher. It's always a beautiful event, challenging when the teacher dies, which could mean either the body dissolves or the teacher goes away, which some Eastern teachers used to do. They would always run away.

Some still do it. And then you have to say, where has he gone? Oh, he's supposed to be, so, oh, let's go and find him.

Until finally the body dissolves, and then you're, where is he now? Where is she now? Left us.

And finally you're thrown back upon yourself, what all the years he or she has been pointing to, the truth is not here, it's there in you, it's in you, this is just an opening. Yeah, but you. There's such peace coming from you, such beauty coming from you.

How do you know that? Where do you feel that? How do you know it?

Well, here. So where is it? So walk through this world as much as possible.

Without the heavy conceptual self-structure, and that starts the moment you walk out of here. Don't immediately reassume the burden of your life situation in your mind. It may want to reassert itself.

You walk out of here, okay, the retreat is gone, where am I going now? Back to my problems, back to my home situation, back to that, and then while you're traveling home, you're already there dwelling on that. What I have to do, left undone, whenever left.

All the things, okay, and then the facial expression will undergo a change. You're back in reality. And by the time you open your front door, you're already stressed.

Could happen. Or you could just travel home beautifully as a field of awareness at this moment, whether you're driving or sitting on a plane or bus or hitchhiking. Whatever it is, this moment is your life.

And there's the external of it, and that's beautiful too today. Every day if you go deeper, deep enough, so you don't miss the beauty that's external, and you don't miss the beauty, the essence of beauty within, without which you would never recognize any external beauty, the essence of beauty, which is the essence of consciousness, through which beauty is recognized as a reflection. Where is the beauty?

Again, the question, where is that beauty that you see there? Where do you know it? Where is it known?

Where is it recognized? Here. Here.

So there's the essence. A love, a loving interaction, perhaps even someone you met here, some of the people you met here beyond mind, as you look into their eyes, you sense there's that beingness, and there's love. Where is the love?

Where do you recognize the essence of that other person? In here. It is all within the unconditioned consciousness contains that.

It is the essence, not the form. Whatever you see in form is the skimmed milk, and you are the cream. Of course, they are related somehow.

Due to the limitations of form, this form cannot meet and hug each form that's in this room, but that is not really necessary. The hug has already happened throughout the week, and the love, which is only the recognition of yourself, the recognition of not two, one, always just that. We'll have a moment of stillness.

I suggest you stay for just a little while with the empty chair here. Thank you, thank you. Oh yes, we were going to check if it's still now.

I think it is. That's a strange thing to, of course, the way we did it just now, it's a little bit funny, but just to, one could almost say you could, this is not quite right, of course, it's because it's language, but I'll say it. One could almost say you could sense the now, be aware of it, not as something, not as a thing, but as a presence, an aliveness, not something.

And so we've already fallen into an era of creating a subject and an object when we say you can become aware of the now. And that's what happens when one speaks, because that implies now there's two things here. There's you and that which you become aware of.

But the truth is, what we call the now is awareness itself that knows itself, but doesn't divide itself into two. And of course, it cannot be separate from who you are. You are that awareness.

That's the secret that frees you once you know it. Now, knowing it, this is not a knowing that is conceptual, because then you would have a belief, I am awareness could become a concept. But to know directly, here, now.

So our practice is meeting the now fully. We spoke of the possibility of allowing what is to be. And that means not imposing interpretations on it.

So let's use the, where we are, the setting here, the beauty that surrounds us. Let's make it into part of our awareness practice during these days. And see if we can meet nature without imposing labels or mental labels or interpretations on it.

That means we're working, that's a working, not a good word, but one of these days that word is going to disappear from the language, but not yet. Working with our sense perceptions. This is a very important, a very helpful way of stepping out of the stream of thinking.

A little, I've recently started to call it exits. The present of your mind, the present self, the conditioned mind that most people identify with as themselves, as me, that present self has hidden little exits, easy to overlook. It's not really locked, they're open.

And one such exit is quite simply sense perception. That to perceive something fully, visual, auditory, takes you out of conditioned thinking. And I'm, anybody who perceives beauty or beauty is, no matter how briefly, able to step out of mind and perceive without interpretations or labeling, if only for one second.

But more than that, if you're very alert, now most people don't know this, because all they know is their, whatever they perceive is immediately interpreted through the conditioned thought processes. It's compared to something else, you find some personal relationship to it, it reminds you of that, or you simply put a label on it and then you think you know what it is. And you inhabit a flat universe that lacks depth because the lent labels obscure to you the depth that there is, and the aliveness and the sacredness that there is in every living thing.

And living thing includes what the mind calls dead things. Living things includes everything because everything is alive. Even the stone, if you looked into the stone, you could see that there's an intense aliveness there.

Physicists have done it in their way. They know that the stone is an alive energy field.

And matter itself is alive.

It looks to us as impenetrable, solid, and dead, but it's not. So no matter whether we would conventionally call it living thing, realize whatever you perceive is alive. But let's speak specifically here about nature, plant life, and animal life.

Of course, mineral is also very beautiful. So usually, you perceive through the screen of conceptualization. And that is a deep-seated habit that we inherit, a collective mental habit.

And perhaps until recently, there was not much chance of getting out of it. But now, the possibility is there of stepping out of that deep-seated collective conditioning and see that it is possible to meet perceptions in the field of simple awareness. In many of you, if you are alert, you can observe an interesting phenomenon.

When you first perceive something, it could be a visual perception. It could be an auditory perception. Suddenly, you hear a bird singing.

Or visually, you turn this way, and suddenly, you see a tree in the most amazing colors. And if you're alert, you can catch that first moment of perception, auditory, visual. Something new arises in the field of perception.

And there's a little space always when something new enters your field of perception in which the labeling has not started yet. That is the moment, really the moment of true perception. And that moment is a moment of inner stillness where thought processes don't operate.

There's a gap. And then, thought processes usually come in. And that gap is missed by most people.

And to the mind, it is not significant because to the mind, all that is significant is thoughts. If you can't think any thoughts about something, it is insignificant to the thinking mind. And so there probably, not probably, I'm certain that there are many people in this room, not only who, in the first moment of perception, almost everybody does that, the first moment of perception, there is the freedom from labeling, but it's not recognized.

But there are many of you here who already find in their everyday life there are moments of more prolonged non-labeling of perceptions. And that is quite amazing. That is incredible shift in consciousness from the labeling mind to the free, unconditioned spaciousness in which that arises.

And I suggest here as a practice to be alert, especially to that first moment. And if you recognize that there's a moment when you first perceive something, a leaf, a stone, a tree, or the totality of field, a grove of trees, and if you bring awareness to that, then that awareness itself will be there for longer. If you are aware of that space of awareness that is there the moment you first perceive something, and then the sense perception happens within a field of stillness.

That is, you bring the stillness into the sense, it's perceived against the background of stillness. And then perhaps at some point the labeling mind may come in, if only to say, oh, you see, there's the stillness. It's possible.

So that is a practice, especially these days that you're here. Interact with nature in that way. Then, of course, everything becomes, really comes to life, becomes alive.

However, there's something in you that doesn't want to do that, because there's the fear that you might be losing something important. And that fear is the fear of the mind, which says, I won't know anymore. The mind says, I won't even know what this is.

The strange thing is, all the mind knows is one particular kind of knowing that is through conceptualization, through labeling. There is a deeper knowing in which you know without the limitations of concepts. But that knowing is, to the mind, looks like not knowing anything anymore.

And really, that is the state in which a greater intelligence operates, perceives through you. But to the mind, it's like you've lost something. It's because you haven't lost anything.

The labels, you know them when you need them. They are still there. You can get them out of the filing cabinet, or whatever analogy we can use in computer language.

I don't know that. Retrieve it from the data banks. Oh, that's what it is.

You retrieve it. When it's needed, the label is there. A lot of the time, it's not only not needed.

It limits you tremendously to be trapped in a world of labels. A conceptualized universe, when you only know concepts, labels, thoughts, you inhabit a conceptualized universe. Everything is immediately made into concepts.

Some people are so good at it. Unfortunately, in our culture, the better you are at it, the more intelligent they think you are, if you can manipulate concepts. And so that's, you can get your PhDs in that way.

I can, there's nothing wrong with PhDs if you're not trapped there. And that conceptualized existence, it's not only something you do to nature. You do it to people and to yourself.

You conceptualize your own life into a series of thought forms and call it me. And then you do it to others. Conceptualize who people are.

And some people are very good at that, too. The moment they meet somebody, they just look at you just to find out what makes you tick. And then after two or three minutes, they have it.

They've got it. Now, sometimes that thing of just working out what this person is all about, some people are actually very good at it. But all they can ever find out is the conditioned mind of that person.

And on that level, they may even be right. On the level of the egoic conditioned mind, what they say might be, I'm sometimes surprised when people come to me and say, what did you think of this person? And I say, I don't know.

And then they say, well, let me tell you about him. This is how he is, that's what he really wants. He's doing this in order to manipulate you and to do this and that and that.

Oh, maybe they're right. But another thing that they do is then they get, they don't see that as being the level of conditioning. And from then on, whenever they relate to that person, they relate through the screen of their interpretation, which of course, no matter who you are dealing with, it is extremely narrow and limited.

It is not the reality of that human being. It may be an aspect of the conditioning that is operating there, pretending to be somebody, but it's not, it cannot touch the reality of that human being. Every human being carries all possibilities within, including Buddhahood, Christhood, every saint.

And it has happened that the greatest criminal turned into a saint. When the conditioned entity broke down, through intense suffering, it can happen. Fortunately, not to you because you're here.

If you were not here, it would happen through intense suffering. That is the grace that is there through suffering. It erodes eventually, suffering is created, you could say, by this mind-made entity to a large extent.

People create their own suffering. Humanity creates its own suffering. And yet, there is built into the egoic madness, the element of grace, and that is the very suffering that is created by that limited experience.

And that exclusively personalized sense of self destroys in the end that sense of self, that limited sense. It erodes it. And so sometimes you find in people who have suffered a lot physically or in other ways, they become very simple, a childlike state, not childish, childlike.

That is the state of great openness, clarity. That is the state of being free of mind, where a deeper intelligence operates. And it happened to them through suffering.

And to some of you, suffering brought you here. And the rest happens here. So that gets eroded during this.

And every week, it gets eroded in a more pleasant way here. Although some of you may be in suffering as you sit here. Can't stand any more of this.

And you project yourself away from here, seeing yourself in the car driving home. And if you do jump in the car and drive home in the middle of the retreat, then just before you get home, you will think that you have failed miserably. You've left the retreat and now it's all gone.

It's always the other. The other, where you are not, is always where you should be, of course. So what we called this morning, and it seemed a very, first, a very passive thing when this morning we said, when you allow what is to be the isness of this moment, then something reveals itself to you that is beyond the form that this moment takes.

And the form may appear limiting. The formless life consciousness is known through not reacting to the forms that appear. Where do they appear?

In the field of now. If you react to the forms in the field of now, your own form, psychological form of me, gets strengthened. That's why the me likes reacting, because it strengthens that I.

And you can observe it in other people or in yourself. When you react against something, perhaps wanting to be right or, you can see how, on one level, satisfying it is. And why is it satisfying?

In reality, of course, it's painful. It is a form of pain. The body knows that, because the energy, it cannot flow anymore.

The energy field of the body stagnates. The body knows it's painful, but the egoic entity thinks it's great, because you've enhanced your sense of self. The enemy is there, and it feels great.

And some people even say it feels great after shouting at somebody and say, oh, that feels better. And so, observe that you allow it, and that takes you beyond form. Your sense of self is no longer in form.

It is deeper than any form. So, the easiest practice, and that's why we start here, is as you meet nature, nature exists beyond mind. Nature is pre-mind, one could say.

It exists in a much greater state of oneness with a source than humans. Humans have gone out of that much further. Nature is more deeply connected to the source, animals, plants.

So, to enter the state of what is ultimately a state of no thought, I wasn't going to say it so soon in the retreat, not to frighten anybody, the state of no thought, it is helpful to meet any natural phenomenon, a plant, an animal, that lives in that state of no thought. They also are expressions of consciousness, but they don't inhabit a conceptualized universe. The dog does not have a self-concept, or a problematic sense of self.

A cat doesn't, or anything that lives, the bird, the bird simply hasn't separated itself and says, that's me. It doesn't derive its sense of identity from conceptualization in the mind. It hasn't created that split.

It just is an expression of the one in form, limited through its form, yes, but a beautiful expression of that. And so, it is often, a great meditation, if you can watch a tree, a flower, or a dog, or a wild, or a bird. It does not stimulate thought, because it operates beyond thought.

Conscious, yes, but not through conceptualization. Now, we are not returning to that state. This is not where we are going, because that would be a falling back.

It would free you from a lot of suffering, yes. And some people seek to return. They can't stand their mind anymore.

They cannot stand the painful sense of self, that burden that I have to live with, me. Living with me every day is dreadful. I wouldn't wish it on my worst enemy to live.

I'm just giving an example of the. So many people perceive life as a burden, a great burden. And every morning you wake up and you find yourself.

Now, you may think what you find is the problems in your life, but it really is the heaviness of the sense of self that looks out there for some kind of liberation or freedom and is not getting it. All you ever encounter is some other limitation and little brief moments of apparent freedom, which turn out to be illusions. So, that is the self that has a heaviness to it.

And an animal doesn't carry that burden. It is limited through its form, yes. But it lives in alignment, in greater alignment than humans.

And so, its existence is not problematic. And it dies with great ease compared to humans. And in some cases, human beings are kept sane by their animal.

That's why some people, they have a dog or a cat, and it's the one thing that keeps them, it's their anchor to a dimension beyond conceptualization and mind. They have this anchor there. They've also, animals that humans keep fulfill an incredible function, an anchor of sanity.

And you can see with some animals how unhappy the master is, the owner of the animal, and how carefree the dog is. Even after having lived for five years with this person, the dog is still joyful, greeting every moment with joy. And so, I saw a little sticker recently to put on the fridge, which said, God, please let me be who my dog thinks I am.

Now, of course, the truth is that the dog doesn't think. That's why he's in joy. And that's why the dog relates to you.

He doesn't relate to the conceptualized you. He relates to the you beyond, that's hiding behind the conceptualized me with its problems. Amazing.

In everyone, of course, that dimension is there, the unconditioned, pure consciousness. And it's wanting to emerge. That's one way of putting it.

It wants to emerge. It wants to flower through humans. And that's why we are here.

So, although you may have tried to escape from the prison of your conditioned mind by going into drugs or seeking some kind of escape, moving, wanting to get out of the mind, drinking sometimes helps a little bit, not for long, but you take, you're being, you're then taken into unconsciousness. You're moving out of your mind. Yes, it feels liberating, yes, but you're moving towards sleep.

And sometimes it's nice when you get very tired, you can't think about your problems anymore. And then there's a moment before you reach sleep when you feel quite good. And then you go to sleep.

But we are not leaving mind by going that way. We are stepping beyond mind. And with that comes an alertness.

Freedom from thinking, yes, but at the same time, there's wakefulness and alertness, not moving towards unconsciousness. But nature is very helpful because it teaches you to live in no mind. So in the way you meet, there's a deeper empathy with nature when you don't impose on it the screen of conceptualization.

There's a very deep meeting that takes place when you perceive nature in that way. And this is an ideal place surrounded by all this beauty of perceiving in that way. And it is a significant event, cosmic, going far beyond the personal when you perceive nature in the state of not labeling, in the state of still awareness.

Nature itself finds its fulfillment at that moment through you because you are not separate. And within the oneness, nature sees itself through you. It loves that, its own sacredness.

The tree, the flower become aware of themselves. This sounds a little mystical, but that's how it is. So the essence here, we begin with nature because nature is so helpful.

Just be aware for a little while of when you first see something. Bring some alertness into your, when you walk around here, sit. Be there as a field of alert presence and see that it is quite possible to step out of the habitual labeling mind for how long doesn't matter really.

More important, often you step out of the labeling mind. Then the rest looks after itself. Once that movement has started, and this is miraculous, the current of awareness that has begun to come through what before was a heavy layer of conditioned mind stuff, once this current of awareness has begun to move through you, it has an intelligence of its own.

It is pure intelligence. And that then operates, it's become free, and you don't have to be concerned very much. It flowers by itself.

So sense perception is extremely important here. It is one way in which you can leave the prison of the conditioned mind. And then you may notice when you perceive in such a way, there's the form that you perceive, whatever it may be, and one could say there's a stillness in which the perception happens.

That's the field of awareness. At first, this is not something you can know as an object because it's the very essence of all knowing. You cannot know that as an object of knowledge.

You can only be it, you are it. And even here, sitting here, you can sit here and think about your story or the next moment or the last moment where you're going to be. Or you can be here as a field of aware presence.

And the goodness that we spoke of that you find when you allow this moment to be as it is, because this is allowing this moment to be as it is, not imposing an interpretation. And if an interpretation comes, recognize it as a mind, an interpretation. Not totally believe in it, not totally be absorbed by it, just see it.

Yeah, there's the conditioned mind which comes up with its, whatever it says. And then you go back to the perception itself. So the goodness that is hiding underneath, no matter what form this moment takes, that is an aspect of that unconscious, sometimes very obscurely sense that there is something in them that is greater.

There is a goodness that they cannot quite access. It doesn't seem to operate when they operate in their everyday life. It may break through occasionally, accidentally almost, sometimes in moments of great danger.

When they're threatened by death, it could break through when the conditioned mind subsides because it can't cope anymore with the urgency of this moment. So almost everybody senses that in some obscure way, they know that there is something in them that is greater than what they manifest as their everyday existence. That may be pitiful.

What they manifest in their everyday life may not be great. There may be a lot of wanting and needing and me against you on a small level, whether it's on a little level or whether it's you become the CEO. CEO is becoming a dirty word these days.

But there's no difference on C. It's just on a bigger scale, a bigger egoic scale. That's all.

That's why it's more noticeable. The greed of the ego, the greed, the need for more. There's a fly buzzing around my head looking for something.

So that then, what many people obscurely sense within emerges is an aspect of the unconditioned love of joy, aliveness, compassion. It dwells there in that dimension. So then that also begins to operate through you in your interactions with the world, the unconditioned.

So this is why it's what at first sight seems so insignificant when I say go to nature. Look at the tree and be completely there in the looking. Allow the perception to arise in a field of stillness.

At first seems, well, okay. Okay, I've done that now. What do I do now?

Next thing. To the mind it seems insignificant and yet nothing is of greater significance than that. And because it's through that the unconditioned emerges and then those qualities that are an inseparable part of that dimension flow out into this world.

You begin interacting with nature because nature helps you. The next level up then is interacting with human beings that you know superficially, people you've just met, people that you come into contact with casually and people perhaps on the retreat that you meet and we'll be addressing that in more detail also to bring that non-labeling awareness into your interactions with other human beings. Then an enormous change happens on the planet when more humans interact in the way in which you don't impose conceptualization on other humans.

So we'll be addressing that more. Nature is easier. Humans are more difficult.

So you begin with nature and nature will continue to be extremely helpful in this. And that in itself is of the benefit of, is incredible, the way in which that deepens your life, the way in which you interact with nature, the depths that is there when you allow the mystery that is every living being to be there. Yes, you still know the label if you should need it but the mystery that is there that is covered up by the label that says three, the depths that is there, it's just inconceivable.

And the aliveness that is there that some people have glimpsed when they took acid that perhaps was their first time they glimpsed something that's beyond conceptualized mind and the teapot suddenly became intensely alive. It wasn't a teapot anymore. But then you've come back again.

That is not the way. So this is much better than acid. But for some people it's been a little glimpse of stepping out of the prison of conceptualized thought into an intense aliveness.

So the mystery that is there, what, how absurd to think that you know when the moment you have put a label onto something. And children become conditioned at an early age in that way when they learn language. And the human mind wants that in the child because the human mind says, what's that?

And then the father or mother says, that's a tree. And then the child repeats, tree, tree. And the illusion that the child then now knows what it is has already started.

Next time, the next day, the child sees a tree. Before the child was looking, that was pre-mind. And that you find in very young children when you see them, mind hasn't started yet and yet consciousness is already there of their surroundings.

And they look, they are all little Buddhas. And then they look at you. And that also some humans are drawn to little children as they are drawn to animals because they feel they are not being judged.

They know that the dog or the little child, the pre-mind child is not imposing a label on them. They find freedom there. So they are drawn whenever they see a little child, they go there, oh.

Oh, yes, it's beautiful. And then a moment comes in the child's life when the conceptualizing mind wants to start. And the questions start, what is that?

It's demanding labels. So one day the child is looking at the tree in openness and wonder. That is still the state of oneness.

And the next day it has learned the word tree. And then it looks at the tree and there's still a moment, the gap is still there that I mentioned. And then it remembers the label tree.

Oh, tree, tree, tree, yeah, that's right, that's what it is. And now let's go on to the next thing. For many humans from that moment onwards, they don't really look at the tree anymore because they think they know what it is.

And this is just one tiny example of then thousands of concepts. And then being imprisoned in that. And then having concepts about me.

That's who you are. So going beyond all that is liberation. The ancient word that's been used for thousands of years, free, free from what?

Free from the conditioned mind. So nature, that in itself is an enormous shift when you can go into nature and interact in that way. And yes, you look upon everything.

That is love. Anything that is not labeled as you perceive it is looked upon with love. Not the love that the mind talks about that says, come here, I lead you.

I love you because I need you. I won't let you go. You're mine.

Or I love this flower so much that I'm going to take it home with me. It's not that kind of love. Very wisely in the Spanish language, the expression I love you is the same as the expression I want you because that is the usual way in which what is called love by the mind.

But the true love emerges whenever there's the absence of conceptualization, of labeling. And that is why the dog loves you continuously. And that is why the little child can look, no matter who the child looks upon, there is that openness.

It doesn't judge a person as ugly. The openness is there. The label isn't there yet.

So nature is an access point. It is an opening for that. But also including inanimate nature.

Let's call it inanimate nature. There's the beautiful realm of minerals. Wonderful.

The earth itself, the stones, the aliveness that is there. And even man-made, human-made things have an aliveness, especially if there's still some closeness to nature, like things made of wood, natural materials. But even synthetic things, yes, they too are alive, a little bit more removed from the human body.

From the source, perhaps. But yes, also a temporary expression of consciousness. So you can sit in your room, perhaps, let's say, the room where you're staying here, or the room, let's say, with here, and just briefly sit and be there, look around, and perceive your surroundings without needing to label.

Innocent perception, you could call it. Not wanting anything from something. Not comparing, just letting it be.

Don't go on for too long because from that state of having gone beyond mind, as this is something new for most humans, it is possible to go from that state of having gone beyond mind to a state of alertness, and suddenly you fall below mind into sleep. Until that becomes a more habitual state in you that can happen. So that's fine too.

Beautifully expressed, there was a film about golf playing, The Legend of Bagger Vance, where somebody's learning to play, or relearning to play golf, and his teacher is showing him how to be present, how to step out of mind. In one line, the teacher says, he's now learning how to stop thinking without falling asleep, because only then can he play well. And every sportsman who does well knows that, that that state is the state of freedom from thinking, of absolute alertness, clarity, relaxed alertness and clarity.

And so a few people, we mentioned artists earlier, some sportsmen have access to that in their field of activity. And here it is emerging as your normal state of consciousness. It's becoming your normal state of consciousness.

Thought is still there, yes. Will continue to be there for quite a while, quite a while. As long as you are here in the body, thought will also still be here.

And yet, there's a freedom. Thought moves, it is no longer problematic, it is no longer invested with self. You're not seeking yourself in thought forms anymore.

That's the liberation. And thought is recognized as thought. You don't, you're not totally trapped in every thought that comes.

So all that is the shift in consciousness that this gathering is part of. Transitional period is when thought loses its capacity to make you unhappy, but it still operates. But you don't believe totally in the judgments of your mind anymore about yourself, about your life, what it tells you about your life, how you have failed or been treated unfairly by life, whatever the story may be.

It's the old conditioned thought forms. And your sense of self does not reside there anymore. So use the access, the exit, the little exit door that is nature.

Bring that alertness to your perceptions. And if thoughts come occasionally, let them come and go without fighting it. There's no point in fighting thought.

That's more thought. Allow the thoughts to come. It might even be a nice thought.

You look at a flower in the spaciousness of presence and then the thought comes, isn't that beautiful? It's nice. And then the thought subsides and there's more spacious presence.

And then some other thought comes. It's fine. And as you sit here, listen to these words as if they were coming from within you, because they are.

They're not somebody else's words. The truth is coming through. Consciousness speaks, that's all.

It doesn't matter through which form it speaks. Consciousness speaks, is pointing the way back to itself. So here too, you just simply sit here being present.

Alert, awake. That is the essence of all meditation. But it's no longer a separate activity.

It's now. Every moment. Once I had a group, we were addressing just this and somebody put her hand up and said, when do we start meditating?

This is the meditation. And you are learning. Once the momentum of mind has taken you over again, and that will happen.

It's been there for so long, it has a momentum still. The mind will come back. It could come back even as you're sitting here, in which case you will no longer be here.

You could be gone. And you notice it. You're not seeing anymore.

You're not perceiving anymore what's around you, only just enough not to bump into things. But when you can watch a person whose attention is totally drawn into thinking, there's very little outflow through eyes. There's an absence in the eyes.

I can demonstrate it, perhaps. Ah! Ah!

Ah! Ah! Nobody there.

Not here. Ah! So your consciousness is being absorbed by thought processes.

It all goes in here. And then, not long after that, but if that happens to you, and it probably will at some point, and then you can then, suddenly you become aware that once this has started, it won't be very long before some form of suffering will appear. And then those thought processes will go more dense.

And then the emotions you will feel that accompany those thoughts. And then you might go to your partner and you say, you know, I've been thinking. More often than not, whenever anybody comes to you and says, you know, I've been thinking, you know, here comes trouble.

And so that may happen to you. And then you will notice some form of suffering arising and some form of suffering arises. And that's a little signal that says, you must have lost the now.

Where's the now? Now? And that entity, one could call it, that is now there, it's a temporary little, because everything is life form.

Every thought is a life form. And a conglomeration of thoughts pretending to be a personal me is a temporary, one could say, life form, a temporary formation. And that temporary formation wants to continue in existence as that formation.

Like every life form wants to remain as that life form. It resists metamorphosis. And I'm sure if we could know the inner life of a caterpillar, the caterpillar too would resist its metamorphosis into a butterfly until the last moment.

No, I'm not becoming a butterfly. There is a certain inertia in every form. The form, you can see it in children or sometimes adults.

You're tired, but you don't want to go to bed because there's an inertia in the state of being awake. You want to remain, you're not really awake anymore. And then when you're in bed, you don't want to get out of bed.

There's an inertia in that state. With children, you have it very often. There's an inertia in every form.

So the thought forms want to remain as those thought forms. So there is a, and that is the, they want, they will resist anything that would bring about a shift in consciousness. So there is something in you, and it's fine, that doesn't want to be free.

And that's a strange realization. There is something in me that does not want to be free. And that, you might think, is that a personal fault of mine?

No, there's nothing personal in that. That pretends to be a personal entity or personal matter. That in me wants to be taken seriously and be somebody, me.

But it is not a personal matter at all. It is a universal mind pattern. That principle of inertia is in you.

And it will find many reasons and excuses why you cannot be present now and why this moment is not important at all. Because I have far more important things to think about. It can give you many convincing arguments why it's not going to work for you.

You might as well forget it. It's all nonsense anyway. I mean, you've got all that nonsense about change in consciousness.

This is real, your problems are real. The falling shares are real. Your financial situation, that's real.

And so it'll come up, it'll tell you what is real, what matters. Because it doesn't want to go. And it comes up with things that you need to think about now.

At night especially. Very important. There's nothing you can do, you're lying there, but.

And so what conventionally is called worry, what it simply means, uncontrolled negative thought processes that are projecting themselves into future, if that's what worry is. I'm sure it's not the dictionary definition, but totally identified with mind movement, creating situations and problems that are not here now. What could happen, might happen, probably will happen.

And so at night those things can start up very strongly. And so the possibility of you noticing that so that the other dimension can come in is greater now, especially after having endured or enjoyed our retreat here. Even if you think, and you probably will think because the thinker doesn't know what's going on here, even if you think that nothing is happening here, sitting here is quite enough for something to shift inside you.

And the thinker, even if the thinker says, no, it's not happening, nothing is going on. So to recognize the mind, to recognize the momentum behind it and the inertia that is there, it doesn't want to stop worrying. The worrying entity, the thinker, do you think the thinker wants to stop thinking?

Or do you think the worrier wants to stop worrying? Its whole existence is worrying. Well, conventionally you all know this because we all know people who you ask, who would they be if they couldn't worry about something?

But that is a pattern more strongly developed in others, in some than in others, that is in everyone. So the thinker does not want the end of thinking. The worrier, which is the thinker intensified, doesn't want the end of worrying.

The worry has a momentum too. Particularly if the pattern of worry gets connected to the latent pain, emotional pain, that humans carry in here. And that's what the thinker likes to do.

The thinking entity, the self, to keep itself going, it links into the, what I sometimes call pain body, which is the accumulation of pain from the past that humans carry, the residue goes back a long way. It's collective to a large extent, collective human pain inherited through thousands of years of madness, hundreds of thousands of years of suffering inflicted by humans on themselves and on each other. And your personal life too.

Every child suffers coming into this world through the unconsciousness around them. And so you carry that inside, and the worrier and the thinker and the mind made self, when they don't, when it's to gain more momentum, will link into that energy field of emotion, the old emotion of pain. And that will energize those mind movements.

And that is what keeps the self entity going again and again very strongly. The old pain that gives energy to thought processes. And you think you're worrying about certain things in your life, but really you're acting out 100,000 years of human pain that are here.

Then the mind finds some kind of explanation. It's made into something personal, me. So to bring presence into that, we'll be addressing in more detail the pain body also, but just here to see that when it happens.

And once this movement has started, something is operating in you, an energy field, almost one could say a temporary entity that does not want an end to the pain. It does not want an end to the worry. It wants to carry on worrying.

You can find that out for yourself if at that moment somebody pointed out to you the possibility of stepping out of that, which is there. The possibility of recognizing that pattern and stepping out of it. If you're totally identified with a pattern, you will deny that possibility because you are not speaking.

The pattern is speaking. The conditioned entity is speaking. And you will say, this is absolute nonsense.

Whatever arguments it comes up with, it will say there's no such thing as present moment. I'm not interested in, leave me alone with that nonsense of present moment. This is what matters.

And this is how it is. That's what's going to happen. So to compensate, one could almost say, for the enormous momentum of that, what we could call the movement of unconsciousness in humanity, which is not a personal problem, not anybody's personal problem, but that undeniably very still, very powerful movement of unconsciousness that is in humanity.

Even after this retreat, you may not be totally free of that. May. And so what is needed, and yes, it is happening, the arising of that which is beyond that needs to be more powerful than that.

Not that it is fighting anything. It's not fighting that. In its vastness, it contains that and then dissolves it.

But the arising of presence needs to be intense. Otherwise, you will be totally drawn in again and again into the old movement of unconsciousness. Now, can, the question is, can you make that happen?

Can you make the arising of the unconditioned presence, can you make it more intense, or is it something that just happens by itself? And the answer is not clear-cut. It is yes and no.

Can you make it happen? Yes and no. From one perspective, yes.

You can, as I sometimes call it, you can take up the sword of presence that says, only this is real. Only this moment is real. And what is the problem at this moment?

That cuts through the problem-making conditioned mind which needs past and future to continue to manufacture its problematic sense of self. To cut through, to access in yourself presence that cuts through all that and says, okay, stepping out of mind by choice into the aliveness and freedom of this moment. You can do that, one could say.

You can do what the Zen master described as the essence of Zen when he raised, he would only ever do one thing when he asked, what is the essence of Zen? This, intense presence. He never said that.

Alertness, presence, be here fully. And that is something you can do. You can choose presence.

Now nothing that I say or anybody says is totally true. And even that statement is not totally true. Reality is far deeper than could ever be contained in any one statement.

You can choose presence because presence is already arising in you and through you. And that can give you the feeling that yes, I can choose presence and that's good. I wouldn't say that to anybody because it would not be true for them.

If not enough presence is arising, you can't choose presence. So let's, why not, instead of trying to somehow resolve the paradox of the seemingly contradictory statements, why not allow the seemingly contradictory statements to be there because they point beyond themselves to a greater truth? The mind says, no, let's work this out, yes or no?

And it would even fight. If it has chosen the yes, it'll fight against the no. And that is a wonderful thing because, and we can do that now, this is an example of allowing mental positions to be there and allowing different mental positions to coexist also without believing that one position encapsulates the entire truth.

Now the mind will tell you, will you not, will I not become totally be paralyzed because I won't know what to do anymore? If I do not subscribe to one way of looking at things, what was going to be the motivating factor? And the motivating factor will no longer be thought.

The intelligence of the unconditioned consciousness will motivate you, things will happen, it will move through you and action will happen when it's needed, but not through adopting and defending a mental position because defending my mental position, whatever it may be, implies you're fighting other mental positions. And an extreme manifestation of that is the terrorist, for example, or whatever else. It's totally being trapped in a conceptualized sense of us or self and totally making a conceptualized identity for others so that they are not alive anymore.

Other humans are mental concepts as such. It is totally fine to kill them because they are no more than, they are dead mental concepts. Whatever label you have put onto them, you have already killed them with your labels.

Whether or not you then kill them physically doesn't really, almost doesn't matter anymore. You've done it already, almost. So being trapped in conceptualization, the movement of unconsciousness is still in you, yes.

The choice is there now. For the choice to be there, you need to recognize that you have been trapped in mind, that you are trapped in mind. And a good sign is suffering in your life, any kind of suffering.

You've lost the now. Re-enter the now. One way is sense perceptions.

Sense to truly, in the way that we described, truly perceive with acute awareness.

Another one is allowing this moment to be as it is. It's a little exit too.

And a beautiful one is the inner body, feeling the aliveness in your inner energy field. That takes attention away from thinking. That's another exit out of the prison of mind.

That may be particularly helpful when the worry pattern starts. If that's the pattern, worry is a form of fear. At night, for example.

All that's needed is notice that it's happening to you. That requires already a minimum of awareness. If you don't have that, you have no choice.

Because you are totally the worrier. Worry, W-O, and the other one too. You're totally the worrier, and then you have no choice.

So the fact that there is choice means there's at least a minimum of awareness. Even in the midst of unconsciousness, being taken over by the momentum of the mind, there's still the minimum of awareness that knows that you're being taken over by the mind. And at that moment, choice becomes in.

But that is not up to you. It's by the grace of the divine that that minimum of awareness is there in you. And there, the choice is there.

And again, it's only a perspective to step out. And the worrier will tell you, no, I can't, no point. That's another thought.

Should you totally believe in that thought? No, there's a thought that says you can't possibly get out of it, and you really need to think about this. And then you do it anyway.

It is very, that mind is very clever with arguments and trying to convince you why not. And then you do it anyway. You can't possibly, you can't feel the inner body now.

What's the point in even trying to feel the inner body with what's going on in here? There's no point in even trying. And then you do it anyway.

And then you sense there's an aliveness in your hands and your feet. And the rest of the body. Who says you can't feel your body?

That was just a thought. And then attention moves there. And it is quite possible, within a minute or two, you can shift from a boring entity to feeling intensely alive and present in your entire energy field.

And that means the inner body becomes an anchor for staying present. It's your anchor. And then you will notice the pull of the mind of wanting your attention back.

And it'll then come up with some other thought. Just before you go in, just think about this. And then it pulls your attention half out again.

And for a moment, you're back in that. And then you notice it again and you're back in the body. And then you have to walk on the razor's edge of now for the rest of lying awake that night.

Because if you leave the now, you suffer. And another thought comes. You leave the now.

And then you're back. That is beautiful practice. Most of you probably drive cars.

Another wonderful field of practice to drive your car in presence. You're less likely to have an accident also. Mostly when you drive your car, you're thinking about something else.

It's on automatic. You're not thinking about the driving, and nor should you be, because you wouldn't be driving very well if you were thinking about. So it's automatic.

Something else is driving. But why not just be still while you drive and perceive everything? Very aware of the movement.

Very alert. It's amazing how many people personalize the act of driving. So it's regarded as normal.

They personalize going from A to B behind the wheel of a car. It becomes a personal struggle. With other drivers, they get angry.

They shout. It's simply the movement of traffic. No different from the weather or any other movement, life movement.

But they personalize it because the me strengthened itself through having, where's my enemy? The enemy is right there. I always say, beware of driving pain bodies.

What does a driving pain body want without knowing it? The driving pain body wants something to go wrong. To have more pain.

And sooner or later it will. All that he or she needs is another driving pain body in the vicinity. So our practice here for nature, your own room, walking from A to B, not making that movement into a means to an end, needing to get there.

Just be there at every step. The next step is not going to be more important than this one. The arriving is not going to be more important than this moment.

Be there within every step. Walk along around the campus here as a field of aware, alert, alive presence without carrying the burden of your story and think about it as you walk. Or I say, I wonder what's going on in the world.

What's in the news? Not good. It wasn't good last week.

It's not good this week. And when you get home and you listen to the news again, it'll still be the same. The news are very selective.

The collective mind says this is important and this is important and this is important. That's the news. It overlooks a lot.

There's a wonderful person living here on campus, a great artist. He arranges all these flower arrangements that we see in different places with leaves and most incredible awareness has gone into that. I believe his name is Jonathan, if I remember rightly from last year.

Just the most amazing example of beauty that is created whenever something is being performed in the state of presence and the love that flows into the doing naturally, any doing that arises out of presence. And he can take any objects, a few dead leaves or dying leaves, a little bit of moss and a little bit of that and puts it together and it's a creation of great beauty. That is also very helpful to look upon anything that was created out of that state of consciousness, can reflect that state back to you, can give you a reflection of that state that's the essence of art probably, to give you a reflection of the state out of which it came, which shines through the form.

Every great work of art is more than what you see. It can't really define it through concepts. It's always more and something shines through that is not the form and that is the state of consciousness out of which it came.

And when you look upon it rightly, which means in the state of aware presence, it can strengthen and deepen that state in you. That is the beauty of art. And probably even relatively unconscious human beings, deep down, they can sense something when they look at a work of art and they may treasure it.

It's very deep, they feel something. They somehow, they don't always recognize it. There's probably been great art that's never been recognized.

And in the case of some great artists, they were never recognized in their lifetime. I don't know who, perhaps it was Van Gogh, who never sold a single painting in his lifetime. Nobody wanted to, not interested.

Nobody was really looking. So something shines through. So, and even anything made, a craftsman makes, can also happen, doesn't have to be a great painting.

Anything that a craftsman has spent a long time being present with, not a means to an end, giving attention, the flow of attention, which is awareness, which is presence, goes into that and then the object embodies that. It embodies quality in its deepest sense. And it's always, there's always an aspect of sacredness to that, always.

But whether or not you make something, only a few of you will be making something with your hands or in whatever way, it doesn't, presence manifests in so many different ways. It can also manifest entirely outside the world of form with just you sitting there, listening to someone, not even saying anything, just being there as spacious presence. One more thing here, little movements, perform little movements and be present with that.

Just little, whatever you might be doing naturally when you put on your shoes or your feet move into your sandals, or you tie your shoelaces. Usually you would be thinking about the next thing, but why not just be there? And there's a stillness around the action in which the action happens.

Walking down a few steps or wherever it may be, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, chup, or any habitual action. Don't make it too long at first. You might get lost in thought.

If you say, I'm going to perform making this cup of tea in presence, it might be too much because you have to fill the kettle, you have to wait for it to boil, and by then you might be off somewhere. Why not just while you stir the cup of tea, chup, chup, chup, something that would be totally unnoticed, not noticeable to you in the normal state of consciousness, just small actions, little bit of honey in the tea if you take honey, chup. And there was a space of no thought, just that.

Anything that's short that you do often. Lighting a, no, you don't have candles here, you're not supposed to have candles. Pouring a liquid, water or juice, little spaces in your life, and then more and more spaces, and then some spaces come naturally by themselves.

And sooner or later you might find a big space. It's just a matter of time. It all implies getting out of living in that conceptualized me in the head.

Eckhart Tolle Retreat Talk Titled Awakening out of thought

Welcome, I should say welcome in many languages, so many nationalities here. So some of you have come a long way, traveled a long distance, to be with yourself. And sometimes that's how it works.

To be with yourself, I don't mean the self that is such a burden to carry. You may be carrying that also, but that's not why you've come here. But something deeper than the story or the conceptual self in the head that needs and wants something.

Of course that's also come with you here, the self that needs or wants something. And it may be expecting to get it here, to add something to itself. But that's not how it works.

So I sometimes use the expression portals, openings into yourself, a new state of consciousness, one could say, unconditioned. And portals are here all the time. One could consider our entire retreat as a portal into that state of consciousness that we may call presence.

So the retreat is not here to add anything to you. One could almost say it's here to remove something. Not even that.

To show something that's already there. And the teaching, to use that word, it's not really any teaching, the totality of this weekend, long weekend, is the teaching. The words are not that important.

While we sit here in this beautiful space, you may be a little tightly packed in the back, maybe tomorrow we can move forward a little bit more. But while we sit in this beautiful space, always remember, and I will keep reminding you, so that you don't get attached only to the words, to pay attention to this. This is one important portal that is here.

To pay attention to the silent space that is here. It's here in this room, so while we sit here, there's always the dimension of silence or silent space. And all that's required of you, for it to become a portal, is to pay attention to it.

It does not mean that you cannot pay attention to the words. You listen, the words are there, they go in. But as you listen, you also listen to the silence.

And the mind, the thinking mind, might say, this doesn't make sense, because listening to the silence, there's nothing to listen to. All that's required is simply to acknowledge, to pay attention, to notice the silence. To the thinking mind, that is not a significant event.

It is a non-event. It is a non-happening. It is completely uninteresting, has no fascination whatsoever, and adds nothing to who you are.

That's why the mind-made self, the heavy self that you carry with you, is not interested in it, and can't even do that. In other words, you cannot listen to silence through thought. The moment you notice the silent space, the stream of thinking ceases, and you haven't lost consciousness.

That's why we are here. That is one portal that is opening up. There's only one thing here to learn, and it's not even learning, because learning would imply that you need to absorb something new.

There's only one thing here to discover. And in many of you, probably most of you, that has already emerged, which I sometimes call the unconditioned consciousness, the state of presence, or more recently I've been calling it space consciousness, as opposed to object consciousness. Most humans in this world know only object consciousness, and are identified with object consciousness, react.

Object consciousness is anything that takes on form. Thought is a form, a thought form, an object in consciousness. Every sense perception is an object in consciousness.

Object consciousness, the words that you hear, are object consciousness forms. The silent space has no form, can't grasp it. Space consciousness, that dimension of depth or stillness that is already in you, and in many, I know that, that has already emerged, although it may get obscured from time to time.

Total absorption in object consciousness, thought, reactions, me, and you yourself become an object to yourself, a mind made me with its story. You have made yourself into an object in consciousness, an uneasy entity. And that uneasy entity is also here.

The reason why you are here is that something else has emerged, which one could call a new consciousness on this planet, because it's been so rare until, even now it's still rare, but until recently, it's been so rare for that dimension to be realized in a human being. And suddenly now, many people are beginning to realize it. It's still rare, relatively speaking, relative to the population on the planet.

But in more humans, it is emerging already. And you may not even know that this is why you've come here. But the self, the object consciousness me, has also traveled here.

And it may have its own agenda here. It wants something, because it is never enough, never complete, never fulfilled for except short intervals between two wantings, or two fears, and two not enoughs. So that, that self, that what is traditionally called the self, in Buddhism, that is called the self, has come with you.

And of course, wherever you go, it would travel with you also. And it won't leave you alone for too long. And it's back, I'm still here.

And that is that part in you that, after a little while here, maybe tomorrow afternoon, will already begin to feel restless, because not enough is being added to it here. And it will start thinking, how much longer have I got here? I have to stay another two days.

And then it'll project itself to the third day, when you're going to leave. Because that is then becomes the next significant event. Whereas this retreat to that self is a non-event.

So it will project itself away, because it always wants to be in the next moment, not in this one, that is a characteristic of object consciousness of the self. So it won't be happy with this for long. So that, it's good to know that that also is there in you.

And it does other things. It's not happy with what is for very long. And it likes to complain and react.

And I don't mean complain in saying, you're stepping on my foot, please remove your foot from my foot. That's a simple statement. You can do something to alleviate this, please do it.

That's not a complaint. I mean, the mind pattern of inner and sometimes outer complaining, which is to do with a deep-seated pattern in the mind-made self, that is the reactive. And although these are beautiful surroundings, some of them perhaps hard to find a more beautiful spot on the planet.

Yes. And yet the self will easily find things to be unhappy about, because we live in the world of forms. It's in the nature of the world of form that it is not totally satisfying.

Things go wrong in it. And the self loves that fact, because then it can complain. And here there are many people in a relatively small space, plenty of opportunity to complain about other people.

Maybe in the head only, or whatever conditions are not quite right. And in complaining, which is a deep-seated pattern, reacting, complaining of the deep-seated pattern of the mind-made self, the conditioned entity, in complaining and reacting, it momentarily strengthens its sense of self. Because when you complain, you are right, and somebody else is wrong.

And so it's unconscious, it is an unconscious attempt to strengthen one's sense of me, of self, which is never quite enough. So you need to strengthen it somehow, so you can't, here there may not be much else left for it, than to feel unhappy about something and focus on that. Could happen.

The pain body may come in and add to it. We're having a full moon on Saturday, which sometimes triggers pain bodies. So just to know that there are, there's a dimension in you of depth, which has brought you here, and there's the dimension, the shallowness of a mind-made me, that cooperated enough for you to be here.

Okay, I'll go along with that. In quite a few people, it didn't allow them to come here. At every retreat, there are people who at the last minute, or a day before, or maybe something, should I go?

There's no, what's the point? And after much agonizing, they cancel. So something in them prevented them.

This is quite normal. Maybe they'll come to the next one, or they get other teachings, or teachers, maybe taught situations. Everybody gets what they need.

So sometimes it interferes enough, but with you, at least it cooperated, to allow you, and some of you hardly made it here, because even a few days ago, you weren't quite sure whether you would actually go. So to observe, I may be talking a little bit more about it tomorrow, so that you recognize it clearly when it's there, because that's really all that's required, for it to recognize the conditioned entity that until recently was your entire identity. And it's really enough to recognize it.

And of course, there is something deeper in you that's arising and opening up, and that has brought you here. Throughout, we are using the portals that are available to us here, and one is silence. Not only in this room, but also out in nature, which is the other teacher here.

There are quite a few teachers this weekend. The beautiful nature that you're going to walk in, move in, is not only all the beautiful things that you see, thousands of life forms. That's beautiful.

There's also a vast sense of space, of spaciousness, and a silence that underlies it all. If you can listen to it first thing in the morning, you will hear the birds. Beautiful sounds.

They are objects in consciousness, perceptions. Beautiful. And then notice, just as you do it here, the silence or the stillness out of which the sounds come.

And suddenly the sounds have greater depth to them. That depth is your own depth, ultimately. It's the depth of the universe.

And you can then listen to that beautiful sound. Just the joy of life celebrating its own existence through these little forms. You can listen to that.

If simultaneously you are aware of space, you can listen to those sounds without any interference by thought. And that is the arising of the new consciousness in which a vast intelligence operates, far greater than thought. And you haven't lost thought.

When you need it, it's there. So we use the portals that are here naturally, and through silent space here, no matter what you listen to in nature, no matter what you see, there's also a vast spaciousness, a harmonious whole that holds it all together, all these thousands of beautiful life forms. You can be aware of that also.

So the more you are aware of silence and space, the more that inner spaciousness, that inner stillness, they open up. And that is the depths of who you are beyond a little mind-made entity. That also has its own level of existence.

It will continue, yes. But you are no longer captivated by it and thinking that that's all there is to you, this uneasy, fearful, needy entity. And then we are using here, well, other portals, of course.

The main one, you could say, and I'm sure you are familiar with that already, is now. Every portal takes you into now. To be internally aligned with what is.

That's a wonderful portal. Whatever is, is as it is now. Allowing this moment to be.

And this is our practice this weekend. Internally to be aligned with this, to actually pay more attention to now than past and future. You're not going to lose them if during this weekend you don't pay that much attention to past and future, or they will want to reassert themselves.

Return attention to now. Welcome now. Whatever happens in now.

Some things, the little me might react. And then you notice. And you realize it's important, whatever is, you can't really argue with, because it already is.

Action then arises out of the indebted state, not out of the resistant state. That's intelligent action. If action should be needed.

So, whatever happens at this moment, and nothing can happen anywhere else except this moment. Nothing ever happened that wasn't this moment. Nothing will ever happen that's not now.

Whatever happens can only happen now and is, one could say, although the little me doesn't like that, whatever happens is connected with the totality of all life. The totality of the universe. Buddhists knew that 2,600 years ago already.

The interconnectedness of all things. Modern physicists know that. There are no separate events.

There only seem to be separate events. There's no such thing as a separate event or separate entity. Everything is connected, interconnected to the totality, the web of the entire cosmos.

Therefore, whatever happens is inevitable. Otherwise it would not be. It's connected to the fabric of the whole.

So, the is-ness of this moment could not be otherwise. And the mind says, oh yes, it could. If he hadn't done that, this wouldn't have happened.

But he did that. If I had acted differently, it wouldn't have happened. So it could be otherwise.

The mind argues in that way. But the fact of the matter is, it isn't otherwise. I can raise my arm.

Now it's raised. And the mind said, yeah, but you didn't have to do that. You could have not raised it.

But now it's here. Perhaps another universe has already branched off from this moment where I did not raise my arm. This is what physicists speculate about, that every moment different universes come out of infinite possibilities.

If we carry on talking about this, this will take us into philosophy. The fact remains, this moment is as it is. And then it changes.

And again, it is as it is. It may change through you, because you accepted the is-ness, which led to intelligent action. Because it's only now that the portal is open into true intelligence when you're not the reactive little entity that can't accept the is-ness and needs the future, which is no more than a thought form, isn't it?

Nobody has ever encountered the future except as a thought. Nobody has met it, ever. It only exists as a thought form.

The past too only exists as a thought form. They seem so real. Time, past and future seem so real.

And you can say, yeah, they must be real because I'm getting old. I'm burning up in time. And I'm shriveling just like a fruit, a fresh fruit.

And then it shrivels. And then it's gone. Everything is being burned up in time.

That's true on one level, it looks so real. And then if you look, yes, but time, past, future, never here. Nobody has ever met them except as a thought.

So it seems to do things to things, and yet if you look more closely, it doesn't even exist. No conclusions. Because then it becomes philosophy.

There's nothing wrong with philosophy, but not here. Just to see, even to see a paradox, to see the paradox of time and the timeless. So on this retreat we use the portals of silent space here and in nature.

We use nature itself, we may talk about that. Tomorrow, which doesn't exist except as a thought form. We use the portal of now, which simply means our practice this weekend is to become friendly with now.

It doesn't sound important enough. I want ultimate realization. Well, just become friendly with now.

I want to attain the ultimate. Just become friendly with now. Yes, but what about the ultimate?

I want to add it to me. And finally I'll be complete when I attain the ultimate in the future. So the entire retreat then can be considered as a portal, potential portal into that unconditioned consciousness, space consciousness, just words, pointers.

It also helps, and here is another portal, to feel the inner body as you sit here, a certain aliveness in your energy field. Simply to sense that the body is alive, anchors you in now. And that I recommend when you go to bed here, because here you don't have television to stimulate your mind or other things, radio.

And if you're not staying here in the retreat place, and you happen to have a television in your room, I would recommend that you don't switch it on this weekend. Or the radio. Are you going to miss something terribly important?

Probably not. When you listen to the news on Monday, it will be the same. Twenty years ago it was the same.

Anywhere in the 20th century similar things happened and worse. So when you go to bed, lie there on your back, feel the energy field of the body. Just notice it.

It's not a big deal or complicated matter. Simply start somewhere in the body, hands, feet, oh, there's the hand. And then attention is there.

And then attention is in the general overall feeling of inner body. That anchors you quite simply in now. Thoughts will slow down, may even stop if your attention is fully in the body.

So instead of being immersed in some kind of thought stream, which is going to be about tomorrow, or your return trip home, or the problems that are waiting for you when you get home, and it will be saying you should have stayed home, you have too many things to deal with, you shouldn't have come. There's usual things that happen in mental noise. Then you step out of that into the aliveness of now.

And you use the inner body as a portal. And should you wake up in the middle of the night and the mind wants to start up again, me, my story, my problems, and then you notice, oh, let's go into the body. The mind will be saying, no, you can't, there's no point, not now, you can't feel your body now, there's too much to think about, too restless.

And then you feel the body. You don't necessarily have to believe what the head tells you. Not now.

It says, not now, think, think. Every thought says, I matter, give me attention. It doesn't say that openly, but it wants, because it's a little energetic entity, and it wants more energy for itself.

So it wants to be taken very seriously. It says, I matter, give me more attention. And then usually it gets it, it just pulls, okay, this matters.

And then it leads to more proliferation of thought streams coming out of that one. And it's probably problematic. And you're lying there in a nice bed.

There is no problem except as thought forms. If there were a true problem, it would be right in front of your eyes and you have to take action. A challenge, it would be a challenge that exists a lot in life.

But problem and accumulation of thought forms concerning future, sometimes past, has no actual existence except as a thought form. So it says, I matter, give me your attention. Off you go into a stream of thinking.

Can't sleep, just so much on my mind. And it burns up life energy. And then you wake up, and there's the heaviness of me, can't face another day of this.

So notice the tendency for mind to want to draw in all your attention. Sometimes coupled with certain emotions, let's say me, then the emotion energizes the thought. And that becomes a person's sense of self.

No space around it, just that, trapped in the form of me. And then you suddenly notice, emotional turbulence and mental noise. The noticing is the arising of something that is not conditioned, just to see it.

And with the seeing comes the possibility of stepping out. And then say, okay, I can actually feel my hand. Feel your hand, says thought, think about your problems.

So you sense, and you lie there, and you don't even want to go back to sleep, because it's so beautiful to be anchored in your inner energy field. And now, why go back to sleep? Enjoy your sleeplessness.

Oh, it's great. For a while I went a little mad. I loved that state so much, of not being able to sleep, that I would drink two or three cups of strong coffee before going to bed, just so that I could enjoy that incredible sense of aliveness in the body.

Not through the coffee, the aliveness was there anyway, but I wanted to stay awake as long as possible. No need for that. That reminds me, I would recommend that you don't, although we are in Italy, I'm sorry, that you don't indulge in alcohol this weekend.

You can indulge after, because when presence is fully there, it doesn't matter anymore. But the arising presence can easily become obscured through a couple of drinks, and then you go back into... So this is simply a recommendation.

We are also going to spend some of this weekend in silence. Again, a recommendation. There's no thought police or speech police.

So I may recommend certain periods during the weekend when we are simply in silence, at least external silence. So it's good to notice, and just a few days here are enough to encounter many different states in yourself. Loving it here, oh, this is great, and two hours later, hating it.

Just notice. Something in you, as I said, wants to be here. Something else doesn't really want to be here.

It went along and might regret it now. And just notice that. This room is open during the day, so you could come in any time also, just if you want to sit, just sit, be still, listen to silence.

Going out into nature, I recommend that even if you've come with a friend, every day to spend some time alone in nature also. Just walking, sitting, looking, listening. We'll talk more about that.

One recommendation then, we've been talking about thought, is not to take any thought that arises this weekend too seriously. Remember, the thought says, I am serious, I matter. But it's not that serious.

In this evolutionary leap that humanity is now taking, of which you, the form, is an important part. You are that evolutionary leap of human consciousness. In that leap, we go beyond thought.

We've gone through the whole huge evolutionary cycle of being totally identified with thought. And now it's time to go beyond, because if we linger any longer in this state of consciousness, which has become dysfunctional, because it is the end of a cycle, if we linger any longer, humanity will not survive as a species. It will destroy itself and the planet.

The madness will simply increase, as it's been doing throughout the 20th century. So we are stepping out of thought. Thought can still be used beautifully, creatively, but no longer have our self in it.

We are also going to spend certain periods of time, or rather no time, in stillness together. If there is a lot of interference through thought, simply use a portal, listen to silence. Feel the inner body, or whatever.

Or simply say, okay, there's mental noise, that's how it is, what can I do? There it is. All right.

And the arising of that new consciousness, one aspect of it, one way of looking at it, very limited way, everything, every perspective is limited. One aspect of that is, one can say, it is the arising of stillness from within. Alive.

Vibrantly alive, but still. And out of that, sometimes dynamic action can flow. It is not a passive state.

Our little opening ceremony, I almost forgot. Awakening. The bell signifies awakening.

Awakening out of thought. Thank you. I will see you in the now, at 10 o'clock, as you walk back to your room, and throughout this weekend, walk on the, what I call, the razor's edge of now.

One step at a time. It's miraculous. Take off your clothes.

Who cares about the story of me? You can go back to it. This is where something new can come in.

Only through that opening. Sense perception. Look at sense perceptions as a portal, as we sit here.

Usually the primary sense is sight. Unless you lose it, then it becomes hearing. But as we sit here in this space, probably the primary sense perception is hearing.

When you walk out into the beauty, it will shift to seeing, and hearing will become secondary. So let's start, since we are sitting here in this space. It's hearing, because there isn't that much to see, except this body sitting on a chair.

Not very interesting. So there are words being spoken, so that's hearing. There are little sounds around us.

A few little sounds produced by the people in this room. Moving. Occasional sounds.

And a few sounds coming in from the outside. And you'll be aware of that also. Birds.

Some human-made sounds from the outside. And I said just now, you'll be aware of that also. There's the sense perception.

How does that become possible? What you perceive is fleeting. It's a form.

A sound. Most sounds don't last very long. When you look at something, then you get the impression you may be looking at something lasting.

A tree. Or a person. That seems to last longer.

But sounds come and go. And I said yesterday, to listen to the silence in between and underneath the sound, that's one way of putting it. But what does that mean?

What is that? That is, at first it looks dualistic. I am listening to the silence.

But since you can't really listen to silence, there's nothing there, then you realise silence as an inner state. The state of listening is the silent state. The state of listening to silence is the stillness within.

It's not really two. So the listening to the silence is the doorway into the non-dualistic state of consciousness. Everything else is dualistic.

There's a subject and an object. And that's what yesterday I called object consciousness, which fills most people's lives. And so awareness arises.

It's strange that I can't really talk about this, but I'm talking. Awareness arises. And it is recognised as the primary ground in which all perceptions happen.

And that is the deeper meaning, the true meaning of stillness. It is knowing the awareness in which the sense perception happens. Not knowing it as I know it.

It's only through language that it becomes an object, because language functions like that. One could, to get a little closer to the truth, I know the ground of being, the awareness as myself. I as the sound perceptions.

Who is listening? Who is listening to the sounds? I, the stillness.

And so we could call this awareness of awareness. And the same happens when you go out and you look at something, visual perception happens. Now, in every human being, in most humans, the moment they hear something or they look at something, there is a mental commentary.

Thought objects arise. The me, the mind made object based, mental content based me, interprets and comments on what's going on. That's usually what happens.

According to its conditioning, it labels, interprets, there's mental noise, there's a sense perception and immediately it's made into concepts. You might be walking around beautiful nature and commenting mentally on very normal. And it's also normal to have some personal relationship to what you're seeing.

The me comes in. It compares that with something that I saw in that other place last year. It's not quite as nice as that forest that I saw then, but it's nice.

But I was in that forest last year, that was really something. It's normal. Or even more, this plant, I wonder if I can, this little sapling, maybe I could take that home.

I could put it in my garden. There's a relationship, a personal thing that comes in through which things are being seen. Comparative.

And if you're walking with someone, this inner noise very often becomes outer noise. And then there's a comment, oh look at that, what's that called, I can't remember the name of that tree. Look at that beautiful flower.

There's nothing wrong with saying things like that, but for most people, all their attention is immediately in commentaries. And when in the, Jesus teaching, there's one little, I just take this fragment from the New Testament, which simply says, look at the flowers. Look at the flowers.

Now there's a greater depth to it than people realize. When he said, look, he meant look. Now that is a different looking.

And that looking happens not through the conditioned mind, with its accumulation of content, but a looking that happens within an unconditioned field of spaciousness. That is through looking. Now the strange thing is, although most people wouldn't even know what I'm talking about, everybody has that already within themselves.

They don't know it. For example, it happens each time you look at something that just arises in your field of vision. A flower, a tree, a little beetle, a rock, a stone.

And there's a moment when you first, your vision focuses on this new sense object. And there's a little gap before the first mental commentary comes in. For most people, the gap is too small for them to even be conscious of it.

It's tiny. And then something is being said in the head, out loud. But there was a moment of true spaciousness within which first you explored visually the object in consciousness.

There was a moment of spaciousness in which the true looking happened. And it could be a second, two seconds. If something comes into your field of vision that is an unusual object that cannot immediately be interpreted, categorized, or compared to something else, then it may be that the gap of not labeling may be a little longer.

And that is called astonishment. And that would happen, and it's a beautiful state, the state of astonishment. That might happen if a UFO suddenly appeared and you can't quite...

or if it's half dark and some kind of animal is coming but you can't quite figure out what it is. And there's a moment of... So then the gap may be a little bit longer.

But then the mind will quickly try some interpretations. That could be... no, it looks like...

And then there's also, if something arises in your field of perception that is a huge challenge, perhaps even a threat to your survival as a physical entity, then it's possible, suddenly, as the tiger jumps from the tree and then leaps towards you, that would be a moment of complete spaciousness. Thought cannot operate because it can't cope with that situation. There's nothing in your past that you can refer to that would enable you to deal with that situation.

You can look back, when was the last time a tiger attacked me? Or what have I read in handbooks about tigers? I can't remember.

And even if you had read handbooks of what to do in case of a tiger attack, as you read in... I live in Canada, sometimes in guidebooks you read what to do when you meet a bear. And they even have signs as you enter the forest, bear encounters, how to behave, what to do.

But when it happens, you won't remember. And so, and this is, it sometimes happens that an emergency situation accidentally produces that state of consciousness that is arising here, that is actually the next evolutionary level for mankind, humankind, and suddenly there is complete presence, alertness, stillness, and no commentary. And action may arise, if it's possible or necessary, suddenly you go into action, run away maybe, or do something that isn't right for that moment, maybe you just stand there and look.

And I've read accounts of people who were face to face with a tiger or some other animal and they just stood and looked in such presence in which there was not even fear. I don't fear the anticipation of seeing myself being eaten up by the animal. It's fear is always the next moment.

What's going to happen to me next? But in complete presence, there's no movement away from this. It's just this.

And then, that's the state of connectedness with the one intelligence, the one unconditioned intelligence of the universe, which then operates in that situation through you or by itself, through some other factor. So that's, accidentally it can arise, and here, on our retreat, we are inviting that state. Which otherwise happens accidentally.

Or you read, sometimes you might receive something, stunning news, somebody has just died. The same thing can happen. So simply to notice here, when you first look upon something in nature or even sitting in your room, there's a moment of clear perception before the mind comes in.

If you notice that moment, it tends to get longer, so there's more space in you in which the perception happens. That is a depth that suddenly is there. You become deep, that which you perceive suddenly has an aliveness and a depth to it, that otherwise it doesn't have.

Nature, for most people, because they immediately label everything, is quite flat.

Beautiful, but flat. It's like walking surrounded by walls or screens, because the label becomes the screen or the wall, the depth isn't there.

The unbelievable delusion of thinking that when you have formulated a sound about something, then you know what it is. Oak tree. Now I know what it is.

You've produced a few sounds, or if you don't speak them, it's a thought form in the head. That is an oak tree. It's an absurd assertion and delusion.

And now you go no further, because the label has become the screen between you and it. It's become flat and quite lifeless, because now you start thinking about oak trees and another oak tree or somewhere else. And the more you know about oak trees, the more labels you have, screens.

It doesn't mean to completely forget what it is. Sometimes to communicate, you may need the labels. Somebody may ask, what is that?

What are you looking at? Or a little child may ask, as they do when the mind starts to accumulate knowledge, so called, when the mind starts to grow and starts to accumulate concepts, there comes a stage in the child's life when they continuously ask, what's that? What's that?

And most parents feed them the concepts, the labels. That's an oak tree. Okay, let's go on to the next thing.

And immediately, from now on, they will, or let's just say tree, from now on, the moment they see a tree, they say, tree. So already at that early age, not that it could be, accumulation of concepts needs to happen, but a parent who is aware could create some more space and not just say, that's an oak, that's a tree. But to invite the child to look more, look, touch, see that, look at that, look there, can you feel that?

Up there, how the leaves move, can you listen to the sound of the leaves? And then the child begins to, oh, and then it might even have forgotten that it asked, what's that? And after you've invited the child to look, and you can only do it if you yourself have gone beyond being imprisoned by labels, then you can say, and that's called a tree.

We call it tree. Then the illusion isn't there that that sound is what it is, that thought form is what it is. It remains alive.

It has a depth, an aliveness, and in some way it remains a mystery, unfathomable mystery that has no end. And you're comfortable with that, because that is what depth is. The entire universe is deep, because you are so deep.

So, it's becoming free, as this is why we are here, of being imprisoned by mental labels, not only about nature, whatever it is. It goes hand in hand that we also become free of labels about ourselves, labels I have accumulated about me, and walk around as an accumulation, a bundle of labels of me, certain conditioned mental contents, patterns, experiences, a name around it, and then that's, don't know yourself beyond that, and everything you look upon is looked through the screen of those labels, towards the self, the mind-made self, and then everything gets interpreted through that. And there's some personal relationship of the self towards everything, even nature. And that is why so many people, when they walk out into the beauty of nature, they have this slight feeling of uneasiness, and they can't wait after a while, saying, I need to get back to the city, or back to my usual surroundings.

There's a sense of not quite, of being an alien entity in here, a sense of not quite belonging here. And it's so quiet here. So we are paying attention here, and this is so significant, paying attention to sense perceptions, and allowing the sense perceptions to be there without the labels.

And if labels come, as you listen, or watch, recognize them as mental labels, so that you don't totally believe in it, totally drawn into it. So thought is recognized as thought when it comes. And it's not that important here.

Remember, the theme for our weekend here is, thoughts are not that important. And before, perhaps until recently, your entire life was absorbed by thought. It was all about that, and emotions that go with those thoughts, and give added fuel to those thoughts.

And the primary thought form was the me, the self. So the liberation of stepping out of that here, not even waiting for disaster, because of intense suffering, because eventually that will push you out, and life will do it. Eventually, it could take a while.

And then a human being reaches a point, the evolution of consciousness, when the readiness is there for this to happen without further suffering. So either that state is consciously chosen now, the state of awareness, aware presence, or life will push you into it. It won't drag you, pull you, kicking and screaming until the last moment.

No. Consciously chosen, you can choose that state now. This is not ultimately true, because you're not separate from the totality.

It's a perspective. Every statement is only a perspective. It is a helpful perspective to say, you can choose to step out of identification with thought.

You can choose, when you walk between here and the dining hall, you can choose when you walk between here and your room, to be there, present in every step. And you're walking in a field of stillness and alertness, instead of being a walking story, a walking conceptualized self. And that is a hundred times as heavy on the planet, if you could hear, if you had the psychic ears to hear how a conceptualized self walks on the planet, it would sound like a dinosaur steps.

You know, in the films about dinosaurs, how everything vibrates when they walk. And once they step somewhere, nothing grows for a long time. And of course, this is true for human beings.

When you visit, this is where humans have been, nothing grows anymore. So, you don't need to be destructive, quite destructive species in that mad state, quite destructive on the planet. Not as destructive as in Star Trek, there's a species called Bok.

Wherever they go, there's nothing left. But humans can get quite close to that. So, but every human, the heaviness of a personalized self on this planet, the heaviness in your own life that comes when you don't know yourself beyond a conceptualized sense of self, of me, which is accumulation of thought forms.

Past and future are of overriding importance in that sense of self. Because the past gives you your identity, the future promises your completion or fulfillment. That's why you need it desperately.

That's the illusion of self. And it's heavy. Collectively, humanity in that state is heavy on the planet.

And personally, in your personal life, ultimately there is no personal life. In your personal life, there is also a heaviness of your problems that are such an essential intrinsic part of one's sense of self. Me and my problems remove problems from the conceptualized sense of self and not very much remains.

And the strange thing is, just as future and past are thought forms only, have no reality, at least I haven't met anybody who has seen them or touched them or experienced them, past or future, they only touched and felt and experienced the now, ever. Just the same, the thought form of problem only exists as a thought form which is essential to the conceptualized sense of self. I'm carrying around these problems.

And some problems are long lived. I've carried them for years. And I'm still working.

Every night I wake up and I think about it. I haven't found the solution yet. But maybe I will if I wake up often enough in the middle of the night and think about my problems.

Perhaps a solution will come. And of course the thoughts are the same thoughts that I thought last year and five years ago. It's the same circular thoughts.

And to the body your problems are real. The body reacts as if you were in the midst of a very dangerous situation which is created in the head. And of course you're lying in your bed.

And so again to step out of that and a good question to ask is always to see whether the problem is actually real or not. What's the problem at this moment, here, now? What problem do I have now?

Now. Not tomorrow. Now.

And then there's no problem left. A challenge may be left, but it doesn't turn into thought structures that go round and round and build up a sense of self around this challenge. If it's a true challenge, you face it and then action arises.

So we're stepping out of all that here. And psychically, one could say, we are losing weight quickly here. The heaviness goes up.

So as you walk between here and the dining hall, as you walk between here and your room, you can choose to walk along the razor's edge of now. One step at a time. And some of the places where you walk here are quite noisy, this gravel.

Now it's helpful because then there's the sound. It's not a means to an end. When you get to the dining hall, okay, or to your room, it's just not more important.

The future moment, the next moment isn't more important than this one. That's the delusion of the mind. Deep-seated delusion that the next moment is more important than this one.

So this is always a means to an end. All that is part of being trapped in thought and needing the thought-form future to fulfill the insufficient thought-form of me. And we can practice here living in the new way of not making the now into a means to an end.

This is enough. One step is enough. It's not going to get any better with the next step.

This is as good as it gets. And the more you are present with this step, the more there is a depth to it. It's more than the step.

There's a spaciousness to it. It's not just the step that you are taking right now. There's a depth to it.

It's not just the tree that you are looking at right now. That's beautiful, yes, but there is a depth to that tree. That is the inner depth, but ultimately inner and outer are one.

It is the depth of the universe. That's suddenly there. And so the step, of course, is also an object in consciousness.

The tree is an object in consciousness. Who knows what that is beyond the object that arises in consciousness? Who knows what that tree is?

Because all we know about the tree is certain impulses that are transmitted to the brain, to the mind, through the nerves, electrical impulses. And then it reaches the brain and then a mental image forms. Who knows what that is beyond that?

It's a mystery. Is there even anything there? Would there be a tree if nobody saw it, perceived it?

You know the famous question, if a tree falls in the forest, does it make a sound if nobody is there? Does it make a sound or does it make no sound? Then you have to imagine nobody there.

And so you imagine, I am not there to listen to it. And of course you can, one could talk about that. This is sometimes called a Zen question, but it's not really a Zen question this one.

Because one could say with certainty that Zen questions have no real answer. They are there to stop the mind. This can stop the mind a little bit, but you can see, no, there is no sound.

Of course there is no sound if there is no ear. There is no sound. For a sound to be there it requires an ear.

And more than an ear, it requires an awareness. The ear produces the sense perception and that requires an awareness. So there is a depth suddenly to everything, and that is the depth of what I called last night, and these are just temporary pointers, nothing to cling to, what I called last night, space consciousness and object consciousness.

Object consciousness and the depths of that. But really, ultimately, that is awareness itself, consciousness itself, before it becomes something. And the moment you name it, as I have just done, it becomes limited again.

Because it's faster than anything that one could name or encapsulate in some kind of thought. It can only be known directly, not in a subject-object relationship. Ultimately, known can only be known as yourself.

The depths of yourself, not the self that consists of accumulated mental content, not the I am this, that and the other, the story, but the I am in its essence, that which remains beyond all forms. The only thing that you can know without any doubt whatsoever, because everything else may be a delusion, and in a way it is, because everything is so fleeting in the world of form. But this one thing that beyond any doubt is real, and that is the ground, the depths of I.

If it's all illusion, the illusion must be happening somewhere, it is known somewhere, it arises somewhere. Even in every illusion there must be something in it that's real, otherwise it wouldn't be. So even if our entire sense-perceived life, phenomenal life, the life of form is an illusion or a dream, and yes, it is very much like a dream, because it all passes and then it might could have been a dream.

When you get home after this weekend, your first day, you wake up at home again, and first, did I dream that retreat in Italy, or was I there? For a moment there may be a doubt, because they are quite similar. It's gone.

Now the difference is, you can then get your photos and say, ah, it actually happened. But then if you lived for long enough, the photos would fade, and then you can't see anymore, where was that? It's fading, it's a fading photo.

It looks like a photo of a dream, blurred out, the blurred edges around things, it's gone. Nobody remembers anymore. Maybe your grandchild says, my grandfather once went to a retreat in Italy, and then that's the last thing anybody ever heard of it.

It's gone. Did it ever happen? Nobody remembers it.

Did it ever happen? And so the history is full of events that nobody remembers. A tiny fraction of human history got written down, you see it in stone, but most of it, nobody remembers.

It's gone, and it was perhaps very dramatic. And then it evaporated. And if not, did it ever happen?

Maybe, maybe not. It's strange, there is a dream-like quality to all of our lives, and yet, there's something in each dream that must be real, because otherwise the dream couldn't happen. There's nobody to dream it.

So there is an innermost essence to each dream, which is the substance. And those are the forms. And so there came this philosopher, Descartes, who wanted to find out, what is the one thing that I can know with absolute certainty?

And then he started thinking, and he spent several years thinking about what he could know with absolute certainty and beyond any doubt, because he had just come after hundreds of years of humanity being totally trapped in belief structures, and saying things, taking things for absolute reality that could be total fantasy. He said, maybe this is all total... Theologians were talking about angels, how many angels could dance on a needle or something like that, and he thought, maybe this is all fantasy.

What is it that we can know with absolute certainty? And he thought and thought and thought for years, and suddenly he realized, I'm always thinking. That must be it.

So he didn't quite go far enough. He got trapped in thought, and because he couldn't stop thinking, he finally came up with the famous statement, I think, therefore I am. And of course, that's the expression of an illusion, to equate being with thinking, to equate an identity of who you are with a movement of thought.

Not that he created the illusion, he just saw the illusion that was already there, that all humans were already trapped in. But the approach that he adopted was a good one, to ask, is there anything that I can know beyond any doubt, because this world looks so ephemeral, so fleeting, and so you have to go deeper. There's a kind of inner listening.

What is it that remains? When the form dissolves, you wake up in the morning after the retreat, and before even thought operates, after you wake up, maybe you open your eyes, there's already the essence there. A spacious, aware presence, which has not yet identified with this thought, or that thought, or that memory.

It just is a field of spacious, alive presence that is there also now. In fact, it's exactly the same when you wake up at home in the morning, it's exactly the same as now, just I am. Beyond even the words I am, a sense of I am-ness.

And that, some people realize that, when life knocked down all the things that I am had identified with, I am had become mixed up with forms in the mind, a story. And so, you think that I am my story, I am my history. That sense of I am-ness gets mixed with thought forms, and you cannot distinguish it anymore from thought forms.

And so, that's the delusion that I am this or I am that. And sometimes it happens that life knocks these thought forms out of you, through great suffering, or great loss. You don't know who you are anymore, because all the things that you thought you were, you lost them.

Position, possessions, beliefs even, you don't know what you believe anymore. There are some people who doubt their beliefs when they lose something. There are people who go to church every Sunday, and suddenly, sometimes in old age, the partner, the husband or the wife dies, and they suddenly say, I don't, this doesn't seem to be working, that's not supposed to happen.

They doubt their belief, because it doesn't work anymore, the partner died. But you had a contract with God, and that's not supposed to happen. Nobody told me that these days.

Thought, belief forms get shattered too, through some disaster. And beliefs, mental positions, the self, the mind made self loves these things, this is my position. And then life knocks them down.

They become difficult when things around you get knocked down, suddenly you can't explain the universe anymore. My explanations suddenly don't fit the universe anymore. And I had it arranged so neatly.

And when people asked me, I knew exactly my viewpoint and my opinions, I could tell them exactly how things were, and suddenly, I don't know anymore. Sometimes when some collective disaster happens, like September 11th, and that's only one collective disaster that's happened everywhere on the planet, suddenly, couldn't explain things anymore. And even the people in churches found it difficult to find something to say about it.

What can you say? Because people ask these strange questions, how can God allow this? If God was a separate entity controlling everything, not knowing God is the essence.

So, these things, either through disaster or through a more gentle opening, which is the case here, these thought structures give way to something deeper, a deeper dimension within yourself that emerges. So we are inviting this in here. We are, please, come.

And the easiest way, of course, when you open the portals, this is the evolutionary impulse of the universe. It will happen, even if you say, no, no, it will happen. Or you can open the door, the inner door.

And a very easy opening of the inner door is just, as you know, this is why I call it the portal, the yes to now. Oh, that's the opening. So that's really all that's needed is that opening.

The mind-made self can't do that. If you were only here as that mind-made egoic entity that is based on thought, you wouldn't even know what these words mean. You wouldn't recognize the truth of what yes to now is.

You would be frightened of that and run away. But you already know the truth of it, because the opening is already happening in you. And now, here's the midwife, that's all, so that the birth process happens more quickly, before humanity destroys itself completely.

If that happened, it would be okay, too. On a cosmic level, it doesn't matter. Consciousness flowers anywhere, through any form.

Many life forms didn't make it on the planet. But it would be beautiful if consciousness flowered through the human form. So that's why we are here, so we are inviting that.

So it's the death of the old, the death of the me, but it's a gentle, beautiful death. Maybe it's gentle now, maybe life has already knocked you on the head a few times, and that's why you're here. And now this is simply completing your death as the mind-made entity.

And so you choose presence here. And you choose the portals that are here, the sense perception, presence in every step. And then the deep-seated mental habits of labeling subside.

The possibility arises of allowing a sense perception, not just for a moment, which everybody has, the first moment they look upon something, there's the gap, there's the true looking. But here the possibility arises to be with something, especially nature, without needing to call it anything. Clear perception, spacious perception.

So one could say you sense that who you are is a deep space, and the entire world happens in that deep space. Spaciousness, stillness, and that is also a peace that is deep. Choose also when you are out in nature, choose for a little while to sit somewhere, or stand somewhere, and look upon something, whether it be a plant or a stone, or a little patch of ground, let's say one square meter.

And even on one square meter, so many life forms, so many shapes and forms. So it's so alive, even that little square patch of ground. And you simply stay with that, there's moss growing there, a little beetle running there, tiny, every little stone is different.

And you're not labeling it in any way, you're just allowing the sense perception to be there, and you stay with it for a while as a spacious presence in which that sense perception arises. And then you see even this seemingly totally insignificant patch of ground is almost, one could say, an entire universe, is so alive, has such depth to it, which is not different from your own depth, because you and it, in that non-labeling perception, you and it are no longer two, because it arises within the spaciousness of yourself. So that is unitive knowing, not separative knowing through little labels.

So, and that's, I recommend this, this weekend, to occasionally go somewhere, just choose a little field, a little area, whatever it may be, and just give it attention, let it be there, and watch. Without getting totally lost in the watching, you watch and you know yourself as the spaciousness. So this is perceiving through stillness, unconditioned perception.

Occasionally it's happened that great artists looked upon a seemingly insignificant object in that way, because there are some great artists who painted landscapes that were nothing special, nobody would have looked at them twice, just an ordinary field and an ordinary tree, nothing, and they, but they must have stood there and looked, and there was suddenly a depth, and then they went to a canvas, and some of that depth's perception, some of that spacious perception that they had, also got somehow onto the canvas, the fragrance of that state of space perception, somehow got onto, and so we call it a great work of art. If you see only the forms when you look at that work of art, it's not, nothing special there, and then you see some other works of art that are totally spectacular, there's a huge stack with horns there, and a huge mountain, dramatic looking, and somehow, and a huge river flowing, but somehow it doesn't have that depth to it.

There may even, as van Gogh looked at a straw chair, a wooden old rickety chair in his room, and he must have looked, looked, and so a depth and spaciousness arose, it's not just the chair, then he painted that chair, which probably he paid the equivalent of one euro for, because it was so old, one euro for the chair, ten million dollars for the painting of a chair. And that's, because there's some of that, then most of the artists, the moment they can only do that for brief moments, in the rest of their lives, the space perception isn't there. They are just as mad as everybody else, sometimes even more mad.

And so we learn this perception, which goes far beyond perception, and you don't need to become an artist, maybe you will, but it's not necessary. And so we begin, it is, nature is helpful in that, and later, when we may address that, this afternoon or tomorrow, in the now, of course, that same perception can flow into doing, when you begin to do things, because that's where people lose themselves, even people who can already be present in nature, they still lose themselves when the world impinges upon them and says, this matters, and they lose themselves in the doing, and the spaciousness is lost, and they're trying to do good, but the essence of good isn't there anymore. They think this is what matters, the doing is what matters, but it's always secondary.

And then, bring that into human interaction, the spaciousness, that's the great art. And that's only then the world changes. For the time being, right, let's stay with nature, and then we'll bring it into human interactions.

Nature exists in a state of thoughtlessness, no mind. So it can teach you the state of no mind. The fact that nature is pre-mind, and humans are going beyond mind, doesn't matter.

You both meet in the state of oneness, the connectedness. Humans lost it for a long time. They got lost in time.

They got lost in thought. That was the human condition for a long time. And maybe even that was an illusion, maybe it wasn't, it was just a long dream.

Maybe it was a short dream that seemed very long. So, I recommend that until this afternoon, we spend this day in silence. And so, give attention to the little things that you do today.

We mentioned walking. There's the walking. And there's the field of awareness in which the walking happens.

There's the picking up of a glass of water. It's moving towards the mouth in its journey. And then there's the drinking.

And then it moves back. In the normal state of consciousness, the picking up of the glass of water and moving it to the mouth is a means to an end. Because the end is wanting the water in here.

So it's... What's next? What's next?

Because what's next is always a question of the mind-made self. What can I add to me next? I've just added some water.

Because even that, of course the body needs a certain amount of food and water. But there's a strong psychological element to that created by the mind-made self and its need to add more. And that becomes the problem of eating more than you need.

Which is a very common thing for many people. And it's just one aspect of needing more. But it doesn't really matter on what level you add more to complete me.

Could be chocolate comes next. And then that movement is also a means to an end. And always...

After it's happened, what is the next thing? And the next thing may be a book. A spiritual book even.

If it's truly spiritual, it may not be that satisfying because it doesn't give you much. But if it gives you information or interesting theories, then it works. And then after a while it doesn't work anymore, you need more of something else.

But you've just absorbed some new belief perhaps through that or some new opinion. And so here, in a relatively simple environment, there isn't that much that you can add. Well...

So let's see if we can be with the little movements that occur here. And see if certain things we can perform in a state of simple presence. Even picking up a glass of water.

And during that space, while the water travels, and this to the mind seems insignificant, it says, is that going to solve my problems, drinking a glass of water? And the amazing thing is, yes, it will solve your problems, because all your problems were structurally created by the structure of your mind. We're going beyond that.

The problems are structural in every case. So yes, it will, but... The space in which the water moves could be a space of simple presence in which this movement is not a means to an end, it's just fine as it is, and there's no thinking while this happens.

And that is truly an evolutionary leap. While the water is being picked up, there's simply a sense of spacious presence in which this movement happens. And while you drink the water also, it tastes much more alive than when I needed to get it down as quickly as possible.

And then it travels back. And that was that physical movement of coming and going, there was no thought, just spacious presence. That is an evolutionary change.

If movement happens within the space of simple awareness, not a means to an end, just that. And simple things, because here you only do simple things, maybe at home you do important things, I don't know. But in this retreat, there's nothing important, not what the mind calls my business or whatever is important.

You haven't got your business here, well you could carry it in your head and think about my importance, but it's not really, whatever you do here, the movements are not important in themselves, and that's why it's such an opportunity. And then you might walk a few steps that go up five steps, and again, during that movement, there's no thought, there's just a step, spacious presence, nothing much from the point of view of mind. And so that movement in space, that external movement, happens within a deeper spaciousness of simple thoughtless awareness.

The arising of thoughtless awareness, not just while you sit in meditation, but in life. And it could arise if we are spending this, after this, from between now and our next meeting in silence, you'll be eating, nothing to talk about. Of course you could talk to yourself in the head while you eat, or you could be there with a simple movement of, and you look simple.

So it happens within the spaciousness. And then you may carry, you carry the plates back to the kitchen. And don't just, it's enough even sometimes to put one plate, pick up the plate, put it from here to there.

Without the interference of thought. It's not a great thing, and yet it is incredible. A totally different energy field that comes into that.

There's also a care that flows into that kind of doing. Even just picking up the water, even just walking up the five steps, or cleaning something in your room, or removing your shoes. There's suddenly what one could call almost quality of doing, when it is done, not as a means to an end.

Not with a view to some future moment, but it is done in presence. No thought, because thought will reduce it to a means to an end. Or it will bring in something old.

Some people think they are present when they are saying mentally, I am now walking up five steps. One, two, three, four, five. Of course you are creating mental accumulations.

There's a past already, you remember the one, two, three. No, this is unnecessary. You are just walking, you don't need to tell yourself that you are walking up the steps.

This is thought. Simply paying attention to the movement. Enough.

So that's all the little things, and often you will miss it. You will walk up the steps, and then you say, how did I get up here? You might miss it, you may eat something, and then you look at the empty plate of your dessert, and say, did I eat that?

So it happened in that you were somewhere else already. Okay, you won't be there every time. The old conditioning of course still operates also.

The two shifting in and out of that state of freedom. That's why we are here. If you go for walks, you can feel the sound that your steps make.

A generalized field of attention. Alertness, openness. And then remember, occasionally stop, stay with one little area or tree or plant.

Give it attention. The arising of the unconditioned consciousness. Space.

Inner space. Outer space. And during this retreat, you can observe thought streams, emotional streams, coming and going.

And it becomes so obvious, the impersonal nature of thinking and of emotions. Energy streams. Sometimes when I listen to a distant conversation, to humans speaking, really, it's thought speaking.

Energy form of thought, thought streams. Sometimes enormous momentum behind it in a simple conversation. An enormous momentum behind that.

Often energized by emotion. And as the presence arises, you can watch and sense those energy streams. First, perhaps you see them in someone else and you realize thought is speaking.

It reminds me of what one existentialist philosopher said. We don't speak. Language speaks us.

We can extend it because language really is thought. We don't think. Thought thinks us.

Emotions also, as you are here. It's long enough, these few days, for different emotional streams to come up. Including sadness, perhaps.

Including anger or discontent. Whatever it is. And to see that also is ultimately impersonal.

Your anger is very much like anybody else's anger. The story, which are the thought forms that are attached to anger, may differ from person to person. One person might say, I am angry because...

And the other says, well, I'm angry because... And then comes the story. Angry.

Anger. If you could feel somebody else's anger, it feels basically the same as your anger. No matter what the mental story that attaches itself to it is.

Or sadness. Fear. In itself, fine.

Not problematic at all. Thought streams, emotional streams. Only when a self is lodged in there, when the I am, who you are in your essence, which is consciousness itself, awareness itself, becomes mixed up with that, then there's a me in every emotion and in every thought.

That's the entity, the egoic entity. A little analogy. You could think of a cinema projection.

A film is being projected. The figures on the screen are acting out the drama of the film, according to what's in the script. And in this analogy, let's say these figures have an actual existence, and they know themselves only as the forms that appear in this film on the screen.

And in the middle, somebody could begin to suddenly realize their essence as light. Because every film is only modifications of light. The projector is a powerful source of light.

The light is obscured by the film in various ways. So if an actor in a film could wake up and realize his or her true nature, he would realize, I am light, not who I thought I was. And everything else in this film is also that.

Another analogy, you could have an actor on stage who's been acting out his or her role for so long that he or she has become that role. And every day, forced to act out the same role, the same words come out, the same reactions come, and he or she no longer knows themselves as who they are beyond the script or the role or the conditioning. And that's very much like a normal human being.

Every day, the things that come out of their mouth or that go around in their heads are the conditioned thinking. The entity, the mind-created entity engaged in thought. Thought has created the entity.

Identification with thought as me. And the emotions and the reactions, predictable. You know how predictable people are.

People you've known for a long time. Unless something comes in that is not the conditioned, then suddenly something new has come in. But if you meet your relatives at Christmas, then you'll see, you can predict what they're going to say, how they're going to react.

The same conversation will happen this year as last year and before and before and before. So to wake up out of that. And it doesn't mean you immediately become free because the conditioning has a momentum behind it.

The thought streams have a momentum. And although here you may be able to step out in nature, you may be able to step out and know what it means to be free of the compulsion to think. And suddenly enter that state of clear awareness.

Just presence, stillness. Wow. But then it doesn't mean the momentum is now gone.

Thought has subsided for a while. Now, the moment you begin to interact with another human being, it has a chance to come back in. Conversation starts and before you know it, you express your opinions and there's a self in it.

And then you are dragged along by thought. And when you listen often to two people talking and if there's no presence, no spaciousness around the thoughts that are being expressed. There are thoughts here too, otherwise the words wouldn't come out of the mouth.

But there is a spaciousness around the thoughts. There's also a depth or sense of space out of which the thoughts come. Now, you recognize that as you sit here.

You recognize that the thoughts are not all that matters here, not even the main thing here, but the space out of which they come. That means it's also in you, the depths, the space of no thought, or as I call it sometimes space consciousness, is also in you and it deepens as you sit here. All you need to do is sit here and it deepens.

And it recognizes itself. In recognizing itself, it deepens. And yet within it, thought operates.

It doesn't mean you can't think anymore. Thinking can still happen without that compulsive, addictive quality to it. When there is a me in every thought, mental positions identified with the position of me.

And then with that comes sometimes, almost if you are very sensitive, you can sense almost a kind of violence, even when people are discussing something. There's already that underneath. Don't you question my position.

So when you go back, the challenge is human interaction. And the tendency is to get drawn back completely into identification with thought and emotional patterns. And you can see when people talk, how the stream of speech of thought goes on and on.

Sometimes they sit, there's no gap between their thoughts. Between the speech. They are being dragged along.

You can't get, sometimes, you can't get a word in. There's no gap even for you to say something. A person is very much identified with that.

So when you interact here, you will be speaking, we may talk again after this, but it's good to have a balance here between not speaking and speaking because we can learn a lot through interacting. Because the challenge will come back anyway when you leave here. You could spend the entire weekend in silence.

And then you have to move back into the world and interact. So great alertness is required when you interact with other humans, human beings. And when you begin to speak, before we address that, it's you're listening.

Somebody is speaking, you are listening. The first important thing to remember is not to listen in the usual way, but listen in the state that we are in here, when we sit here.

Attention.

Bare attention. A complete openness so that the words simply are being received without a commenting response inside you. No preparing the next statement.

No immediately taking another position, reacting to the other person's position, mental position. And you immediately, internally, have another thought come up that conflicts with that person's position. And you're just waiting for him or her to stop.

And then you, with great energy, you put forward your position. And you can, you may watch the tendency for that to want to come up and allow it, just watch it, and then go back into the state of attentive listening. The greatest thing, if you, only that, to be able to listen to another human being in the state of openness would transform every relationship.

In that listening, this is the secret, and perhaps while you listen to these words, that is relatively easy, yes, you're paying attention to the words, but while you listen, you're aware of the space of awareness through which the listening happens. The field, which I sometimes call the now, in which everything happens, because that's what it is. It never leaves you.

So you could say you're aware of that now and that which happens in the now, which is that voice, those words. It helps, people find it helpful sometimes to be anchored in the inner body while they listen. So you listen almost with every cell of the body, one could say.

You're here, attention is in here. There's a great spaciousness. If you go deep enough into the body, first you may encounter certain energy movements, and then you go deeper, there's simply spaciousness in there.

So that also is a doorway into spaciousness. Basically, the body is empty. Ask a physicist, and they will tell you 99% of the body is empty space.

More than 99%. And what the rest is, they don't quite know. So what looks so solid, isn't solid at all.

The distances between the atom's molecules is so vast, and even within the atom, there's mostly empty space. It's all completely empty. So you go into the emptiness and listen from there.

And that is, you can now listen without the compulsive reactivity coming in. And occasionally you may notice the reactivity wanting to adopt a position, wanting to, and you notice it as a movement within the spaciousness. And it comes and it subsides.

And so that is the spacious listening. And if anybody works with people, in the capacity of whatever it may be, body worker, counselor, therapist, the key lies always in that state of attentive, open field of awareness that comes through you, but is far beyond the person. The person is the identification with the mental, emotional stream.

Then you become an opening for that current of awareness, spaciousness, space consciousness to come through. And even therapists who have received training in very mind-dominated therapies, after a few years of practice, they get tired of categorizing and analyzing and applying their particular intellectual framework. And after 10 years of practice, they one day, they begin to just sit there and listen.

And suddenly, their practice becomes 100 times more effective. There is the field of presence suddenly. They can still occasionally use things that they've learned, but more and more, they will be speaking.

When speaking happens, because it happens out of that stillness, it's spontaneous. It's right. It's what is needed for that moment comes out of that unprepared and sometimes it comes through the other person because the field is there.

That state of consciousness, also, of course, other people know it. Some great sportsmen know that they sometimes call it the zone, entering the zone, which is the transformed consciousness through which it happens. The Tao is playing tennis, which is another word for that unconditioned intelligence.

And I'm sure that's why people like to watch two people hitting a ball for hours on end, which in itself can't be that interesting. But somehow, they get there's something else at work. It's more than two people hitting a ball.

It's the play of total at-oneness with the totality. So what the Chinese call the Tao is actually playing tennis. There's no thought.

If the tennis player were thinking, it wouldn't be very good. They would lose the game. The interference of thought means gone.

You would lose within five minutes. How could thought think, I wonder where the next ball is coming from? Or imagine the most powerful computer created by thought trying to work out where the next ball is coming from.

You could put all the computers together and they would self-destruct because it's too complicated. Can't couldn't do it. What the computer would have to totally different way of knowing it breaks everything down.

The mind, it has its place for certain things. But the mind breaks everything down into little bits and pieces and further bits and pieces. And the more you develop your mind at universities, the more advanced you become at a university, the more tiny your little piece becomes.

And the pieces have become so tiny that when you start trying to work out what you're going to do a PhD on, you have to ask the professor is there a tiny piece left for me? And the professor says yes, here is a tiny piece but you can cut it up two more times. And then you do it and then there's maybe three or four other people in the world who understand what you've written because you're now a specialist.

And so if for most humans that's all they know. That is called intelligence. And it's a tiny aspect of what real intelligence is.

It's not separate. Yes, it's a small expression of intelligence, but imagine losing yourself in the cutting up and in the analysis and leading your own life through the thought process of thought. How inadequate.

So imagine the computer working out even the simplest things. The bird flying from one branch to another which is totally intuitive. There's no decision making involved.

It just looks. From a human point of view it might look as if the bird were waiting or trying to figure out when is the right moment to jump off this branch. But it's not like that.

The bird is simply the jumping off hasn't happened yet. It's not figuring out anything and then jumps off and in that harmonious flight lands on the other branch. Now imagine a computer or you might need to figure out the trajectory beforehand.

What is the speed? What is the wind resistance? What is the ratio between this and that?

Gravity has to be taken into account too. What is the weight of the feathers? It becomes a complex mathematical problem.

Just getting from one branch to another. It would. And so how does the bird work that all out?

It's without mathematics. Because it's not, it's using thought. It's not using the analytical intelligence of thought.

Another intelligence is at work that does not need to break life or information into little bits and pieces and make a lot of noise about it. It simply happens. And it's this flower.

Again, humans could get together and say let's create an incredibly beautiful flower. And how are we going to do it? So committee meetings start.

Discussions. It needs to shape. Okay, let's consult the computer about how it's...

Yes, they could never create. And it's come out of stillness. Not a single thought has gone into the creation of the flower.

Just... So that in nature that still, that operates, that unproblematic, a different intelligence, not recognized by the human mind even as intelligence. Everyone has that potential within.

But unfortunately, everybody is conditioned by our culture into only accepting the analytical as intelligent. So one could talk of, if you talk of in physical terms, right brain, left brain, there's perhaps a correspondence. But it goes deeper.

So to see that an intelligence that is far greater than anything you could work out through the mind, which has its place for certain things, is there. And why not bring that into your normal everyday life? It operates It operates through stillness, not through noise.

It doesn't need to break things down. So when you listen to another person and you are there in a helping capacity, thought movement in the state of attentive listening, and thought is not trying to figure out how can I help this person? I need to think of something.

Or make some reference to something I have learned. Case history number 223 was similar to this one. And then you go to the book and look at case history 223.

Yes, there's certain similarities and there's another case history there. What you can do like that is very limited. And now comes the possibility of just just allowing the aware spaciousness to be there.

And then through that through healing, through transformation, real insights suddenly they happen. Change happens. And you're not trying to change anything or anybody.

There is no trying in that. And what is implied here that of course is the total yes to the suchness of now. Even when you sit with another person because when you sit with another person the suchness of now comes in the form of that person.

And there's no judgment of any kind as simple yes this is the suchness of this moment. No thinking this person should be different, should this, should that. This moment is as it is.

There was a therapist some years ago in the United States who realized the power that lies in what he called unconditional acceptance of the person that before they called the person the patient but he didn't use the word patient anymore which implies many things but acceptance and that transformation happens not through categorizing analyzing labeling calling him or her pathological or finding some kind of label for the disease another label but simply unconditional acceptance.

Now they try to teach that sometimes to their people. It's sometimes the basis is not taught which is the basis for unconditional acceptance is the ability to step out of thought and rest in the state of no thought. If you're trying to practice unconditional acceptance through thought then you get into trouble again.

This is like Christians who try to love their neighbor as themselves without having gone beyond the judgments of thought. Every thought is a judgment. So they try to do it and since the teaching of consciousness exists has only come down to us in fragments they couldn't quite see that what he's talking about is the transformed state of consciousness in which you take no thought for the moral future.

And then it happens naturally that you love your neighbor as yourself because in that knowing that comes out of that state that is a unitive knowing very similar to what we talked about this morning when you look at a tree you look at nature you know that tree no longer through the labels of the mind but on a deeper level and you can know the other person in the same way without knowing anything necessarily about their story. It can be a deep knowing that goes beyond the story in the other person although mostly if you're a therapist what you will hear is the story and that's fine.

You listen to that but you listen beyond there is a field of presence and that awakens presence in the other person which is also even in the most mad person and mad means totally identified with thought not the slightest gap that's already madness and so you listen and suddenly there is an intelligence at work which operates out of the totality of that situation not necessarily through you and that applies to any situation in life to which you bring or which you meet in that state of consciousness in which you totally face the is-ness of now and there is language is never quite right but I'll say it anyway there is a current of awareness that flows and that's that then deals with the situation whether you're sitting with a person or whether it is a very difficult situation in your life not the mind created problem making which in many cases has no reality whatsoever but let us say it's a true challenge and so you bring to that you face that completely in the state of attention and in that facing it doesn't matter for how long thought comes to an end for maybe not for long there's a space a spaciousness of no thought and that is the power that lies dormant in most in all human beings the power is in all human beings but it is still dormant in most human beings one could say so this the simple ability to give attention to a situation one could say look in a wider sense we talked about you can see how it's all connected how important it is to be able to look at a tree in that state and that is relatively easy because a tree is not very challenging a tree even helps you along the tree says let me teach you stillness that's where I live my home is called stillness and the tree would love to teach you stillness so the tree is helpful you can go to the tree now that's beautiful and then comes challenges humans so with people you become still good then you start the other way around that's okay that is more rare it happens usually that people they even then say I want to leave the world I want to live alone I can't face all that much madness anymore but the beautiful thing is it's through the challenges that presence deepens through the challenges of being with people and the situations that they create so to be able to look first at nature then to be able to look at a person at a situation just looking in a wider sense now giving attention and there is one common denominator here and that is there is a space in which the movement of thought has come to an end it can thought can then operate again out of that space which is much more empowered thought not the repetitive self-serving thinking that most people are trapped in just as these words come out of the state of no thought so the words have a certain aliveness which even I sense and I speak continuously about the same things almost every day now one would have thought finally you must get tired of saying the same it's never literally the same but it always points to the same and sometimes it's almost literally the same you must get tired of saying the same things and the strange thing is it's each time it seems new and alive because it comes out of presence and so you could when you identified with the structures of thought only everything becomes jaded and old in your life and the older you get the more stale the world becomes to you through your perception so everything you know the expression being there done that and so you go through the world and nothing can it's like almost the world gradually turning black and white and more and more lifeless there's actually nothing happening to the world it's because you're looking at the world through the old mind structures and the accumulated content in your head that is the filter through which you look at people even at nature and then it gets there's a line is it in Hamlet how weary stale and unprofitable are the uses of this world or something like that that's weary stale and unprofitable it's the heaviness of one's own mind structures and as presence arises you see that everything is new it has no real past nature and is fresh and new and every time you see it it's fresh and new you don't look at it through the filter of conditioned thought there's a beautiful book I would recommend it's by Krishnamurti it's one of maybe the only book or one of very two or three books that he actually wrote by hand and it's called Krishnamurti's Notebook in which he records not only his states of consciousness every day but every day every little chapter he wrote a little chapter every day for about a year and a half and he always every chapter contains a description of nature as he saw it on that day the trees the leaves the sky and each time it's fresh as if he had never seen it before the description still contains the freshness of that it's new every time because it is not looked upon through the filter of conditioned thought and that this state is arising now in many human beings this is the liberation liberation from time the liberation from thought the liberation from self it's mind made it's little self heavy but little so when you interact here you can bring just as you listen here in that attentive listening listen to the other person even if they're talking nonsense ultimately it's all nonsense even if they're talking nonsense you listen and so there are the words and there is the the field of awareness through which the listening happens and as you listen you're aware of the field through which the listening happens as yourself so one could say you're there as the I am presence the deepest that is usually confused with thought I am I am this and that and that and you are that but the deepest that's what's left when you step out of identification with form that's what's left what Descartes the philosopher couldn't get to because he never could step beyond thought so he thought I think therefore I am is the ultimate truth one could almost go so far as to say if he had said I don't think therefore I am would have been truer I don't think therefore I know who I am you can have all kinds of variations but they would get closer to the truth and from that simple presence you listen and then at some point you may find words may come simple you may say something you may not you may just listen a different quality a different energy field is there now from what usually would be there which is mind interaction there is a depth and then you can bring it into situations where humans meet which are usually full of conflict because whenever two humans meet potentially it's a holy encounter as the course of miracles puts it potentially there is the presence of God I am the I am is there but usually wherever two humans meet that's the beginning that's a two is a crowd and before long and then if three or four get together you don't need to wait long before you have egoic conflict before you have mental positions that they identify with as me and then you have two who agree on one mental position and the other two agree on a different mental position so any human situation that you go into you will find the conflict go to big companies awful unless there are a few companies where there's a little bit of the enlightened consciousness coming in but most companies are dominated totally by the mind structures of the self which says it's totally dominated by right and wrong and power and more more it just it doesn't know what for it just wants more to grow see Enron corporation nothing it's not that these people were evil they just the ego itself was there magnified through that organization and the ego wants more because it doesn't feel fulfilled yet and that gets translated into a corporation which feels I'm not big enough yet we need more profit more what for we don't know but more more more until finally it self-destructs or you can see it in nations they want to conquer other nations Germany was possessed by in the last century by that egoic mind pattern which said we need more land what for don't know just more and we need more enemies what for because then we feel more strongly who we are it gives it strengthens our sense of self so and finally if we end up having enemies north south east and west then we will really know who we are because we define our form identity through the other forms that are alien to us and so we get strengthened in our collective form identity and for a while that feels good both on a personal level and a collective level during that time in Germany almost nobody committed suicide so it was a strengthening of the illusory self but of course you get drawn into great madness and suffering is inflicted on other human beings and ultimately also on yourself and finally the whole thing self destructs

oh the

illusion you cannot sustain illusion for that long it self destructs oh okay there comes a microphone okay

when I am interacting with people and I'm trying to practice being present but for some reason there's a pattern of behavior whatever in that person that really annoys me I really don't know I try to keep it to myself into it's my problem it's not the person's problem but it's really annoying so I don't know is there a moment that I can express my annoyance without falling into egotistical patterns

okay so this is that at work or private

any situation could be

[Speaker 1] (3:08:38 - 3:08:40)

any situation yes

[Speaker 2] (3:08:41 - 3:08:43)

with a taxi driver or yes

even here taxi driver or anybody restaurant waiter whatever yes colleague at work yes so that's a reactive pattern which has an energy to it that you can actually feel inside you and really all that's needed is to feel the energy that's behind that which is an emotional energy coupled with usually a thought which comes first sometimes the emotional reaction comes first or the thought may come first that you should be doing something different that thought is there whether it's expressed or not you should not behave the way you behave you should know better you should or you should not that the should is there and so be aware of the thought and be aware of the feeling the emotion that comes be aware of how it feels the awareness may only come at first after you've shouted something and you may still feel the lingering of the emotion or thought movement after the event with a little bit less power and then suddenly you're aware of it and it seems that you had no choice it just happened and so as presence arises you will notice in the middle of a reaction the awareness is suddenly there and while you are shouting you idiot you should know better do you even have a driving license or whatever and in the middle of it you notice it as a conditioned pattern and before you know it you will feel it before it happens the reaction as an energy movement or as a thought movement in you you may be driving many people feel annoyed when they drive because they take it all personally they take other drivers other cars personally if there came a strong wind and pushed them aside they wouldn't get angry they might have some fear but because they realize that the wind is non personal but with humans you think they should know better or they shouldn't do this they shouldn't behave like that but they do so you you watch the reactions and if there is enough presence in you you will find the reaction will come and move through you as a wave movement and you are no longer compelled to act it out and you also as presence arises you see the ultimate futility of the reaction at most it is self serving it serves to strengthen your thought based sense of self whenever you get annoyed at somebody that pattern is there because what is implied here is that you are right surely and the other person that you are annoyed about or the situation probably created by other people that you are annoyed about is wrong surely that's why you are totally justified in being annoyed because you are right and you are always right that is the when you are totally identified with thought you are always right in your own belief when a gap comes then you can sometimes see afterwards that maybe you were not right maybe that was just a position that you identified with and you can see the other person's position as also or equally right but that only comes as awareness comes in and we all know people I am sure you are not one of them we all know people who are always absolutely right that they are right and nobody else can be right I am sure everybody knows people like that who are so identified with their mental position that nobody is ever right unless until they say it and so those are people who are very much identified with a conditioned self the self loves being right it loves somebody else to be wrong because for a little moment it feels stronger so when you get annoyed that feels good on some strange level because you feel you are more strongly yourself now this is usually unconscious but if you make it conscious you can actually see it that it is actually in the service of strengthening my sense of self because the sense of self that is derived from mind is never quite strong enough it always seeks more to strengthen itself and very often the more means more right than somebody else then this can be added and some people are have that as their main way of strengthening their self they may not have good looks or great wealth or fame VIPs or great knowledge because these are all ways in which people try to add something to themselves and some people may have none of that but they can feel the whole world they are all idiots they are all totally wrong look at them what they do everybody is doing it look look at and there are people who complain all day long about other people in the world what they are doing occasionally they may even get a little bit of truth because there is a lot of madness but they derive their sense of self from that in the absence of other things but there are others who have plenty of other things and still also use this mind pattern to strengthen themselves it is one of the ways in which the self seeks to add more to itself and everybody has it to a greater or lesser degree the need to be right the need therefore for somebody else to be wrong so now that you can see that and now that your sense of self since you are here is less and less dependent on thought forms the need to be annoyed with others which means to make them wrong will also lessen because you no longer need to strengthen that ultimately illusory sense of self and so gradually comes then a freedom from that mind pattern and then suddenly you may find that that very mind pattern the same person who made annoyed you so many times suddenly the same situation happens again and you just go oh it's gone the reaction may be gone traffic driving there are people who are looking for someone to be annoyed with even while they drive and before they you know it and everybody in this room who drives a car probably has experienced being shouted at by another driver well I have and the driver shouts you idiot get your license or whoever gave you a license or something worse and now this is what then happens if you are inside you sense what that feels like when somebody does that even if you know that that person you obviously is very stupid you might say and yet you feel injured you feel a little bit less in your sense of self that is the mind based image of me if somebody calls you you idiot a little bit it removes something from you that feels I'm a great person and suddenly your sense of self is a little bit diminished this can also happen through any criticism or anything you are not and again usually the unconscious repair mechanism immediately jumps into action and in a simple traffic situation you repair your sense of self simply by shouting back something worse and you suddenly feel repaired and that process is unconscious usually people just do it it's it's and this to jump in and repair an injured sense of self the little me is always waiting for to do the repair job in any situation to justify something to become defensive if somebody says you didn't do that yes I did maybe you very well know that you didn't but in that criticism the mind made self feels diminished and whether it's true or not doesn't matter to the mind made self it's not interested in truth it's interested in preserving it's sense of self the same can happen in a discussion on argument you put forward your mental position with great conviction and the other person very simply tells you you're completely wrong your facts are all wrong and shows you this is how it is and suddenly the unconscious and automatic repair mechanism jumps into action and you say no these figures are wrong I know they're wrong and you you fabricate something simply to preserve your sense of self you say this is how it is he said that you quote something from somebody who never said that just because when you when you need to preserve your sense of self and it's a question of life or death when you have no other identity it's a question of life or death whether you are right or wrong so the truth becomes unimportant whether I survive in my sense of self that's what matters and again it's an unconscious movement and it's all part of the mad world that humans create when they don't know who they are beyond mental content beyond thought forms of me so they struggle and struggle to preserve their sense of self and strengthen it another mad way of strengthening it is to diminish somebody else's sense of self through some comment through saying something and in its madness the egoic sense of self feels stronger when it can diminish somebody else so you can you criticize somebody or and suddenly you feel you have grown because that person has shrunk and it's all in the realm of illusion a similar thing is envy and a certain structure of somebody has something and because the mind made self equates having with identity because the object that you possess has a corresponding thought form to it the thought form is what really matters not the object because out of the thought form I derive my sense of self so here I let's say I buy a certain type of car on the most simple level and my thought the thought form of my car is there mine now this word mine in the mind made sense of self is an extremely important word mine it's used all the time and all kinds of claims are made through using the word mine the child already starts when he says my toy it has identified not the toy isn't important but the toy becomes a thought form invested with self so I am in the thought form of that thing this is the beginning of the illusion unfortunately children have to go through that it seems at least so far they have had to so you can't tell a child you must not use the word mine because it will take you into illusion so it starts with that and in that the child feels it has grown a little because it the child has added the toy as a thought form to its sense of self and then the child suffers tremendously when somebody destroys the toy or takes it away because then the thought form has no basis anymore there and begins to crumble again it loses some of its little sense of self it's not fully developed at all the little that's there in the content of the mind crumbles and it's very painful and that same pattern when this child becomes an adult he or she has added many minds already my this my knowledge my opinions my maybe my good looks if they have good looks my whatever and so there's somebody you buy a new car which is the equivalent of the toy of the child exactly the same the thought form mine associated with that mine new whatever and in that you have expanded a little because your car is bigger than many other people's cars therefore you must be bigger the thought form is very attractive of my car big me big bigger than bigger than most people because of course you have to compare yourself so you look around how many bigger cars are there than mine mine and you feel while you're sitting in it you feel a sense of expansion self has grown grown and then your colleague drives into the parking lot with a one that's twice as expensive as yours and this is called then envy because you think you have shrunk again and you don't want him to feel good about this car and then you say have by any chance have you read the latest quality ratings for Mercedes cars are not what they used to be it's fallen to 12th place you may have paid too much for your car and then you feel you have removed this thought form from him the self in the egoic madness you believe that by diminishing his sense of self which you have just done of course because he will say no I haven't read the quality ratings and so you feel you have grown because one person has shrunk and in the comparative evaluation of me you have grown again and this is how envy often works envy means I feel less because you have more and then I'm going to try to take that away from you so that you can't derive a self from that anymore or if you might say even friends do that you might say you meet your friend and she bought a new dress and you feel suddenly yours is not as good this diminished and without knowing it without thinking of it just something comes out of your mouth and says oh this would look great on your sister and so these are the games that this entity plays and it goes into other forms of madness worse than this the need to be right can take on many forms but it's amazing when you see it it's so obvious what it's trying to do it's also so obvious it doesn't really work it never never for long and then you have to look to the next thing and the defensiveness that comes with it the needing amazing this is humans have been trapped in that state of consciousness for such a long time and so deeper and deeper identified with thought forms until finally that human state becomes very dysfunctional and there's nothing wrong with that being dysfunctional it is as it is and right now it's dysfunctional it has to be otherwise it wouldn't be it's an evolutionary cycle that humans have gone through which started when they ate the apple because that is the arising of thought as it says clearly they ate of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil suddenly they were able to think and judge and evaluate good bad like dislike separate the beginning of separation a little separation from the totality and separating the world up into segments and compartments until finally from the first apple and finally you get the PhD about the tiniest of segments and Shakespeare said nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so in one of his plays nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so he saw that it always is as it is but thinking makes good and bad and there we have the story of the apple they ate of the tree of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil and immediately what then developed was a self consciousness a sense of self and what is also told in the story of that is they suddenly felt uncomfortable with themselves oh no clothes it was a bit fast and they felt ashamed they had the beginning of a self image arose a me uneasy and that was only the beginning that was the loss of Eden which I'm told the translation of which means the place of joy and so then after a while things came in like work work unheard of before they started thinking life wouldn't be divided into these things of leisure and work absurd but then work started a new word came into work condemned to work whatever beautiful way they it's put in the story of Genesis effort comes in sweating by the sweat of your I can't remember what it says so it was the beginning of effort and so gradually gradually thought it became an incredible thing very empowering on the one hand the arising of thought amazing humans became the dominant species very quickly through thought and could all do all kinds of things through thought it couldn't an evolutionary cycle and gradually they lost their natural state of connectedness with the one with the source of all life which they had as their natural state didn't even know it and gradually all their sense of self was derived from thought movement and that's where in this evolutionary cycle things became more and more dysfunctional more and more suffering more and more violence more and more humans killed by other humans worse and worse and then gradually in its final stages that state of consciousness becomes a threat to the planet itself that state of consciousness because it's in its final stage it's so dysfunctional and this is why now humans change or they die out as a species because the state of consciousness that they are in is too dysfunctional for humanity to survive if nothing changes and that's why it has to change or we die so or one or the other as a species which isn't such it's sad but millions of planets billions of planets galaxies billions of galaxies each galaxy billions can't express it how many life forms how many forms consciousness takes how many forms it can flower through any form if the planet then ever recovers consciousness might flower through birds or some totally new life form so but but we are here which is a good sign perhaps humanity is going to make it and perhaps you are part of this transformation that is happening in human consciousness happening now not going to happen let's not make it into some future event projecting again a thought form of future something is going to happen to free me no it can only happen now how by inner alignment with is you can the doorway into freedom is in the now the doorway into freedom is not in the future it cannot come in the future because there is no such thing otherwise you create a new idealized version of a perfect self me enhanced version of me improved just as they say with advertising greatly improved better than ever me me and not realize that you need to again you would be looking to some adding and not realizing that the essence is already there in you nothing needs to be added you can play with adding learning something new adding new friends even adding a new car not anymore in the service of self you might just enjoy sitting in this comfortable car it's not fulfilling when it's there to feed yourself after a little while the car becomes unfulfilling when it's designed to feed your sense of self and then you might switch to a bicycle there are people on bicycles who have a stronger sense of self than people in BMWs that's possible too it's not necessarily the people in the BMWs usually yes but not always that they because a person in a bicycle can have the self image of me the one who has gone beyond attachment to all these material things and that becomes a thought form just as strong as a thought form of me big BMW the thought form of me is the one who is superior to all these un-evolved humans in their big cars and so you can be on your bicycle and go I am so much more evolved than you is the assumption even the thought might not even arise literally in that way but it's implied so thought forms the self is very cunning it may have rejected the BMW maybe it had all the money and you gave it away but still a new thought form came of me grown in stature it will grasp at anything to strengthen its sense of self if at any way you can be more of something because the comparative element is very strong in the egoic sense of self there must be more of something more right more more wealthy more strong more spiritual more if all that fails more miserable than you nobody has been treated more unfairly by life than me a new thought form develops that's what life did to me that's what they did to me human beings did that to me and a strong thought form can develop around failure which is another story in the head me the one who has failed it's all been in vain all for nothing all the struggling I failed miserably I failed in my relationship I failed in my business I failed my exams and so a very unhappy thought form of me the miserable one can be just as strong as a thought form of me the one who is better than most others both can be equally strong thought forms and both are comparative and both operate on the principle of more more me more than whatever more is doesn't really matter as long as more and you find the strangest things that which goes even so far as to say I am more ill than you I knew somebody who would say whenever you said I have a headache he would say you have a headache I have had a headache for weeks now and so what he's really saying is you little worm you talk to me about pain tell me about pain I know more about pain than you and this is wherever you look you see those structures at work in humans of course when you look you see it's quite mad but it's normal all the human drama is made out of that stuff what humans what they preoccupy themselves with what occupies their mind their thoughts is that drama that comes out of those mind structures of the self and it's all they talk about it and think about it and finally it's reduced to smoke they drop dead and the drama dissolves and again we must go to Shakespeare with his beautiful words full of sound and fury signifying nothing human existence full of sound and fury signifying nothing so this is the dilemma of human existence in its present evolutionary stage that is coming to an end undoubtedly ah amazing and there's a nice line out of one Star Trek movie when they travel back to the 20th century in some time warp and they walk through the city San Francisco wherever it is in the 20th century coming from the 24th century and they say they see the paranoia of people everybody looking at them suspiciously and they say it's a miracle they ever made it out of the 20th century it's very liberating for us here to recognize human dysfunction and human madness and see it for what it is one might think that it's depressing to see it but it's liberating because when you recognize dysfunction human dysfunction when you see it the seeing is the arising of that which is beyond the madness when you see madness even in yourself you are no longer completely mad because the seeing is there the conscious the awareness is there that sees the seeing does not need to adopt some kind of position towards it and say dreadful or feel guilty about being mad madness is not a personal matter it's not your personal problem if there are still elements of madness in your life and it may well be it's not a personal problem it's simply the human condition in its present evolutionary stage is still operating in you that's all and so you sometimes get annoyed with people or shout at them not a personal matter at all this is just and you are already seeing it so the freedom is already beginning now of seeing that mind movement the conditioned mind movement I saw this film recently Beautiful Mind which is about the actual life of a person who later received the Nobel Prize for something he was an academic at university totally immersed in his thoughts a genius on some level of thought and one small area of thought but he became insane he had hallucinations he saw people that weren't there he had discussions with people that were not there and he got totally drawn into that became totally dysfunctional was taken to a mental home the viewer of the film does not know that these are hallucinations until he himself begins to recognize that these are hallucinations it's quite well done and then comes the moment of freedom when he realizes the madness of it he realizes these things are not real and yet they are still there that's the arising of sanity which is not the immediate end of madness the hallucinations continue but he actually talks to the people that appear in front of him and says I'm not going to talk to you again he knows that it's a hallucination and he says I'll leave you now I won't interact with you before he reacted now awareness has come in and there's the space of presence and to the end of his life apparently he still would occasionally see these hallucinations but no longer reacting as if they were real simply allowed them watched them allowed them to be and so gradually something must have emerged in him that was from a deeper place than the conditioned mind that comes out in the film it could have come out a little bit more but it comes out anyway so the end of madness is seeing madness and not adopting some position and say oh there's something wrong with me I am mad deriving a sense of self from what is the human condition and feel guilty about it or inadequate or not good enough nothing to do with you you are the arising presence you are the witnessing consciousness not the forms the conditioned forms in your mind or in your emotional field it's not who you are so then it's not a personal problem anymore oh that's a relief and so evolution is happening by itself and these words are part of the evolution that is happening by itself the words also happen by themselves they're not planned beforehand they just happen they are created by the collective energy field of this group there's nothing personal in this and they happen to come out of this form because it's hollow enough hollow enough open enough for it to come through this form that's all that could come through any other hollow form wherever there's an opening consciousness will move through it does not evaluate people and say you are worthy i'm going to move through you it moves where there's an opening it doesn't matter whether the before there was a human being who was a criminal and suddenly an opening happens there suddenly complete surrender happens there and the opening is there and then consciousness moves and maybe in the person who thought he or she was worthy because he'd been practicing meditation for 30 years it doesn't come through because the opening isn't there because there's a continuing self image of me the spiritual one me better then and there may be a criminal in prison who is driven into total surrender to what is by unbearable suffering self created so nobody is worthy or not worthy because some people feel and these are two aspects of self image some people feel they are more worthy than others and other people feel surely I'm not worthy yet for enlightenment or liberation surely I have to struggle a bit more so that I can really be worthy which is again an image of me the worthy one so wonderful to see madness and as we happened here it's also liberating in itself you can laugh at the human condition you could also cry of course it's quite if you let's adjust the other polarity you it is a tragedy and a comedy at the same time cry at the end of your life if you think that's all there is to humanity you would never stop crying but because something new is arising now you can laugh and there's already freedom in that so the rest of this day feel free to laugh or to cry or both and if you choose to remain silent maybe we can set aside a few tables dinner tables for those who don't want to speak and then other tables for those who want to engage in speech and perhaps also in listening or in putting forward their point of view a moment of stillness is there still a little bit of waiting inside you if there is you can notice it it's the mind it's the movement of thought it's enough to notice it because thought waits for the next thought the next event the next object in consciousness and when you notice it notice is a little word it doesn't seem to mean very much to notice something but there's very significant whether you are waiting completely identified with the movement of waiting or whether you notice suddenly there's waiting in you that's the mind and the noticing is presence the seeing so you can see the movement a slight very perhaps very slight here impatience very slight ok get on with it I once gave a talk in one of the busiest cities in the world Hong Kong and somebody who later came to almost every talk he came to the first talk ever in between two business appointments I think and there was a silent space before the talk as there usually is and later he described to me his mind movements while he was waiting for the talk to start for god's sake get on with it we are busy people here we haven't got what are you waiting for what are you trying to do what's this and he almost got up and left and when finally I started to speak now here there may be just a remnant of that mind movement which isn't personal a tiny a habit a mental habit and you discover even here perhaps particularly here many mental habits habit patterns that still operate even here including perhaps certain patterns to do with the ego that we talked about that was so funny yesterday and you may catch yourself while talking to somebody after lunch and you may suddenly detect a little statement coming out of your mouth whose purpose was to impress the other person which means to enhance improve the view that the other person has of you and then the ego can use that thought form somebody else's view of me becomes similar to an object not everything is to do with the ego is material objects intangible things are equally important somebody's opinion of me and then this person suddenly oh if you know so much or whatever it may be and then the ego seeks to add it to itself in its illusion it feels bigger when you've just managed to impress somebody with your knowledge or even more absurd things somebody you know this famous person your friend you just it just slips into a conversation and through association with that thought form this is also an attempt to add more to the self to the sense of self feels a little bit bigger and that's usually called ego but it really is only ego when you don't know what you're doing when you're completely in that movement it's ego the moment you know it it's not really ego it's a mind pattern and they still those mind patterns have a certain momentum still so ego really definition of ego is unconscious identification with mind but when the mind and its content and its patterns are seen are noticed it's not really ego anymore you've already stepped out of ego but what is still operating is patterns they have a momentum you may not become free that quickly of those mind patterns and emotional patterns that go with that freedom is not in eliminating all of that but in no longer mistaking all of that for yourself that's freedom patterns still operate the human form has certain limitations on all levels certain patterns may operate until the very end there have even been liberated teachers who continued smoking every day and people said how can you do this you're supposed to

liberated it's just a habit so there is a looseness or rather a spaciousness that in which some of these patterns still operate a few may suddenly disappear a few may be persistent and they operate for a while and so this the spaciousness that is there when a space consciousness arises in that those things are being seen oh accept it because whatever is whether on the outer level or the inner level whatever is is as it is right now you have to what can you do it is other things change very quickly when presence or space consciousness is there suddenly that pattern is dissolved and other patterns stick around for longer okay it doesn't become a problem you don't become a problem to yourself anymore you don't you're not a cause of trouble to yourself and then it spreads to others if you are a problem to yourself it's almost certain that you will be a problem to other people because problem making spreads a very deep seated pattern also we may have touched on that briefly is the need to talk about other people in a slightly superior way sometimes called gossip and in certain circles when people get together eighty percent or more of their conversation is about some absent person and it's usually what he or she did or said or didn't do just imagine what he said to me he said and then I said it's a very deep seated thing in a very subtle sense every time you talk about somebody else in that way it's the illusory self gets strengthened because it puts itself by implication not doesn't say so openly in a superior position I am more than better than is implied because you are the judge of this person's behavior and it is judged as inadequate or whatever somehow inadequate at least not up to your standards and so that's a subtle satisfying way for the self to feel bigger to add more because the need for more we talked about it I am more and also right comes in again to be right the other in some way is made wrong and so you have this group of people and then that person comes and then they stop talking of course and then other person leaves and then they talk about that person it happens in relatively unconscious circles but some of that most people carry inside and this may linger for a while and then you notice it sometimes the noticing comes after it's just happened and then the noticing may come in the middle of a pattern and then the noticing may come when the impulse to say something comes and then it's just noticed the energy behind it and then the freedom comes in there it's possible for the impulse to come as an energy form and pass through you without becoming a thought or word so it passes through and and then after a while it may not even come anymore so some quite a few things dissolve through the awareness the spacious awareness other things may stick around for quite some time and none of them is personal it's patterns in consciousness one could say ultimately there's absolutely nothing personal in your life there's only the essential I am I am underneath all the patterns and that is the most personal or the only personal thing but really it goes far beyond the person the thing that Descartes looked for but he got stuck in the level of thought that which is beyond any doubt at any moment right now this whole gathering may be a dream who knows you can't be sure that it's not a dream and I mentioned when you wake up at home next week there may be a doubt in your mind was that a dream only for a moment but even within even if this is a dream somebody must be dreaming it there must be a a conscious space a consciousness in which that dream happens and that is real in any dream or in any illusion at the core of it there must be something real otherwise it wouldn't be it could not be known there's nobody there to know it so there's the knower at the deepest level and that is a sense of I am-ness all the other patterns are temporary forms external forms inner forms content all this is content the external content of this moment this room this place the voice whatever inner content may be operating inside you as patterns in consciousness thought movements emotional movements one thing that remains one way in which we can put it is to say what remains is it's always now it can only happen in now the deeper meaning of that is now is the unchanging space in which it happens and now is not separate from who you are in your essence that's why now could never leave you and no matter what happens to you on the level of form or on the level of content because it's possible that your life may dramatically change within a year all the external situations of your life could change dramatically totally you may be rich now and you may suddenly be penniless or the other way around everything changes or there could even be deeper changes even the inner on the level of conditioning things could change and there are people in this room who have already experienced in this lifetime what seems like different incarnations they've gone through so many changes they've been so many different people already they've been a stockbroker they've been a hippie they've been a successful businessman they've been a sadhu in India they've done it all squeezed into one lifetime different incarnations it seems completely different roles but in each role if that person had looked deeply within there would always have remained an essence that is nothing changed the deepest sense of I am-ness doesn't matter whether you're a sadhu in India or a stockbroker in New York there are people who are stockbrokers and then become sadhus and they're looking for something that is available to them both as a stockbroker or as a sadhu the innermost sense of being or knowing beyond form beyond roles beyond content of consciousness which is simply the space of consciousness which is the essence of now so on the deepest level the sense of I am is always there and it doesn't depend on this or that so it's not you don't need to change the outer form although this may happen to know yourself you could know yourself sitting at your desk in New York there have been people going to India and become sadhus and after a few years became frustrated still not found myself they adopted a new role in a very subtle way the ego came back in and a new mental form arose as me the holy man the spiritual one identification with form comes back it creeps in amazing and to go beyond that all that's needed is go deeply into the isness of this no change is required for you to know yourself at the deepest level no time is required no change is required what is now is always enough you have to align yourself with that isness and then there is a depth to it before it's no it's not fulfilling this now isn't fulfilling i want a different fulfilling now not this unfulfilling now that's the pattern so they know they never go into the depths they remain shallow look to the future a thought form and the strange thing is the form of now the forms change now in a couple of days the now will be filled with other forms it won't be this scenery it will be some other scenery but the form that this moment takes the only moment there is is never that fulfilling it quickly turns into unfulfilling an obstacle almost to where i want to go normal that's normal existence the now is an obstacle to where i want to go to that state of being fully myself free fully me not yet i'm not yet that so most people run away from the now because they see it as an obstacle as not enough as limiting the form of it so they never got to the essence of now because they don't go deep enough into the form of now they don't accept the form of now they run away from this so they never reach the essence of now and it's after you've run away from now for a few years you may be ready and you may realize no matter what form there is in my life what form appears in the now it's not that satisfying for very long the form changes or it loses its satisfactoriness and then you stay with what is and the rejection of the form that this moment takes drops away you realize what i call the inevitability of whatever happens because it's connected to the totality nothing is separate even raising my right arm like this you could say there's something inevitable to it or the mind we looked at that the mind could question it and say you didn't have to raise your right arm but it happened it could not have been otherwise if it happened the entire universe has brought this about and this movement may be connected to countless other movements in the universe because ultimately space and time have no absolute reality so just one movement on this plane could be connected to millions of other movements on other planes and almost certainly is so because of that deep connectedness nothing that is could be otherwise because it is connected to the whole it is one with the whole the human mind because it cuts things up we looked at that takes a segment out of the web of the totality and calls it a separate event itself it makes the human mind itself into a segment and calls it this is a separate me and to this separate me these separate events happen to me and the me is a reactive me it doesn't like what's happening and so you realize there is no separate event there is just the form that this now takes is inevitable has to be the way it is because the entire universe has created this moment and then you can let go of the absurd belief that it should be otherwise you don't argue with is that is the transition that's all that happens no longer you realize yes yes you can't argue with what is then that you could call surrender the deepest meaning is you enter the surrendered state of consciousness surrendered means aligned with what is no more only what is now not surrendered to a story resigned to a story in the head if you've just lost ten million dollars you've lost your big house you've lost your car and all the mind forms that go with this have crumbled the story of me that was so great has collapsed and there you are sitting standing at a bus stop waiting for the bus now to some people surrender they think means to say okay I might as well accept that my life has failed that I'm nobody now I might as well accept that twenty years of hard work was in vain I have to accept it that my marriage also has collapsed I've failed at that so I might as well accept that my children have rejected me okay I have to accept that that's that's being becoming more deeply involved in a story and strengthening the story of me and saying this is how it is I have to resign myself to the fact that this story of mine is so sad this is all on the level of telling yourself a story and deriving your sense of self from the telling of that story and that sense of self here will be a sad one but the egoic pattern will cling to anything it will happily adjust itself to a sad sense of self from a victorious sense of self and change its story and then tell other people about how all the life collapsed and then you can get an identity from that it's nothing to do with surrender you might call that resignation so resignation is not what we are talking about surrender only concerns this moment because the rest is thought forms anything that is not now is a thought form that's well you might say but didn't it happen yes but you have to remember it now and it's a thought form so all you surrender means to align yourself with this moment only so in the case of the stock broker who lost it all who is now standing at the bus stop the surrender in his case is here I am standing and it's not so much telling himself anything just aligning himself with that moment that he begins to look around there's a tree and there's a spaciousness in which the tree is being perceived as we've been living that here the spaciousness and the sky is there it was there when he had ten million dollars in the bank it's still there and there's a bird alive has no story and the body is breathing the air is fresh or not fresh but breathing happens cars are going past some you get it might be wet who knows you got splashed now if you were in the story getting splashed would add to the sad story this is what my life has come to and then there's simply water it is as it is what can you do it must be part of the totality of the universe for me to get splashed otherwise it wouldn't happen so you learn how incredible it can be when you live in alignment with what is with this and you suddenly feel an aliveness inside you the body is still alive the cells of the body are alive and there's a this moment isn't really that bad unless I begin to judge it in some way through a mind form it is and then the bus comes in and you sit on it and you watch the landscape go past beautiful I spent many years traveling on buses and watching the landscapes go past and if there had been a mind with a story it would say you're now in your forties you still haven't got a car you have no pension plan you have no insurance nobody thinks anything of you I actually heard that story from my family but it was very satisfying to sit on a bus so it's we can step out of the story which is the conceptualized sense of self into the immediacy and the aliveness of now and that's the only thing that requires alignment that's the only thing that's real is this moment and the amazing thing is that change happens much more quickly when it's the form of this moment is not resisted first you go beyond the form because the form let's continue in this particular example the form now looks very limiting because this person before might have had more freedom on one level and now because of no money he's limited to waiting for a bus and suddenly a deep sense of space is around the form of now a peace is around it a spaciousness is around it a deeper sense of presence is there while the form happens and that comes when the form is not resisted then you go beyond the form and that means no matter what happens there is a depth to that there's a space in which this happens and you are the space you could say the entire room here is happening in the space that you are that is consciousness this could if it suddenly went dark here the content would suddenly have disappeared you couldn't see anything anymore the content of this room would have disappeared the content in the space and all that's left is spaciousness stillness presence these are only words just that the innermost sense of being being space so one could say that nothing ever happens outside of you everything that happens in your field of consciousness happens within the space that you are so in the deeper sense you never actually go anywhere now remains always as the space the forms change in that space and it looks as if you were going somewhere but all it means is the scenery changing the same space is always there doesn't change so all that's needed for freedom is to align yourself with this moment not the story that you step out of the story you don't get stuck in the story of me you don't repeat the story to yourself in your head which is what people do because it strengthens their sense of self which is thought based here you go beyond the thought based sense of self to somewhere deeper and then the most amazing things happen often to change the situation all that you have needed to open the portal so that intelligence could operate in your life and the portal is opened through alignment to now then the intelligence the one intelligence can suddenly operate in your life and you suddenly encounter a helpful something helpful comes into the space of now because now isn't resisted now becomes friendly you've become friendly with now first then now becomes friendly with you and so you get on the bus to continue with the failed stock broker and suddenly you meet an old friend there says oh I haven't seen you in 10 years who has some suggestion to make oh I have a house I need somebody to look after my house on a beautiful lake in the north of Italy and you say okay I have nowhere to live I'll go there the strange thing is helpful factors come in very quickly when the resistance to life which is the resistance to now is let go and that's amazing not that you will ever encounter some external situation that is totally and forever fulfilling and never limiting that cannot happen the only thing that is unlimited and continuously forever timelessly fulfilling is the space of now which is the essence of who you are but that which happens in the space of now is not forever eternally limitless and fulfilling it's in the nature of forms that arise in the space of now to embody some kind of limitation in your life and that begins with the physical form of your body no matter how strong and developed and beautiful or whatever your physical body is at some point you encounter the limitations that come with having a physical body for a long time if you have a wonderful body you have a thought form a corresponding thought form as me great body and that is satisfying for a while it says to the story of me you can add that as important content that's me and then if that doesn't move the thought form of great body persists and gradually you reach the age of 70 80 90 and then there comes the conflict between the thought form and the actual body which shows its limitations more and more and in that conflict it's possible that there's a denial for a long time that no I'm still strong and finally when you're walking up 10 flights of stairs at age 80 and somebody a 20 year old woman rushes up past you and suddenly you feel totally inadequate and it can come as a shock the thought forms suddenly crumbles and so it's amazing what people cling to in their search for self it could also be somebody who is extremely good looking then it becomes a thought form of me and you get a lot of feedback from other people the other who want you and every form that arises in the space of now sooner or later the form will be a limitation on your life somehow even if you lived here you might think if I had a house here and enough money don't have to work anymore I could just live here completely at peace in these beautiful surroundings and I would be totally okay I would invite my friends and have good meals meditations that would be and if that actually happened you would encounter even here the limitations of the forms for a while it's satisfying and then you sit here and suddenly restlessness comes in boredom not enough oh hmm it's always the same view and after a year you may catch yourself not looking anymore it's there and maybe this wasn't the right place it's not that fulfilling here I must have chosen the wrong place I have to start looking again or it may come in some other way if you go to a pacific island beautiful climate everything wonderful as friends of mine went to Bali and paradise surrounded by paradise and they were cooking their first meal in open air and then they saw a rat looking through the window that wasn't supposed to happen and so you can't so you have one limitation as I've just I've told the story before somebody who is unknown works as a waitress wants to be an actress can't get a job has an unhappy story very limiting you get paid whatever ten dollars an hour can't even go anywhere limiting three years later she's famous everybody knows her big house big car in the papers but she's trapped in her house she can't go out anymore because riots happen whenever she comes people go there she is it's always some new limitation that comes in and they say that wasn't supposed to happen it's in the nature of the world of business run away for the rest of your life you can improve your life situation that's good you can play with it it's good to make a million dollars it's probably better to have one dollar in the bank but to believe that will will free you or fulfill you or make you complete in some way, doesn't happen. That can be found whether you have $1 or 10 million in the bank.

The rest is a game with form, which you cannot even not play because you're here as a form. So you play the game with form, you get, you do things, but no longer seeking something in the world of form that it cannot give you, which ultimately means yourself. That deepest satisfaction, that deepest fulfillment, seeking that in the world of content, because that's what form is, content in consciousness is what form is, seeking that there is continuous frustration, disappointment, and then you can use expressions like that he let me down, she let me down, which means disappointed me, lets you, strange expression, that situation lets me down.

Every situation, every person that you look to for self-fulfillment is going to let you down. And that's the complaint of the mind, that people let you down, and situations let you down. And fame, even fame wasn't supposed to be like that.

So content has to be seen for what it is as ultimately limiting and limited, and that's good. And to express that in general language, not in specific language that we use here, where we speak of the content of consciousness or object consciousness and space consciousness. Space consciousness is fulfillment by itself.

It needs nothing. It is already fully what it is. Object consciousness is limited.

Now, to use a different language, we could say, when you realize that, you no longer demand that something or someone in this world, a situation, a place, a person, should make you happy, because they won't. It's not in the nature of a situation, a place or a person to make you happy, fulfilled, complete you, because that's really what making you happy means. When people say, I'm looking for the man or woman to make me happy, what they mean is an innermost sense of being fully yourself now through adding this man or woman to your life.

Then he or she makes you happy. For a while, it works, and then it doesn't work.

Everybody who falls in love realizes that illusion that this person is going to complete me doesn't last very long.

If there are two people living together and they say, well, we are happy, what you're saying doesn't apply to us. That means in their relationship, whether they know it or not, something has already emerged that is beyond object consciousness. In other words, the space in their relationship is already there.

Space consciousness is already there in their relationship, and the relationship happens. You're no longer looking to the relationship as such to make you happy, but the context, one could say, in which the relationship happens is fulfilling, and the context is space or spaciousness. That simply means in concrete terms to be with your partner and sit, be, lie with him or her in that state of presence, a state of no thought, just spacious presence.

It can begin with listening, listening to your partner in this giving him or her space to be, not immediately imposing thought forms. So then a relationship can work, but it's not the relationship then that is making you fulfilled or happy. It's because you dwell in the deeper dimension of space consciousness, and that is why the relationship is fulfilling and a place is fulfilling.

Suddenly, no matter where you go, it's actually okay. Because that, so we could say, if you still don't know what these words are pointing to, you become familiar with the space of now, which is deeper than what happens in it. You know what that is, the space of now, as spacious awareness, just that.

Then the world is suddenly quite all right, even very nice. And the fact that things come and go is actually welcomed. You don't need to cling to one or not want that one.

Forms are still limiting, but inside you're free of those limitations. And this realization has happened to people who became totally limited by some physical form, either people whose body became ill, who couldn't move by themselves anymore, who encountered extreme forms of limitation, people who were in prison, sitting in his little cell all day long, people who were in very dangerous life situation where they didn't know whether they would survive another day. Situations that usually would be called extremely unsatisfying, extremely, the extreme forms of limitation.

And some of those people, through an intelligence that was greater than their mind, let go completely of resistance to the seemingly unacceptable limitation in their lives. And they just, it became so painful to resist continuously, and everybody would say, isn't it normal to feel unhappy when you're in a prison cell? Yes, of course, it's normal.

Isn't it normal to feel miserable when the body can't move anymore? Of course, it's normal. It's normal to feel that this situation is unacceptable and to suffer is normal.

But it is also possible to go beyond normal and some people have done it and they have spoken about it. And what they described, those probably were the first spiritual teachers to whom life did something that usually would be called dreadful. And the suffering that came became so unbearable that something snapped inside and the resisting entity that said, this is the most, that hated themselves and life and everything, suddenly snapped because the burden of suffering couldn't, was becoming unbearable.

And suddenly something snapped and suddenly the prisoner or the person in the wheelchair sits there and says, what's happening? And suddenly an influx of so much peace and aliveness and nothing has changed. And then they sit there and look at the walls.

It's the peace that suddenly overcomes them and they don't know how it happened. And of course, maybe at some point they understand it happened because the now, which seemed so unacceptable, was no longer resisted. And so that entity, the self, the mind-made self that lives on resistance to now dissolves and suddenly space consciousness, unconditioned consciousness emerges.

And when that emerges in your life, it is, there's always an important aspect of that is a great sense of peace, no matter what is happening around you. So it's people who are brought to it are not brought to it because suddenly, usually because suddenly things get so much better in their lives and finally they get so much better and better and better and finally they become enlightened. Usually it's the other way.

They get worse and worse and they lose and become more limited and more limited and until finally something snaps and there it is. So it's through loss and limitation in the absence of a spiritual teaching that you become free internally through loss and limitation, but only potentially. Not every human being can walk through that doorway that opens when there is loss and limitation in your life.

Most humans would still look the other way and look to more future. Don't look at the loss, don't look at the limitation, try to get away from this. So then you're sitting in prison and then for 10 years you're working out plans to escape.

And you try this and you try that or you predict when I get out, I'm going to do that. And then you live totally there. I'm finally going to make it when I get out.

So there's potentially through loss and limitation which are called the worst things that could happen to a person are actually because life is ultimately not cruel, but benevolent. Through loss and limitation, the doorway potentially is there. In other words, it opens.

Whether you walk through, we don't know. And so that is, everybody has a spiritual teacher, even people who have never looked at a spiritual book or even heard of any spiritual teaching. And that is encountering loss and limitation in your life.

And then when that happens, potentially the doors open. Through loss, it opens because loss on whatever level, loss of possessions, loss of status, loss of opinion that other people have of you, whatever kind of loss, the thought forms that are associated with those contents, opinions of other people, of me, possessions that are mine, achievements that are mine and they are lost. The thought forms that had been created that gave you a sense of self also crumble when the external object is lost.

The inner object, the thought form crumbles and that is suffering. It's called suffering because the thought form had self in it. It was me in it.

And me is dying when there's great loss. Me is dying. But potentially now where the form has just collapsed, the thought form, there is a little open space before there was a form, an object covering up the open space.

Now it's dissolved and an open space happens inside you when you don't run away from it and don't deny it and resist it. Through that open space comes unconditioned, what I now sometimes call space consciousness. And when it comes through, it's great peace suddenly.

Something is gone. I should be feeling dreadfully unhappy, but suddenly comes through the opening, comes emptiness as they call it in Buddhism. Before there was something, now there's nothing.

It's through the hole comes what Buddhists call emptiness, which is also fullness, but nobody can, not one designation is right. Space consciousness, presence, simple I am-ness because I am that and that and that has collapsed. I thought I was that, but that's gone.

And then I thought I was that. I thought I was a successful stockbroker, that's collapsed. I thought I was a husband, that's collapsed.

I thought I was a good father, but my children left me, that's collapsed. One thing after another collapsed and leaves nothing but holes. And that's great because the formless, when a form dissolves, the formless is there.

So I am that is gone. I'm not that anymore. And sometimes all that's left is I am, but there's nothing that anymore that all objects have gone.

And I'm left with bare, naked, I am. So life can do that to you. It removes things from you until you are left with the nakedness of all you know is a sense of beingness or presence, but that is deep and beautiful.

Before that got mixed up with being a stockbroker and being a father and being a husband and being some other role. Those have collapsed. And so what's left is just being itself.

I amness itself. Wow. That is called realization, liberation.

On the mind level, you may not be able to say anything about it. And when people ask you, who are you? You might say, I don't know.

I don't know anymore. I thought for a long time, I knew who I was, but now I don't know anymore. And yet on some deep level, there is some kind of knowing, but I can't put it into words.

So those people became the first spiritual teachers who later had realized and could talk a little bit about what happened. They looked back and maybe they realized that surrender happened, complete surrender happened. The loss was not resisted.

The limitation was not resisted, and it became an opening. And then they talked about it and say, this could also happen to you. You're so unhappy.

It doesn't have to be like that. I was even more unhappy than you, and it came to an end. And so that was the beginning of a spiritual teaching.

And then they even created so-called monasteries, places where the others came. And in some cases, what they tried to do was to recreate the conditions that otherwise would happen to you naturally through life, that might have happened to them through life. So what they did was people come into the monastery and they say, okay, now, as you come in here, you lose your identity here.

First thing, you shave your head because hair has to do with external appearance, which is a thought form of me. Then you leave behind your clothes because that's another thought form, showing your status and all male and female, whatever. You leave behind your clothes.

Then you leave behind your name because that also is a thought form. So you get a new name, a spiritual name. Uh.

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. Dangerous, but. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

And they give you clothes that everybody wears the same clothes. So you cannot differentiate yourself from others. You can't compare yourself and say, mine is a bit nicer than yours, although they try to do that, right?

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. And so, and then they create conditions that are not satisfying. Not very much food.

You have to, no possessions. Nothing that really that you can call mine. And then you, many situations are created there that normally you would call unacceptable.

You have to get up at four in the morning and then you sit in meditation in a cold room. In Zen, they might even open the windows in the winter. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

And you sit facing the wall. Facing the wall, empty stomach, Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. A cold room.

You can imagine how much suffering arises if there is still a story and mind activity around this situation. Why did I ever come here? This is, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

This is madness. What am I doing here? And more mind activity, more.

Suffering is almost, they create the situation that would bring up a lot of resistance. And so you can watch the resistance. And it's possible if it works, it can take a long time.

If it works, and then they have other things in Zen. You meet the master. He asks you questions sometimes that have no logical answer.

Famous Zen questions. And you spend time, what's the answer to this? I have to.

And all designed to finally drive you to a point where the mind stops. It stops.

[Speaker 4] (5:00:03 - 5:00:09)

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

[Speaker 1] (5:00:09 - 5:48:14)

And suddenly there's this influx of peace and aliveness, even while you're sitting facing the wall. The stomach is still empty. The body is still cold.

And yet nobody is left to resist this moment. And so there's suddenly this influx of spacious presence of aliveness. And then the Zen master comes and asks you some nonsensical question and says, give me the answer now.

And suddenly a spontaneous answer comes out of your mouth. It may be nonsensical too, but the Zen master is only listening to what level the answer is coming from. And it comes from the deepest level spontaneously.

And the Zen master says, good. Or says nothing, walks away. Because the answer came from there, from the deepest place.

And it has, it's not what you say, it's where the answer comes from. So because whatever comes from directly out of the unconditioned consciousness has power, newness, and freshness to it. It doesn't matter what you say as an answer.

So that's because the Zen master could tell one person who says the same answer as the other person to one person, he says, you're wrong and hits you. And the other person, he says, good. So when you go into traditional, these monasteries that are the first monastery that arose were often designed really to recreate what otherwise happens through life naturally, what life does to you.

So things are taken away from you. They're not, not more things are given you, things are taken away. It's not that you encounter less limitations, you encounter more limitations through going into the monastery.

So the opposite of that would be the mind, the little self saying, if I could only find that ideal retreat place in California, where we get up to a beautiful breakfast, aesthetically, enormous amounts of fresh fruit and everything is totally healthy and full of life and aliveness, and there are flowers, there are birds. And the first thing after breakfast, you get body work done for two hours. And then you go into the pool.

And then you sit on a quiet terrace overlooking the ocean for one hour. And when it's time, then they have prepared your lunch. And you might think, well, now surely the situations must be ideal for me to reach enlightenment.

And you'll find this isn't working either. And after two months there, boredom sets in and discontent comes in and what am I doing here? And you go to sleep, you feel tired after getting up.

And it's sunny again, every day it's sunny. So the mind has certain ideas about how it's going to happen to me. Usually not correct ideas, because the mind thinks in terms of adding, something needs to be added for me, for it to happen.

Nothing needs to be added, it's here now. And you can know it now through no more adding being necessary at all, nothing needs to be added, nothing needs to be changed. And if you cannot realize presence now, at this moment, in other words, it's not going to get any better than this.

How could it? This is it, this is it. If you can't realize it now, then you will realize it through some, not adding, you'll realize it through some loss.

Okay, you can't lose. I mean, eventually you will realize, but this is the most gentle way. And if life hadn't already, probably, if you had not already come into contact in your life with limitation and with loss, probably you wouldn't even be here.

So that's already, the process has already started. It's only for quite a few of you, it's only by the grace of already having gone through major loss or having experienced major limitation in your life that you're here. And you may not know it, but the emergence of that which is unconditioned, the I am, is already happening.

It happened, perhaps, at that moment of great loss that you experienced, and you didn't know it. Something crumbled. Something also still resisted it, perhaps.

There was a reciprocal movement of resistance and something that you couldn't resist. So really, we're talking about death coming into your life in one form or another because loss means some form of death. And death is usually called bad by the mind, the worst thing that could happen.

Any kind of loss is a kind of death. If you derived your sense of self, from thought forms, because the thought forms crumble when there is loss, which is the me, crumbles. And the good thing is, you can't go through life without experiencing that.

It will come to everybody. So the potential, the doorway opens up even if you never come into contact with spiritual teaching, but it gets much easier through the grace of a spiritual teaching, the essence of which tells you, you don't need more time to be free, and you don't need more suffering. You don't.

If you see that clearly, you don't. Because this is your voluntarily embracing the end of the conceptualized sense of self in the head, the end of deriving your identity from mental content. And you are here, nobody forced you to come here.

So this is already happening in you. You are dying already. And perhaps the first part of that death was involuntary.

Life did something to you, removed something from you, or made you encounter extreme limitation. That part was involuntary, but that initiated the process, the emergence. And that brought you here.

And this part of the process, it gets much more pleasant because this is a voluntary embracing of the end of the conceptualized me in the head with its story. And that's a beautiful death that we are dying here. And ultimately, nothing real dies, only certain forms.

You don't even lose your memory. It's not a requirement. Memory remains.

You have a past, but you don't derive your identity from the story of me. The identity flows continuously out of the fullness of now, the aliveness of now, the power of now. That is your essence.

And now, what is now, except this, the space in which everything happens, the alive space in which everything happens. So freedom is here. The door is open, wide open, and you're walking through certain patterns, certain configurations in consciousness may remain, but the space is there around it.

The pain body may remain for a while, pain that humans carry in here from the past, from the human past and your personal past. First, there's the pain from your personal past in childhood. Then there's the pain from human past, going back a long time of human madness, so much madness on the planet, so much suffering.

Every human carries pain, which is human pain. We know, most of you know about the pain body. And you carry that.

It lives in here, a little forms, emotional energy forms, painful energy, residues of past pain, emotional, trapped aliveness, not flowing. Old emotion that comes, pain that you suffer in your childhood is added to the pain that you already come into the world with. That is human pain.

This is the pain body. And so, more pain clings to it. It seeks pain.

It's a little entity, an emotional entity, dormant sometimes, active at other times. Active, it becomes when it needs more food. And then suddenly, a little trigger in your life, creates an enormous influx of pain.

The pain body is looking for more pain to feed on. And it moves into your mind. And then it gets hold of your thoughts.

And all your thoughts become painful thoughts, because the emotional energy of the pain body flows into your thoughts. It uses the structures of the egoic self, its thought structures, and makes them very unhappy. An already not-so-happy story then becomes dreadfully unhappy, because it's energized by past emotional human pain.

And it becomes a self. The illusion is there that this is my pain, me, my painful story, my drama. You're totally in it, and you're forced to think whatever the pain body's energy dictates.

Angry thoughts, if the predominant energy of the pain body is anger. Sad thoughts, fearful thoughts, what's going to happen to me? And then you imagine what's going to happen to you, and it's all bad.

And the emotion loves that. It feeds on thought, because thought is energy. Everything is energy.

Every thought you think is an energy form. The emotional entity renews itself through your negative thinking. It loves that.

And when it's active, it's feeding on your mind. And you are identified with it so much that you don't know it. All you know is that you are miserably unhappy, and there's a heaviness to your life.

And whatever you look, once the pain body's in your mind, whatever you look upon and interpret, you will look through the screen of the conditioning, which is human pain. So you can imagine, I'm sure you know, how distorted your view of the world becomes, your view of other people, your view of your partner, your view of your life situation, your view of anything becomes, how distorted it becomes when you look at it through the veil of your pain. Everything becomes very negative and dreadful.

And so the pain body is having a good time adding to its energy field through your thinking. And this is the addiction to pain that humans carry. It's because of the pain body.

There is something in you that loves the drama and the heaviness of emotional pain. It's not you who you are beyond form. It's the pain body with which you identify as yourself.

But it's not enough. If you live with other people or partner, the pain body will feed on your partner. First, the pain body has to make your partner unhappy.

It can do that easily by pushing the right buttons. And then you get a feedback of pain from your partner. Drama in the relationship happens.

And at that moment, you want more of it because you are the pain body at that moment. More drama, please. And you will do everything to keep the drama going, but you are the pain body at that moment.

And it's feeding on the other person's pain. The other person's pain body probably has also awakened now and it's feeding on the reactions. So most relationships have to go through their drama again and again, periodically.

This is how relationships work, feeding their pain body. Then after a while, the pain body withdraws, has had enough, and you feel better, lighter for a while, the relationship is okay again. And you don't realize that you are condemned to repeating the same pattern again as soon as the pain body needs more pain.

That is the addiction that humans carry to pain, which is usually totally unconscious. And even people who've been engaged in spiritual work for many years, sometimes many of them get totally overtaken by the pain body when it comes because it sometimes has enormous energy behind it. So all that really you need to do is to see it for what it is, to watch it, recognize it as turbulence, as heaviness.

So watch the energy of it, feel it. And what can you do? Yeah, allow it to be, it is as it is at this moment.

But that is the key, is to see it. That means something is arising in you that is not part of that. You see that turbulence in you or the fear, the heaviness, and not even label it anymore, simply feel the energy.

It is energy movement. It becomes depersonalized when you see it. It's no longer a self or me, it's human pain.

Even pain you can drop. It's energy moving. Maybe it's not very pleasant, it's heavy, but it's energy and you, it is as it is.

You recognize it as the pain body, you allow it to be and just watch it as it moves there. That means you've broken the vicious circle. It cannot then move into your mind and feed on your thinking.

It cannot then use other people. If you watch it directly, it cannot pretend to be you. That's the work.

So pain body can be a great awakener because every time it comes, it can deepen your presence. You have to be very alert to catch it when it comes. If you're not alert, before you know it, it's already using your mind.

It's already taken possession of that. Even at that point, it is possible to become conscious of it but a bit more difficult when it's already using your mind and you are involved in a stream of negative thinking. To wake up at that moment is possible, but more difficult.

Catch it when it first comes, but that requires alertness. And so it helps to, I sometimes say, feel the inner body. To have some attention in here is very helpful because that's where it starts.

It's, it lives in the cells of your body and then you can feel it. And you watch it, it doesn't turn into an unhappy me. It is simply an energy movement in you.

It doesn't turn into a story anymore, a self. And that really is liberation. You don't have to wait until there's no remnant of human pain left in you to become liberated.

Really liberation means not to identify with the pain anymore as myself. That's the illusion. That's not, that's the opposite of liberation, it's bondage.

But the fact that you live on this planet means that you very likely will carry a certain amount of pain in you as a human being on this planet at this time. And that's fine. That drives you in, very often it just becomes an important motivating factor for wanting freedom, for wanting to be free, especially in people whose pain body is very dense, very heavy.

They can't stand it anymore. The heaviness of self, of themselves, because they equate it with self, can't stand it anymore. Just as I couldn't stand, I couldn't live with myself because myself, a large part of what I thought I myself was, was painful self.

It was because my pain body was very dense and heavy until I couldn't live with it anymore. But I didn't know it was the pain body. All I knew was I can't live with myself anymore.

So I was driven through suffering to the point of surrender where suddenly the sense of self disidentified from thought forms. It came about through a thought. It was the trigger.

The thought was, I can't live with myself. And the question that came after the thought was, if I cannot live with myself, what does that mean? Am I one or two?

Who am I? Who is the self? There must be two here.

That was a strange question. I couldn't answer the question, but to see that there were two there, I and the self that I couldn't live with brought about a separation between the thought forms of self, including the emotional energy field of pain body and the sense of identity of I am, which usually gets mixed up with thought forms. A separation happened.

And all that was left was I am, but no longer the self. And that was the peace that suddenly I found when I woke up in the morning. Because when there's only I am, there's deep peace in that I am.

All the things that I thought I was were gone. The structure of the self collapsed. It's rare that it collapses all at once.

For most of you, the demolishing process takes place gradually. Some buildings collapse all at once, but most buildings get demolished. You knock off something here, life does that.

A chunk goes there and another chunk goes there. And then finally, voluntarily you come here and that does the rest. So pain body is something that may still be there for a while.

But you can be free now simply by recognizing it as the pain body and by recognizing it, not making it into some personal self, the me. Then it renews itself every time when you believe this is me, my story, my unhappy story and you're totally immersed in your unhappiness with all the thought movements that go with it. There are certain collective aspects also to pain body.

There's a male pain body that has certain male elements, female pain body, the pain suffered by women over thousands of years. So there is a female aspect, there's a female collective pain body. I pointed out in the book through menstruation that often awakens just before.

The female pain body tends to awaken at that time. So that's very helpful to know because then you can be alert when you know it's about to happen, bring in the alertness and wait, actually can watch for it. The time is coming and you can actually say, okay, I'm going to see what the first sign of it is and what it feels like.

And then suddenly something comes, an emotion or physical feeling and it wants to become a thought very quickly and you catch it in its attempt to become a thought. Oh, and then you just watch it on the physical level, the vibration. The pain body then waits for, when you are there present with it, almost looking for it, it cannot fully come up then because you're watching.

It doesn't like to be looked at. Then it goes back. And then when you're looking somewhere else again, less conscious, after a few drinks or after watching television, you lose some consciousness and then the pain body will come in or you're tired after a heavy day's work and you lose alertness.

And if the pain body wants to come up then to feed, it will use that opportunity when you're not so conscious and quickly creep into your thoughts. And before you know it, your thoughts are completely aligned with the pain. So interesting to work with the pain body.

A time comes when pain body will, and this is the case with most of you, when it comes, instead of pulling you into unconsciousness as it usually does, when a certain level of consciousness has been reached and most of you have reached that, then when the pain body comes, you just become more alert. And from that place of alert presence, you can accept it. And the acceptance brings about the change, the transmutation.

It can't feed anymore on your mind. The entire pain body, at the root of it lies non-acceptance. So the only way beyond pain body is to bring acceptance to it because it is.

It is part of the isness of now. And suddenly you may sense a little bit of space around the pain that you feel, a little bit. Here's the turbulence of the pain.

And there's a little bit, I'm talking about something one can't really put into words. There's a little bit of space around it. There's the anger, let's say it's anger.

Anger, and it wants to become thought, but you watch it only on the level of the turbulence. And the watching and the accepting brings about a sense of spaciousness around it. And so the turbulence is moving still within the spaciousness, that's liberation.

And then the spaciousness deepens or you know it. Suddenly you notice how much spaciousness there actually is. And the pain body is no longer that huge.

Before it looked like some huge monster. And suddenly it's a little turbulence in vast spaciousness. Is that all?

Yeah. And that was so dreadful, yes. That made my life so miserable for so many years, yes.

And of course there are maybe other collective aspects to pain body. Some people's personal pain body may also have their share of the pain body of your country because certain countries have pain bodies too, some more than others. Countries where there have been a lot of pain and turbulence in history have a heavier collective pain body.

So every person in that country, part of their pain body is the country's pain body. You carry that too. So in some countries, it's heavier than others.

The old European countries have a heavier pain body. The further east you go in Europe, the heavier it gets. Usually the collective of that.

But every country, there's so much past in these European countries, there's also a lot of pain body. And some more than others. The little countries, a little bit less.

The new world also has a pain body, not quite as deeply seated as the new, as the old. But in America, you have in the collective pain body, what was done to the native people, what was done to black people in North America. Those two great forms of suffering that were inflicted there have become part of the collective pain body of that countries, which means everybody has some of that inside.

But collective or not, it's the same. It's your responsibility to see it in yourself, to recognize it in yourself for what it is, to accept it as it is, to bring presence to it, which is all one. And so allow it to be, and then change happens.

The pain body is one deep no. If it could speak its essence, it would be continuously saying no, no, no. Because humans have lived in that state for thousands of years, the egoic no to life.

And more no can't free you of no. If you say, no, I don't want this pain body, more no, more pain. So you bring a gentle yes into the no.

It is as it is, that's the yes. That's the yes to now, yes. Compassion arises, compassion with human pain.

No matter whether it's in yourself or you see it in somebody else, compassion arises when you depersonalize the pain body. And don't mistake it for a person, neither in yourself nor in somebody else. If you mistake it for who you are in yourself, it becomes the unhappy story of me.

It energizes the already unhappy story of me and makes it miserably unhappy. Then it becomes a person. If you do it to somebody else, then you mistake the human pain.

That person that is in front of you may be at that time possessed by the pain body. It may be in his or her mind. And what pain bodies want from you is some reaction.

They will challenge you and somehow they will try, the pain body would say, it doesn't say it openly, but it would say, I'm unhappy and I want you to be as unhappy as I am.

And that's the challenge when you meet another pain body near you. He wants you to draw you into that.

And so compassion, first, you don't mistake it for who that person is. You realize this is human pain. It's a human condition.

Nobody there really, there's no self there. That's an illusion. And then there's no need to react.

You can actually allow it to be not only in yourself, you can also allow it to be in the other person. And that's compassion too. Gentle, realizing the human condition.

There it is. Nobody can be blamed for that. You can't blame yourself.

If pain body comes back in yourself, you could, the mind will try to do that. It will say, you see, you still have it after all these years. You might as well give up all that spiritual nonsense.

You see, you still have the same pain that you've had for years and you're not going to be free. You're deluding yourself. The pain body is speaking.

Go get drunk, do something. It can sound very convincing. Once it's using your mind, it can have very convincing arguments that how real, and this whole idea of pain body is just so much nonsense.

I mean, it's always, and you know how real this is. It's not the pain body, it's me. That's what the pain body says.

So it has all kinds of convincing arguments that will then, once it uses your mind, your thoughts will reflect what the pain body, they will be controlled by the pain body. You will think through the pain body. And so some human beings only experience the pain body once a month or so, and others more frequently, once a week, once every two days.

How long it stays to feed depends on how much presence there is in you. If presence is there, it passes through fairly quickly and it can't feed very much. If there's no presence, it can get lodged and stuck in your mind for several days.

And finally, it'll have enough and withdraw for a while. And some people walk around with a pain body that is active 90% of the time. That's more rare, but exist, they exist.

We probably all know one or two people who are almost continuously trapped in pain, emotional pain, old pain. And whatever they say to you, whatever they interpret is through the filter of their pain. So they inhabit, of course, a very unhappy universe.

So that's part of our transformation is to become free of pain body. To become free is not a future state to be achieved. It is recognizing it now, accepting it for what it is now, bring a yes to that now, that is becoming free.

So you can only become free now. Free is not to mistake it any longer for who you are. You are the space.

You are not the object in space. And when pain body is there, that happens to be the object in your consciousness. But you are the much vaster consciousness in which it arises.

And you know yourself, you know that you are the much vaster consciousness because we don't want that to become some kind of belief in your head. I want you to believe that you are consciousness. How do I know that I'm right?

You know it by bringing a yes to it, an acceptance, a yes to now. Through that, you know that there is a deeper dimension in you, so to speak. It's no separation ultimately between inner and outer.

It's just a way of speaking. There is a deeper dimension in you that is beyond that pain, beyond anything that has a form, beyond content, and you know it through yes to now. That's the portal.

Anything that you accept takes you to that realization. It doesn't matter what it is. So anything takes you to peace if you accept it.

But whatever happens, you bring the yes to it, you welcome it, that condition takes you into deeper peace no matter what. That's the miracle of transformation. And here we are learning to accept the now even if it doesn't contain great disaster, even if it doesn't contain the pain body at this moment, we just accept whatever form the now takes, whatever form it takes is fine, could not be otherwise.

Welcome, that could be the mantra. Welcome, or yes, even shorter, the most powerful mantra, yes, that's all you need. Let's go into stillness.

If any questions arise, we may look at them this afternoon about pain body or whatever it may be. If nobody's waiting anymore, then I can start. There's a dynamic quality to that stillness.

Even when nothing is happening, it's awake. And then when things start happening, action may be necessary and yet the spaciousness is not lost even in the midst of action, having to deal with things and people. That's our challenge, to bring the spaciousness that we find here, glimpse here, find it, realize it into the world when we meet people.

And also when we sit still, not to fall from the state that is above thought, so to speak, to the state that is below thought, it can happen. You sit there and then suddenly a tiredness comes. And then you suddenly, before you know it, you're also in a state of relative peace, but you're moving towards sleep.

And you may have met people in this world who have so little thought intelligence. As you know, thought is only a small aspect of intelligence, but there are people who have so little thought going on in their heads, they would be called maybe retarded. There's so little thought that they seem to exist in a state of continuous peace.

They may even laugh all the time. And perhaps they are compared to most humans. And they look at you and just laugh and they know they're not thinking anything.

Similar to a little baby. And very similar to a liberated person who is no longer judging you, forming mental images. He also laughs in a very similar way.

And so it can happen that some people, many people are longing to be free of the torture of their own minds. And that's why many people are reaching for some drug. And some of the drugs free you for a little while from the continuous torture of your own mind.

Even just drink a couple of stiff drinks, whiskey. And then suddenly you feel a little bit more, there's a more harmonious, there's the jagged, frantic mind just quiets down a little for a while. It can also happen that drink can awaken your pain body.

That's another matter. Especially in males, it can happen. But, and so there are other drugs that have a similar effect.

And people don't know why they feel so much better. They feel so much better because thinking subsides, is less active. And they don't know that they in most cases, moving towards the sleep state, the unconscious, they are falling below thought.

But that can be liberating. If the thought is torture, as it is for many people, their own minds, to even to fall below thought, at least you have a little bit of relief there with your daily whiskey. Or whatever drug it may be.

For that reason, I once tried LSD because people were telling me, oh, it's like meditation. It's like presence. And so I tried it once so that I can answer questions about it.

And what seemed to happen was an enormous heightening of sense perceptions. Now we talked about sense perceptions this weekend. How there is a portal there also when you look at something.

And there's presence, spaciousness, non-labeling. Perception then happens within that field of stillness. And for there needs to be alertness for that presence.

When you take that drug, what happened? I found the sensory perception became heightened. It's like turning up the volume on all senses.

So visual senses, everything, the colors are vitally alive. Every visual perception jumps at you almost. Auditory perceptions, as if somebody had literally turned the volume up.

And now you can hear even the slightest sound and it sounds loud. But smell becomes very acute. You could even smell a glass of water.

Touch becomes acute. It's almost too much even to touch the texture. And so what happens, you're being pushed into presence.

You can't move much away from now because the now is jumping at you from all through all the senses. So it can be liberating. I can see why sometimes people say it was a great thing to take that.

They had a glimpse suddenly into what it means not to live continuously in the future. They were actually being forced into the now. You can't get away if everything shouts at you, every sense, you're in the now.

So it can be a little glimpse for people of how wonderful it is not to be continuously away from now. And you haven't got much time for thinking when everything shouts at you, every sense is so acute. You haven't got time to think about it because you're simply perceiving.

Well, at least that's how I experienced it. But it was, it seemed the usual state, I prefer it. It's much more, it's more gentle and it's actually more awake.

It's more, you don't need, we could achieve the same effect if we went into a discotheque and this is perhaps why people are drawn to places like that where the music is almost deafening. It's amazing that they can come out of that after three hours undamaged. And of course that also, that shouts.

This morning you talked about the pain body and how it goes into your mind and creates thought. And I always assume that negative emotions were triggered by thoughts. So I'm not quite sure how it works now.

[Speaker 1] (5:48:34 - 5:53:00)

Okay, okay, thank you. The pain body originally developed in humans because of the arising of a mind-made sense of self which becomes suffering. So the egoic state that we have been talking about creates an enormous amount of suffering on this planet and humans create that suffering out of that state which is a state of great lack of fear, of unfulfillment which they need to, they look to fill that sense of lack through greed, through reinforcing their sense of self at the expense of other humans to use other humans to enhance their self, to accumulate possessions so that they have more to identify with and take them away from others.

To adopt a position of rightness, we are right, our belief, our positions. And then you fight a war with others who have a different mental position in order to make them wrong. And so over thousands and thousands of years, more and more suffering is created out of this mental delusion ultimately of not knowing who you are.

In that sense, you're right that that comes, it's created by self-serving thoughts. Thoughts that are imbued with self. So that's the, that structure, structurally is never aligned with what is and that in itself is a state of suffering.

So the origin of the pain body lies in identifying with thought. And now what happens is that this accumulated energy of pain body becomes, works as a vicious circle where it energizes those thought structures that created it in the first place and feeds on them again. And that's called a vicious circle.

So the origin of it is in losing, for humanity lost itself in thought. And so it became suffering was the normal lot for most humans, still is. And that accumulated suffering became the pain body, which now energizes the thought structures that created it in the first place and still feeds on them.

So it's still thought is feeding the pain body. Thought created it in the first place. Now thought is maintaining it and feeding it.

And the pain body in turn energizes those thought structures and amplifies them. And that's called, therefore we call it a vicious circle where one feeds and energizes the other. And this is what, when you don't know that that's happening, you're trapped in that vicious circle, which one could say in Eastern terms, that's the wheel, an aspect of the wheel of karma.

Karma renews itself, action, reaction, which is pain body needs the reaction. Pain body is an aspect of karma. Karma meaning simply unconscious patterns, mental, emotional patterns that you identify with as yourself and those patterns renew themselves.

They create situations and reaction. You could never really come to the end of karma unless the power of the present moment is accessed. Otherwise you have a continuity of time.

Past becomes the future. The present is continuously obscured. The future becomes a continuation of the past.

So you're right, thought creates it, created it in the first place, but now there is a reciprocal movement, a vicious circle in human beings.

[Speaker 3] (5:53:11 - 5:53:48)

Okay, so this relates to something that happened before I came on the retreat. The day before, I was in a phone conversation with someone and I got very angry with them. I put down the phone.

And so there was a reaction, some pain and reaction to pain. And I'm still not clear about whether the other person actually could hurt me for real. Felt like he hurt me.

And I'm not sure now whether it's possible.

Okay, so the person said something to you?

Well, how it was, was that while I was listening, I had half of my consciousness in the body and half listening to the words and was coming this very strong feeling of pain. And then before I know it, I shouted at him on the phone.

Yes, okay. So this is something like that is the pain body reacting because the reaction very often is much stronger than the trigger. The trigger may just be a few words, but the pain is far greater often that you feel when the pain body comes up than would be warranted by the words that you hear.

The words must have touched the pain bodies. Some pain bodies are awakened by certain words that remind the person of some form of pain, perhaps in a childhood, for example, children who were abandoned by their parents. Even the slightest hint, this is only one of many possible examples.

And this has to do with your personal pain body, but the personal and the collective become mixed. So if a child was abandoned by their parents, the slightest hint when you're talking to somebody, a friend or a partner, the slightest hint of abandonment, even a person saying, I can't come, we can't meet tonight, I have a headache or I could trigger it when this pain body that accumulated so much pain when that abandonment happened, and it can serve as a trigger for enormous pain. And all the person said, I don't think I can make it tonight.

And it was far more than that. So that became the trigger and particularly happens when the pain body hasn't taken in much food for a while. So it's ready, actually ready to awaken.

And then the right trigger comes and then that influx of pain comes in. So it's gone now, the event is gone. But of course, all you can ever do with a pain body is to be there while it happens, to watch it, to feel the pain so that it doesn't use your mind.

In a little closer relationship, you may be able to say to the person, what you just said triggered enormous pain in me. It's strange, but I can feel it right now. If that person is open to it, you may not be able to say it in certain relationships that are more superficial.

But with some people, it is wonderful if you live with someone and you have an agreement that whenever you feel pain body, the other person seems to trigger it, that you immediately say what you just said brought up, I suddenly feel an enormous amount of pain. Then it's fine, then you can both say, oh, and you can bring acceptance to it. It doesn't become thought forms.

In this case, it's possible that after you put the phone down, the pain continued because it linked in with your thinking. Yes, so that is a few moments and it was gone because there's already an enormous amount of presence in you. If it hadn't been for that, it would have stayed for much longer, perhaps a few hours, even a day or two.

So it's watching it. And of course, nobody can really hurt you. What they can hurt is the mind form or they can touch the pain that still lives in you.

In that sense, they could hurt, but all they do is activate that which is already there. Ultimately, people do it to themselves. They hurt themselves.

So it is wonderful and many of you will be finding that pain body attacks become much more short-lived now because of the arising presence. Pain bodies don't stick around for that long anymore and hang in there for days as sometimes happens if presence is not yet there, feeding for days and days. So pain body is still feeding a little bit, but isn't getting that much food anymore.

Yeah. Yes.

I was reading pain.

[Speaker 4] (5:59:13 - 5:59:13)

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (5:59:14 - 5:59:23)

It was very strong and then suddenly I saw the wind caressing the grass.

[Speaker 1] (5:59:23 - 5:59:26)

The wind caressing the grass. Yes. Yes.

[Speaker 2] (5:59:27 - 5:59:32)

And the grass was green, so green.

[Speaker 4] (5:59:35 - 5:59:37)

And the pain was gone.

[Speaker 2] (5:59:39 - 5:59:45)

I even like a little poison. Yes. Because it was really strong.

[Speaker 1] (5:59:46 - 6:11:58)

That the open, that seeing of the grass was also thoughtless awareness. It was the arising, not it was the grass is beautiful, but there was more. There was the arising of spacious presence, space consciousness.

And suddenly the little personal self dissolved because there's such vast power there that used the insignificance of that personal event was so clear that it dissolved without any doing on your part. Nature can, any reference to nature can be very helpful just to look at nature and sometimes amazing to see when the pain body is occupying your body. Sometimes if it's strong, it is all over.

It can be in some places, in some cases, it's only in the stomach or solar plexus area as a throbbing or a heaviness here. In other cases, the pain body can occupy your entire body and actually feel, it feels like glue. And then if you sit next to a tree and maybe some grass or some flowers, and you see how free the tree is compared to this and you see the little area of pain is just here.

The pain is here. There's no, there's a blade of grass here and there's no pain there. And there's a flower here.

It exists in that beautiful state of just is. And so you can sometimes see in nature all around you, sanity. And the attention suddenly moves from the thoughts that were feeding the pain body from being trapped in thought, moves out of the prison of thought and becomes presence.

And then you can truly see nature suddenly. So you will encounter strange things, changes in the ways in which your pain bodies manifest now because of the arising presence. And very often you may find the pain body arises in its beginning stage and immediately you feel it.

You recognize it. You look at it, oh, and you feel that energy. And it stays for a little while and it's gone.

It couldn't feed. This is not, don't mistake this for suppressing it. There's no willpower involved.

There's no effort involved. You're not holding it down. You're not saying, I will not feel this pain body.

I am beyond it. I am the spiritual warrior, which you are, but not as a mind form. You are the spiritual warrior and the spiritual warrior has a sword, which I call the sword of presence.

And that's with that sword, you cut through time. Time is the continuity between past and future. And with a sword of presence, you cut through and suddenly it opens and there's the gap of now.

But that cutting through time is also the cutting through thought, the stream of thought. It's the same thing. When you cut through time, you cut through the stream of thought with that sword of now, of presence.

And you even cut through suffering. In the intensity of now, suffering can't survive. Some pain can survive for a little while, not long either.

Suffering cannot survive. Suffering is an unhappy me, with a story that cannot survive in now. So yes, you are a spiritual warrior, but don't develop the concept of me, I am the spiritual warrior.

I am more of a warrior than you or whatever. At any moment, the mind can come in with some new self-concept. It's looking, because now that it's losing its self-concepts, it's looking for the next one that is maybe a new one that it can get hold of.

And that is often the dilemma for people on the spiritual path. And suddenly you end up with a new self-image that was maybe stronger than the one that just went away. And you've gone all the way to the Buddhist monastery.

And before you know it, you become a very important person because you're now a Buddhist monk. It could happen, doesn't have to happen. Sometimes it works beautifully.

I've met some Buddhist monks who were like little children, free. And the younger monks sometimes are very dignified. They still carry, they have just adopted a new self-concept.

Now in the West, being a Buddhist monk isn't that rewarding for your sense of self because if you go to a big city with your robes, little children will shout Hare Krishna at you. But if you go to some Eastern countries, then you get a bit more feedback, respect. And some Buddhist monks I know travel first class on Thai airways because they're given the seats.

And so there's potential here for feeling an enhanced sense of self through being a Buddhist monk. Only potential, it doesn't have to happen. The whole structure is designed to remove it.

And sometimes it works and sometimes it doesn't. The mind is cunning. It's waiting for something else to get hold of.

Teacher, the microphone, if you have a question in the back row, two people in the back. In the meantime, I'll say something. Teachers, people who become spiritual teachers, now the first thing to realize, if you believe that being a teacher is an identity, then you're trapped again.

It's nobody's identity to be a spiritual teacher. It's a temporary function. I am a teacher because the words come out of my mouth.

They come out of my mouth because there's an empty space. So they come. That makes me into a teacher.

Not in my identity, but the temporary function. The moment I walk out of here, what teacher is there? There's no teacher left.

It's just a person walking. The teaching is over. While it happens, I may be a teacher.

It's a function, not an identity. And so the challenge of every spiritual teacher, and some of you are already teachers in your own capacity, and many others of you are becoming spiritual teachers. How could you not?

You could not not teach as this new state of consciousness arises in you. You have to teach, not always in the same way, not necessarily this directly, but in one way or another, you will teach. And you may even teach directly.

And then the challenge is, again, even at that stage, the mind can come in and claim some new identity, especially if you get projections of other people. They project something onto you because they've sensed the power that comes through you. And they may equate that power with the form of the teacher.

But the form is only the hole in the flute. That's, the hole has also a form, it's round. Now this form is not round, it's a different shape, but it's the same.

And so if you equate the power that comes through with the form through which it comes, then you will project an image onto the teacher of specialness. And that's quite normal for the mind to do, to believe that this form is special, must be more special than me, for example, or I will also want to become as special as this one. And if a teacher is bombarded by projections of specialness for years, it's possible that he or she could succumb to the bombardment of specialness.

And one day it could interfere with the teaching and suddenly the teacher might say, I am the one. No greater teacher has ever been or will ever be than I. It becomes, a distortion comes in.

Yes, of course, there is only one teacher ever, which comes through many forms. And then some form of specialness can creep in. It happens more easily to teachers who live only surrounded by devotees, disciples or followers, who don't do their own shopping anymore, who are totally sheltered and protected and don't meet anybody else anymore, except all these people who think this being is the one and then they themselves don't realize that the same power that is in you, that even prevents you from realizing it in yourself.

It's a great temptation for the teacher and it's stopping you from realizing that which you're projecting outward. This is not to say that you cannot use the power that comes through the form of the teacher as a temporary help to draw out that which is also in you. So to be able to use the help that is there in the temporary form of the teacher, this is good, but not to confuse the power and the form.

Some teachers free their students by dying. And at last, the form has dissolved and then some of their followers then suddenly realize, oh, I am the same. Okay, the microphone has reached.

Hi, I'm having more and more problem with planning, making planning and then having to follow up the things I plan. And to make an example, to come here was very difficult. I was happy where I was, very far, and in the last week I got very miserable and confused.

Why should I go so far? And on to India afterwards and the whole thing. And I got confused, for example, in that instance, what was, what is it to be, to surrender to the now?

And also, what is it that, beyond what I think is right or wrong, what is it that make me move finally? Okay, thank you.

[Speaker 1] (6:12:53 - 6:41:17)

When you are identified with a self, a mind-made self, a very common state is doubt. You're in doubt as to what to do. And some people remain in that state of doubt for a long time.

Sometimes it's doubt with one reference to just one particular situation. Where should I live? Should I go to this retreat or should I stay home?

And then you could sit and start to think about it. And it's agonizing sometimes to finally arrive at a decision. And even in the last moment, when you pick up the phone and says, yes, I'm going, the last doubt creeps in and is, do I really want to go?

And this is particularly, I mentioned this perhaps on the first day of the retreat, and every retreat, particularly retreats, and some people don't turn up and you don't know they're gone. And sometimes the organizer says they called up and they really wanted to come and then suddenly they're just gone or they cancel at the last moment. Sometimes it's a true emergency and they cannot make it.

But in other cases, here in this situation, something in you feels drawn here. That is the emerging presence. And something else in you doesn't want to be here.

And even during this time here, you may feel the two, something feels wonderful being here and there's an opening and something else, perhaps a mental commentary is saying, what are you doing here? Or has doubts whether you even should have come. He says, is this really working?

What's he talking about? Some kind of commentary. And you may shift between the two.

At every retreat, quite a few people are prevented from coming because of arising doubt. And that is the mind really not allowing you to come to the retreat. And it uses doubt as a means of confusing you.

And this is with that particular, in this particular situation. Now, what is the mode in other situations, normal situations, you have to make decisions. Should I go there or not?

What is the motivation for doing in the normal dysfunctional state? And the motivation for doing is some kind of need that through that situation, I can add something to me or some kind of fear. The doing comes out of the two movements of desire or fear.

They are the motivating factors in the normal state of consciousness. And they may also cancel each other out. You may want to go to meet, go to a dinner party, and you feel desire.

Maybe I will meet the one person who's going to make me happy there. So there's the desire movement. And then you're getting ready.

You're getting dressed. And then comes in the fear movement. Maybe I won't meet him or her.

And maybe I'll have to, these people will ask me questions that I can't answer. Maybe they know more than me. Maybe I'll feel inadequate there.

Maybe fear, and you can sometimes remain immobile through because fear and desire cancel each other out. In other cases, at some point, one predominates and then you're moved into you do it or you don't do it. You do it out of fear or you don't do it out of fear or you do it out of desire or you don't go there.

Desire can be very, very strong. Desire is often mistaken for willpower. You could have, for example, a great desire for food, which is psychological.

The body's need for food is limited. The mind's need for food is only one aspect of the mind's need for more. And if it's not more in some other area, it will take in more food.

As long as it's more, it's a taking in of more. It's a psychological need, which is a very strong desire. And then some people go on a diet and they say, okay, and that's considered willpower.

They have the willpower to say no to the food and then they lose weight. But that's just a stronger desire. The stronger desire is to look attractive, to attract someone.

And that desire cancels out the desire for food. So there's a continuous movement and fluctuation of desire and fear, and you move between the two. Desire implies future, more in future.

So the doing is governed by needing to arrive at some point in the future or fearing that point in the future because the future is promising and threatening at the same time. It promises fulfillment. Perhaps I can complete myself, my story, my sense of self, can be finally myself through more future, or the future is a threat because it might kill you.

In one sense, it does because eventually you die. So the little self needs the future and fears the future, but future is the dominant force that governs your actions. Now, is it possible as the alignment with now arises, how do we live?

If we don't, if we no longer have the psychological need for future, how are we going to be motivated to take action? And that is an interesting question. What replaces desire as a motivating factor or fear as a motivating factor?

Because some people work extremely hard out of the fear of being insignificant, out of the fear of being nobody, they become millionaires. And for 30 years, all their energy came out of fear of not being good enough. And finally they build up an empire, big corporation is there.

They've made thousands of people unhappy, including themselves, but they've created money. Yes, and a lot of unhappiness. So at first, I didn't have a teacher.

The shift happened to me suddenly and it left me in a state of, one could say, an external observer would have said a state of confusion because suddenly I had no motivation anymore to do anything because the future had become unnecessary. The psychological future had become unnecessary. The present was so deeply fulfilling that I said, why do anything?

This is so beautiful. So I sat around for two years. Miraculously, I survived.

And gradually, doing happened by itself. I found myself getting up, seeing someone, person coming to see me. Some doing arose that didn't have the future as a goal.

It arose out of the joy of doing what you're doing at this moment, not out of the psychological need of future. Of course, in everybody's life, some planning is necessary. Everybody had to plan to come here.

I had to put it in my diary a year before. It already said, retreat in Italy. So that was, of course, future came in, but that kind of future is very easy.

That you cannot avoid. It's called practical future. It's called clock time.

You cannot avoid that living here. You can live in a monastery and they also, they wake up at a particular time. Tomorrow morning, you are going to make breakfast, they say.

Okay, that's time. You can't get away from practical time when you live in this world. And so even I wear a watch.

Sometimes I hide it because so many people say to me, oh, I just, you wear a watch? Why is that? It doesn't make sense.

But it's helpful if you don't wear a watch, that's fine too, but it helps me to get here on time. Otherwise, I might turn up an hour late and I just drift in and say, well, there's no time. And some gurus do that in India.

They don't wear a watch. And there's one guru who could turn up at any time and often during the night he doesn't sleep. He could suddenly turn up for satsang at three in the morning.

And so the followers wait around. Nothing, no time has been specified. There's no structure.

He could turn up at any moment. That's fine too. But this would not be possible there.

This meeting would be difficult in that way. That's fine. Those structures work in that context.

And here there are other structures where time is used. Time that is used for practical planning is simply totally unproblematic. You pick up a phone and say, book a flight for next week, whatever it is.

But then the other time, the psychological time, the mental projection into some future moment, that is where the heaviness of future comes in. That's where time becomes a burden. That's where time becomes a desperate need for future.

So how do you live when the shift happens? Well, psychological time becomes unimportant. Practical time you can still use.

Now, when psychological time becomes unimportant, which is the great inner need for the next moment isn't there anymore, then action that arises out of you is no longer a means to an end. There may be an end, but the doing is always of greater importance than the arriving. You could write, find yourself writing a book.

Don't write a book too soon, just wait a little. But you could find yourself writing, suddenly the writing happens. And that can be a powerful movement.

In my case, it was a pen and notepad. In most people these days, it would be the computer. That can be a very powerful movement and very energizing.

When power flows into writing, an intense field of aliveness suddenly arises. That is deeply fulfilling in itself. Of course, the writing, you might say, I'm writing a book.

It may become a book at some future moment, some future time, it may be a book. But now the writing is, I'm giving my full attention to that. If the writing is a means to an end because I want to publish a book, I also want to be a successful writer.

I want to, that is a mind image, future, thought of future, where you see yourself as having achieved enhanced recognition through publishing a book. Then the writing is a means of getting you there. And you might put a lot of energy into it, but that energy comes out of, I must get there.

And you could even write a very clever book or book that contains a lot of thought, new thought structures, but not a truly alive book. The truly alive book that contains power comes out of the state of being aligned with now. And so the motivating factor for doing is no longer the pull towards future.

The motivating factor is the joy, aliveness, and fullness that is there in the doing. And that's, joy is an important part of that, power also. So that is the, that replaces desire and fear, which are future pulls for doing.

And any doing that comes out of that joy is also a doing, the doing that comes is no longer what it is that you need to do or that wants to be done through you, is not arrived at anymore through mental decision-making, which involves a lot of doubt. When you start thinking, should I write a book or should I not write a book? On the one hand, if I write a book, I might lose three years of my life, already an absurd thought, because you're already projecting that you're not going to enjoy yourself.

You might spend three years of your life and you're projecting future. I might lose three years where I could earn money and instead I'm going to write that book which might not even get published. On the other hand, if I don't risk that, I'll get stuck with my job.

So that requires a lot of thinking and you wake up in the middle of the night, on the one hand, on the other hand, but then what should I do? And then you can talk about it, think about it, and years could pass before you have decided whether to write a book or not. Not uncommon.

This is just one example. Now, in the state of alignment, what it is that needs doing, or one could say that wants to be done through you, what it is emerges, one could almost say ready-made as a realization, this is what I have to do. It's spontaneous, the doing arises.

In some cases, it might mean leaving somewhere. We talked about that. You might be in your office and suddenly you get up and walk out.

No decision-making involved. Or the book, you might one day, you get a notepad and a pen and, oh, and after one page, you might know this is going to be a book because you can sense the power that's in there, but you didn't sit down and try to decide, am I going to write a book or not? Suddenly, the writing happens through you.

And so spontaneity, also intuitive realizations, come out of the state of alignment with now. So that replaces the old way of doing, which is very problematic. And you know how problematic it can be, this yes, no, but, if, what if, and thought and thought and thought.

Okay, there's another question. Oh, one more question in the back and then the microphone will travel to you. Excuse me, but what happens if...

Yes. No, that's an interesting thought. This really isn't working.

Now, if you recognize that as a thought, then you don't need to believe in that thought completely, because the mind will throw up all kinds of thoughts of a similar nature that are telling you that it's pointless, it's not working. Or now, say yes to now, it says, no, not now. I will practice again tomorrow.

The mind says, this is not the right moment. I have too much on my mind now. It just won't work.

The mind has these thoughts and they will come up in you. If you don't recognize them as thoughts, then you're identified with the thought and then you act on it. And each time the thought will say, give up, let, don't even, don't.

You have too much, too many problems to deal with. You just can't get into all that stuff about portals and all that, just think about your problems. That's more important.

And when a thought like that comes, you see the thought. And then you say, oh, there goes another one of those thoughts, or you simply, you watch that. And that's already presence arising.

The moment you even notice a thought as a thought, the simple fact of noticing that here's a thought, there's already the dimension that is beyond thought, presence, arising, because it's through presence that you can notice the thought. So the very thought that is noticed, the thought that says, I can't remember what that thought, that there's no point, you might as well give up, or whatever the thought says, there's no point in all this. And as this thought is noticed, the seeing of it as a thought is the arising presence.

In other words, as you see that thought, there is a space around the thought and that is the witnessing presence. And then once you recognize that, the thoughts in themselves are no longer a problem because you're no longer completely identified, or one could say, you don't believe in every thought as if it were some truth. It is the mind attempting to stay in control.

It's only an energy movement, it has a momentum. And then comes the next thought that might say, whatever, I can't be present now. There's just too much going, so many disturbing things going on around me.

Can't be present now, how could you be? It's impossible to be present here, not in this place. And then you watch that thought and you're present.

Yes, how would that look in practice? For example, what you're using the portal of? Well, you're walking down the door, you're seeing things, you can see them.

Yes. And you're thinking, I must stop thinking. I'm obsessed about stop thinking, stop thinking, and the stop thinking becomes the thinking.

Yes, yes, yes, that's a good point. Now, you may notice, I would never say stop thinking, because that would be like saying, don't think of a green elephant or pink, pink elephant. There is the possibility that the state of thoughtless awareness may arise here through one of the portals.

So if you are looking at something, you may be looking at a tree, and then it's possible that thoughts arise that either have nothing to do with what you're looking at, or thoughts arise that are commenting on what you are looking at, or thoughts arise that are saying, I'm looking at this tree, and I'm still thinking, but I shouldn't be thinking. It doesn't matter what kind of thought arises, even the thought that says, you see, you're still thinking, and you should be not thinking. No matter what the thought says, it's enough to recognize thought as thought, because that also is a portal.

And now at this moment, your mind is saying that this is not possible, which is another thought. So that thought loses its power to draw you in completely, to draw all your attention in completely. So here goes another thought.

You could say that, which is a thought also, but that can free you from taking the thoughts so seriously or regarding them as obstacles, because when you regard thought as an obstacle that you need to overcome, you energize the thoughts. What happens when you use a portal like the inner body? Can you feel the aliveness in your body?

No. Can you feel the aliveness in your right hand? No, no.

If you closed your eyes, close your eyes, hold your right hand like this without opening your hand, without opening your eyes, without moving your hand, without touching anything, you're not looking, you're not touching anything, you're not moving your hand. Can you know whether your right hand is still there or not? How can you know whether it's still there directly?

Not as a memory. Okay. And I haven't yet met anybody who cannot feel a little bit of energy where there is a right hand.

And you also, there's some energy there. It may not be much, yes. That is entering the inner body.

And if you just hold attention there for a while, at least it's not in the head, it's there. Some thoughts may still happen, dance on the surface, but you've taken attention away from thoughts and it's there now. If you can feel one hand, you can feel other parts of the body.

You can feel the other hand. It's that you've entered the body. Once you've entered it, other parts you will also feel.

It comes by itself. So that may be certain portals work better for certain people. That's why there are more than one portal.

They all take you to the same place. And that's why I recommend different portals so that you can find the one that works best for you. It may well be that the one that you said you couldn't feel could well be the best portal for you.

And so if you can feel that, that's all that's needed. Thought loses its importance when you inhabit the inner body and it becomes an anchor for presence. So I would say the one that you haven't tried is the best one for you.

And eventually all the portals take you to the same place. If you end up in the same place, one portal goes that way, one goes that way, goes that way, they all end up there. So which one you use doesn't matter.

The one that works best for you. And for some it's sense perception, for some it's listening to silence, for some it's the inner body, for some it's to say, I allow this moment to be as it is. They all become portals that take you to the same place.

So it works. And thoughts may still come in occasionally, which might say, I can't be in the body now, there's too much going on. And then you just see the thought and you feel your right hand.

Oh, we may need to, we have clock time here. Okay.

I'm sorry. Okay, I guess I'm looking for perhaps a humorous picture or a hint. Many of my, much of my time is just passing by without being present.

And you said before, when presence arrives from the formless, that it's nothing that we do. So it's some kind of need from there or grace or whatever. On the other hand, I found being in intense situations, being faced with difficulties or duty, it works quite often.

But then there are many times when I'm just busy with little things or dealing with people, I'm just unconscious. Is it just something I have to wait for then or just have to be patient? There's nothing I can do, so to speak.

That is the challenge that everybody faces. That as presence arises, the arising presence will be challenged by the human mind. Both from within you, we could call that your mind.

Ultimately, the human mind is the human mind. But let's just call it your mind. It will be challenged by your mind.

In cooperation with your pain body, the arising presence will also be challenged by other human minds, people around you, situations around you, because these structures, the human-made structures of our world, social, economic, political, work structures, they are all made by the unenlightened human mind, the egoic mind. So work situations, the way you think, the way people do things, all those pre-existing structures are created by the madness, ultimately. So you are moving in external structures created by the human mind, and you are meeting in those mind structures with other human minds.

For example, if you're a teacher, many schools these days are quite mad places. And to be a teacher is extremely stressful. Even hospitals, if you're a nurse or a doctor, again, hospitals, many hospitals are quite mad places.

Potentially, they could be great places of healing or regeneration, but there are people running around. And it's a miracle that healing still happens, and it happens sometimes despite the mind. Some of it comes through the nurses that still bring some presence without knowing it, or perhaps nurses have been coming here too, and doctors.

So they bring something to balance the madness that is there. So almost any situation that you move into, you will still encounter the agitated human mind coming at you, if not from within you, from without. And so that's the great challenge, whether you teach at a school or work in a hospital or work in a corporation or work for social services, helping people, and everybody's unhappy, and everybody's complaining, and you go to committee meetings, and there's continuous arguments and position-taking and disagreement, all those things that make up the egoic mind.

And your challenge is to bring presence to that situation. But the human mind will want to draw you in, and its pull can be quite strong. "'Come and join us in our madness,' it says."

And the pull is there. And the pain body can be very active too in those situations. And the pain body is saying, "'Come, be as unhappy as we are.'" And so this is how presence deepens. It's through the challenges of living in this world that presence deepens. And then one day you find yourself being in the same conflict situation and simply being there as a spacious presence, not a reactive entity. And you watch what people are saying.

You look, watch. And not thinking they should be more sane, they should behave differently, they shouldn't be so unconscious and selfish and greedy and power-hungry. What you're looking at is simply the human condition.

Compassion comes, but really there's spacious presence, but it needs to be intense. And then nothing else is needed but to hold the non-reactive space of presence, which of course doesn't involve effort. There's an intensity to it.

There is even a fierceness to it. You cannot explain through words the qualities of presence. In one sense, one can say it has no qualities because it has all qualities, but there is a fierceness to presence, particularly in challenging situations.

Remember the sword, what I call the sword of presence, the fierceness that you can see when you look at old paintings of Zen masters. There is a look that is almost frightening in its fierceness with bulging eyes. They are challenging, very challenging to encounter.

There. That's the fierce aspect of presence. Underneath it, there's a softness, a gentleness.

And sometimes the fierceness is necessary, or it is just an intensity of, the fierceness is not fighting anything, it's just there. And that, any situation that you bring that into, hang on to your body if necessary, the inner body while you're there, and to be deeply, really rooted here. And then you watch.

And that is enough to change the situation. Not that you even want to change the situation, then you're making, creating some future again. The presence that arises is not a means towards changing the situation.

You give up the desire or the need to change the situation. Because that also is a need for something to be different from the way it is. It's a psychological need for future.

So in any situation that is full of conflict, full of unhappiness, full of problems, even also healing situations where a person comes to you for advice or healing, not believing that you need to change the situation. You need to improve the situation. And then you make presence into a means to an end, and it's not presence anymore.

You're trying to achieve something through being present. Presence is enough in itself. And whatever is needed to change the situation comes out of presence without prior intention that says, this is what I'm going to do in this situation.

And you find yourself, the doing happens. And sometimes no doing happens, and something changes in the energy field around you. Something changes around the conference table.

Something changes in the family where they're having dinner in the kitchen at the table, and everybody is shouting, and suddenly the mother or the father holds presence, and the shift comes. Presence. Invariably, things change when you no longer demand, because that is an important part of the arising presence, you no longer demand that this situation should be different because it isn't.

It is as it is. And only through the recognition of is as is does presence arise. And that is the miracle.

When the need for it to be different goes, then it changes. Because presence always means yes. And that yes will have to very often be a yes to whatever stage humans are at in their present evolution, which is called extreme dysfunction.

But it's not that you're saying, I say yes to extreme dysfunction. No, that's a mental stuff again. There's simply a yes to what is.

You're not condemning any of these people that are participating in the drama and thinking they should know better. They should be enlightened. They shouldn't be so unconscious.

They shouldn't be like that, and like that, and like that. They are as they are, and there's nothing personal to it. It is simply a manifestation of human consciousness or unconsciousness.

So let's simply be there as the space in which it happens. Then healing happens, transformation happens. Sometimes words come out of your mouth.

You contribute something to the situation, but the words that come have a different energy quality to them than before. They have a power. You may not say anything.

Somebody else may suddenly wake up and say something that is for the first time something deep and true that is not designed to create more conflict. And so that's when you realize for the first time the most agitated people very often become, wake up when you are there as spacious presence. And this happened to me at first.

I was astonished when it happened several times when agitated people came to me and said, you must do something about this. This needs to be done. Look at these papers.

This is a dreadful problem. This is fear. Yes, just presence.

And with one person, she dropped, suddenly dropped all her papers and said, this isn't important, is it? And then she said, there's only love, isn't there? Yes.

Nothing was needed. No doing was necessary. Just that.

Beautiful. Well, the clock says 6.20. It's now, of course. Several people have given me watches that have, wherever the numbers are, it says now, now, now.

So, and they're always accurate. Let's enter stillness. It seems that time moves on.

Every experience. First, it's only a thought form, retreat in Italy. For some people, it never became a reality.

It remained a thought form. They never turned up. And they're still thinking, should I have gone?

And some are beating themselves up. I didn't go. I missed it again.

I should have got this. I had booked and then I canceled. How stupid.

How stupid. So it remained a thought form, future. For others, those who are here, the thought form seemed to get closer.

Future thought, thought form is future is a thought form. And then it seemed to get closer. It didn't get closer, it's just a perspective.

And then suddenly, it opens up. It's the now. It actually is, it's here.

And then. And then it's a thought form again. A memory, supported perhaps by some photos, or even moving images on the screen.

See a video, who knows, but it's gone. And so it seems the express train of time never really stops. And you see the landscape, it's coming.

So that's every experience fleeting. And you may find the same when you reach the end of this lifetime. A collection of experiences that went by quickly and then your entire life, was that it?

Maybe it was a dream. The dream-like quality, we talked about it, of something that has moved into past. So time, we seem to be trapped in it.

And now time is dragging us along. We can't stay here. Time is dragging us away from here.

No, I want to stay here. But that whole idea of time is only thought, both future and past. And although the experience of this gathering is fleeting and comes to an end, and seems like whenever any experience comes to an end, it's a little death, a little bit dying.

You die many times whenever something ends. It's not without reason that in many languages, the word for goodbye includes the affirmation that we are going to meet again to make that death a little easier. Because there seems to be something missing when you say goodbye.

And not many people leave it like that, although in English, that word itself doesn't have the notion that it's. Usually in English, you then add, see you, see you soon, see you next year, see you at the next retreat. Other languages, you don't have to add that because au revoir, auf wiedersehen, and so on, they already have that idea built in, see you again, which means goodbye.

So it makes the death a little easier. And there's the promise of future, another event in the future, a rebirth. We can have a similar experience again.

But this is not what I'm promising you here. I'm not saying, don't worry, we're going to have another retreat. We may, but when that comes, it'll be the same as this, a thought form, it's here and it's gone.

And then there we are again. And then, so the experience comes to an end, but as an experience, this wasn't a great thing anyway. As an experience, it could have been much more exciting with all kinds of very exciting things happening.

Well, maybe Paul, one or two of you, something exciting did happen, I won't inquire. But probably for most, as an experience, there wasn't that much in it, that much, not that much happening, just beautiful, but not that much happening in it. And that wasn't the purpose of this gathering to fill it up with some kind of content.

Some content is inevitable, the words are content, the sense perceptions are content, but as content goes, you've probably had more exciting experiences where there was more content. So on the level of content, this was okay. And that is the experience, the content of it, the form that it takes ends.

But the real reason for us meeting here was to point to something else, to that which is beyond content. Both content, the external content of your life, which we could call the life situation, and beyond the inner content of your life, thought forms, emotional forms, the stream of thinking, the emotional fluctuations, including the pain body, to see that which is before content and after content arise, after it comes and goes. It's born and dies.

This experience was born and then it dies. Now it's dying. That's beautiful too.

So the entire gathering was pointing to another dimension that is even beyond an experience as such, because experience implies that it comes and goes. It has a beginning and an end. And it exists in time, beginning, end.

And then you see that anything to do with content, external or internal, has a certain lifespan. It's fleeting. Everything.

And because it's so fleeting, it has a dreamlike quality. I mean, there's something in Shakespeare somewhere, we are the stuff dreams are made of, or something like that, a dreamlike quality to one's life, because of the fleetingness of everything. And so we see that which already, of course, the Buddha pointed to as one of the characteristics of existence is impermanence.

And to see that in a strange way is already a kind of liberation. Even just to recognize how impermanent all experiences are, how can you recognize it? If everything were of the same color in this world, yellow or green, every object, whatever you look upon, then obviously that color wouldn't exist because you have nothing to differentiate it from.

If everything were yellow, there would be no yellow. You wouldn't recognize yellow because everything is yellow. If everything were impermanent, one could say perhaps, even the recognition of impermanence would not be possible.

To see it means that there is something that is beyond the fleetingness of all phenomena. And when you see how fleeting it is, that seeing arises out of the unconditioned, timeless consciousness, presence, space consciousness. From there, you see the world of form.

It is not judged. You take no perspective, position, standpoint, reaction. It's simply seen.

The moment it becomes a judgment and say, isn't it sad? We live in this dreadful place where everything is turning to ashes. It's already turning to ashes.

Even at this moment, every object, every body, we just don't see it right there. But if we saw a speeded up version of this room, 2000 years compressed into one minute, everything would be turning to ashes. And that would be an amazing spiritual realization if you could see here, let's imagine film is speeding up, let's say 4,000 years, which is very little on a planetary or cosmic scale, 4,000 years here, nobody's interfering with what's happening, compressed into one minute, and then you see it on a film.

And then you would see, first of all, the bodies sitting here. They would shrink, get old and wrinkled and suddenly dissolve. The flesh melts, bones remain for a little while and they also crumble.

And then the wood would go. And even metal would get rusty and then dissolve. And then after that minute, just maybe a little bit of dust and then a gust of wind comes and it's all gone in one minute.

And you're watching. That watching in which no judgment arises, a simple seeing is the witnessing presence. Is the space in which all phenomena come and go.

And that is the essential nature of yourself. When you, it looks from an external viewpoint as if you were dragged away from here by time. You can't get out of time, so this comes to an end, you have to leave.

But really when you go here, all that happens is the space of now, which is the space of aware presence, which is the space consciousness. All that happens is that some other forms, some other experiences come into, appear in the space of now, your field of awareness. For example, a train appears.

The body moves. Then it sits on the train and goes. And it goes.

Landscape. And then maybe an airport appears. And then the vision of the inside of an airplane appears.

And then another airport appears. Space. And there remains, things appear and disappear in the field of awareness.

That's all. Now it has, one thinks of that as I am going there and then I'm going there. Ultimately, on a deeper level, you're not going anywhere.

You're not going anywhere. The scenery changes. The hologram changes.

The holodeck, for Star Trek enthusiasts. It's like forms appear for a moment. And then if even at any moment you could close your eyes and then the visual dimension disappears except the memory traces.

You could sit on an airplane, close your eyes. Then a huge amount of content disappears unless it's replaced immediately by thought. You close your eyes and then there's just a dark space.

And then there's auditory perceptions left. If they also disappeared, there would be some touch, but let's say that goes too. Then simply there's a deep, vast space.

There's something there and yet nothing there. You, in your essence, would be there, the I am-ness. And so it's that to see that the changing phenomena, they happen within an unchanging space.

And most humans are totally unaware of the unchanging space which I sometimes call, because then people can, it's a useful perspective, which I sometimes call the space of now. People are unaware of the space of now. All they know is the content of now, what happens.

Because the content changes all the time, people believe that every day consists of many nows, many moments, every hour seems to consist of many moments. If you look more deeply, you realize there are no many moments. Your life consists of the one unchanging now moment.

It is never not the now, this. So it's an illusion to think that my life consists of many moments, because I'm mistaking the form that the now takes for the essence, the space of now. That's why it seems that there are many moments in one's life, whereas there's only one moment.

That also brings out the delusion of time, ultimately delusion, which is connected with the workings of your thought processes. And there it has its place, but you don't need a lot of philosophical ability, first of all, to see, perhaps even a 10-year-old, maybe a 10-year-old could see it more clearly than an adult who is trying to figure out what this means. There's nothing much to figure out except to see that it's always now, this is self-evident, that nothing ever happens, nothing ever is experienced, felt, even thought.

You can think about the future, but you have to be thinking it now. You cannot do anything, you can't, life and now, you and now are inseparable, it always is this. Then the form of now, of course, changes.

Here we have this form, this room, a body sitting here, words coming out of the mouth, ears perceiving the words, the space of this room, the bodies filling this room. The space of this room, when you become aware of that, that already takes you beyond identification with content. But yet the content is this, and in a few hours, it may be something totally different.

The space of now will have different content to it, as I just described, comes, goes. So usually all that people know and are aware of and are identified with is the content of now. And as such, it never lasts very long.

Like this experience, the content is this, the external form of our retreat coming to an end. The content is about to disappear from the field of now, all the forms. Then there may be left mental content, memories of this event, they could linger for longer, but it's no longer the actual reality.

But even those things, you can only think in the field of now, those thoughts come up in the field of now. It is possible that while you're sitting on an aeroplane, the field, the space of now may be filled primarily with memories of this event, rather than the sense perceptions of that moment. So sense perceptions and thoughts and emotions fill up the space of now.

And most people, that's people's lives. That's what people see as my life. It's the content of my life.

And there's something not that satisfying about it because of the short-lived nature of all those content things. And I called that at the beginning of our retreat, I used the expression object consciousness for that, to be only conscious of content, not conscious of space in which it happens. In other words, to be only conscious of the content of now, but not of the now, which is the space.

Space consciousness arises when there is a sudden awareness of this, the underlying field, which defies, which cannot be really put into words because every word is content again. So we are using words and thoughts to point to something that cannot possibly be understood through words or thoughts. So one could say it's an impossibility for us to understand what these words point to.

And the reason why we are here is not to understand that, don't even try. The words, the purpose of the words is simply to point there. So I can say there is that which happens and there's that which enables it to happen, the space.

Sometimes described as stillness, but no word is totally adequate. And I suggest to you, I've been suggesting this, to know for yourself this such, so intangible thing that people spend a lifetime in a Zen monastery trying to get it and often don't. But now it's getting easier.

That, I suggested that little portals appear in your life through which that dimension can be realized. One is silence because it's the absence of content. To acknowledge the absence of content, that which corresponds to that inside you can acknowledge that nothing else.

Silence, no content. So you listen to it, you notice it. And suddenly the noticing is the arising of no content in your mind until a thought comes in that says, oh, it's very silent.

That may come in after three seconds. That's okay. It may come in after two seconds.

It's okay. But there were two seconds of no content. The first moment of listening to the silence, which is listening to nothing.

And that is not significant from the point of view of content, but it is deeply significant because something is arising, a dimension of consciousness that is unconditioned, that in which there is nothing is born or dies because there's no form in it. The formless, unconditioned dimension that is the essence of who you are. And that in such a seemingly insignificant thing as noticing silence, if only for a few seconds, two or three seconds, that is arising.

It's then immediately perhaps covered up again by content because a thought comes in that says, why can't you listen to it for longer? And then perhaps again, the attention goes and there's a listening again. And during that moment of listening, there's a little space in which there's not a single thought because you cannot listen to silence through thought.

Thought is mental noise. Thought knows nothing of silence. It is unaware of silence.

To even have an awareness of silence as a dimension, even though there may be a few noises as an underlying dimension, which is always there somewhere, the dimension of silence is there, here very much so, to even be aware that silence exists requires you to be without thought for an instant. And in many cases, it is only an opening. And that is the same opening that I suggested to you when you first look at something, sense perception, it comes into your field of vision.

It arises in the space of now. When you first look at something, in that first perception, there is a spaciousness in which you have not had time yet to formulate a thought about it, to call it something, to label it. So when I turn my head and look at this for the first second or two, there is simply the looking.

It's actually longer than a second or two. And if you could truly see that, you'd be amazed. You'd be amazed.

Truly see means stay with the spaciousness in which the labels don't arise, that comes. Don't demand that as I should be seeing it without. It's enough to notice that in the first moment the perception arises in a field of stillness.

That's all. That field of stillness most people are totally unaware of as a deeper dimension within themselves. Words are limited.

It's within and without. Let's call it within. As a deeper dimension within themselves, unaware of that.

So unaware of space consciousness. And so the liberation is the liberation from the world of form, the world of content. And seeking yourself there somewhere in some content, mental form of me, it's the same.

So just capturing, noticing the moment of stillness that is there. When you first look, it doesn't have to be nature. It could be anything.

Nature has a lot of stillness already in there. Some man-made things have a nervousness built into them. But nevertheless, in the first moment there's always the clear perception.

And when you notice it, it is possible that it may be there for longer, the space. If not, it doesn't matter. Yes, please.

No, no.

[Speaker 2] (7:28:08 - 7:28:35)

The more I try to bring the space into my life, I've noticed that I face a lot of fear. I perceive layers of my personality and I can get a small distance and I get closer and closer and there is this huge fear. And I wish if you could talk about this fear.

I feel that I want something wonderful to happen to me, but for this to happen, I cannot be there.

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (7:28:36 - 7:28:39)

And there is the fear of death or whatever.

[Speaker 1] (7:28:39 - 8:15:05)

Yes, thank you. That's an important point. And you are not the only one who feels that.

And the fear is the fear of the mind-made entity, the self. Because in that, it seems to disappear. And it's, no, it doesn't want to disappear.

And so what do you do with the fear? All you can do is also notice it as a feeling, a movement. Nothing is needed beyond noticing it in the same way that you notice a sense perception and look on it, feel it.

Otherwise, the fear becomes a reaction and you withdraw and run back into identification with thinking, the familiar place. It feels so familiar. So then the fear pushes you.

When you touch the space consciousness, sometimes it happens that fear arises. And then you touch it again. And if you don't know that this is a very natural reaction, then the fear, you identify with the fear.

You become the fearful entity that then withdraws again into the normal state of the. So to notice the fear is there brings about a freedom so that the fear is not totally possessing you. You're not totally identified with the movement of fear.

You can see the fear in your energy field and don't have to do anything. You allow that. And then you can look again at something when the same thing that brought the fear, there is a gentleness.

When you allow the fear, there's a gentleness around it because so you're using the other portal now with the fear, which is allowing it to be. Then the fear itself is turned into a portal. First, it seems to prevent you from getting there.

But if you then apply the portal of allowing it what is to be, it is, then the fear itself becomes a portal again. So first there was the portal of perception, clear perception, which brought about fear or listening to the silence, which brought about fear. Then you notice the fear and allow it.

The allowing is best expressed in the gesture that I would describe as this, where you almost, you hold it in a spaciousness, which is also one could say that gesture and that particular portal very much connected with a female principle of embracing. That's why that's, you see sometimes with Mary statues, the arms like that, but that is the female principle. There's enormous power in that holding, embracing, receptivity, and there's a gentleness there.

So when you allow something, including fear, there is that an inner holding it within this larger spaciousness. And it might even help for a little while to actually hold your arms like that. And then, because you can almost feel the space around it, and then whatever it is that you allow to be, will turn into the portal.

The worst things will turn into a portal, but the worse they get, the deeper the yes would have to be. And the deeper the allowing. And so see how everything that looks like an obstacle in your life, an obstacle to enlightenment, an obstacle to whatever, can easily be turned into an opening, simply through non-resistance.

And then every situation, even if it looks from a conventional mental viewpoint, even if it looks dreadful, very bad indeed, if you allow that which looks dreadful and very bad indeed, the strange thing is that every situation, it's not just on the inner level that the shift happens, that the portal opens. The situation itself is turned from good to bad. It's the transmutation of good to bad.

It's not, there's a famous story. Unfortunately, I don't remember the details of it. There are different versions.

When a poor farmer, a horse comes to him, a wild horse, and all the people in the village come to him and say, aren't you lucky? You're so lucky that this horse, you have a horse now. And the farmer says, well, maybe, maybe so.

And then the next day, the horse, I think, leaves him again, and they all come, oh, you've lost the horse, you're so unlucky. First you had it, just maybe, maybe. And then the horse comes back the next day with five other horses, and they come back and says, maybe.

Then the farmer's son rides on the wild horse, and then he's thrown off and breaks his leg, and the villagers come and say, oh, poor man. You know, he cannot help you with the harvest. And the farmer says, perhaps, maybe.

The next day, the army comes to seek conscripts for the next war, and the son can't go with them, and they all get killed, of course. So the villagers come and say, aren't you lucky? You've kept your son because he has a broken leg.

Okay, every event, he doesn't resist anything, and every seemingly bad event turns into good again. There are quite a few people in this room who have experienced bad events that they would never have chosen if somebody said, do you want this to happen to you? You would just say, no, but it happened.

And at some point, surrender happened, if not complete, substantial surrender happened. And then you see that which you never wanted was actually the best possible thing to happen for you. And it's a strange realization that whatever happens to you, when you align yourself with it, will turn out to be the best possible thing for you.

The universe is not mad. Only you are mad. It's nothing personal.

And of course, your madness is part of the universe too. It's a little game. So to see that whatever happens through the yes, turns around.

It's not only that you become free internally, and a dimension opens up that is beyond the form that this moment takes. Even on the level of form, a shift happens and it turns around. And that's an amazing thing to realize.

The similar story, which I have told a few times, the Zen master who was accused by a 17-year-old girl who was pregnant of being the father in a town in Japan. And the parents came to him and said, she has just told us she's going to have a, she's given birth to this baby and she has just confessed to us that you are the father. When she came to see you nine months ago, it happened.

She had a session with you and you... And all over the town, they gossip started and they all said how dreadful he could have done such a thing. But when they came to him, the parents and told him about it, all he said was, is that so, in Japanese?

I don't know what the Japanese... It may be something like, ah, so, or something like that. So the parents come and say, here, you have, we don't want this baby, it's your baby, you look after it.

First they say, you are the father and he didn't deny it. He said, oh. And then they said, here, you have the baby, you look after it, we don't want it.

Is that so? Ah, so. And then they left and he started looking after the baby, feeding it, buying food.

Nobody came to see him anymore because he had lost his reputation. But because he didn't live through a conceptualized sense of self, all that mattered to him was what this moment required. This moment, there was this baby.

So he was feeding the baby. Without the conceptualized sense of self, the drama was in all the other people. They talked about it for months and months.

The drama was not in him. There was only this moment and he cared for the baby. A year later, the girl confessed that the master wasn't the father, but the boy next door.

So the parents came running to the Zen master and said, she's just told us that you are not the father. And he said, ah, so. And so, we are terribly sorry we made a mistake.

And can we have the baby back now, please? We want the baby now. Is that so?

Okay, here it is. That situation, which is potentially a dreadful thing for the Zen master, it turned into good, only good. The baby was brought up the first year of his or her life by a Zen master.

That's a good start in life. And this is the story symbolizes the state of non, it's an extreme version of non-resistance to what is. It wouldn't have to be literally like that.

You could say, you could have said, no, I'm not the father. But if you believe that I'm the father, what can I do? Could say that also.

This is an extreme form of being aligned totally with now, never resisting. And the good that comes out of a seemingly bad event through alignment, inner alignment with it. So it describes the state of not resisting the isness of now.

Jesus has an even more extreme example. And again, it's a symbol. Turning the other cheek means simply complete non-reaction.

It's not necessarily, you don't have to take it literally. It's inner non-reaction, inner non-reaction. Because usually somebody hitting you on the cheek would immediately produce a strong reaction.

Non-reaction. So he's not giving any prescription for external conduct. It's pointing to an inner state of being aligned.

Non-reaction. So that's, and all evil turns into good through that. The situation turns around.

You have to try it out in your life. But one could say that is only a byproduct of something deeper. The fact that the external situation also turns around is a byproduct of something deeper.

At the deepest level, what matters is the inner, the arising of that depth, that space. That spaciousness within yourself, to know that through non-resistance. And then there's the event, there's, and yet the allowing, the space that comes when you allow.

And so you become free of depending on content of your life. As a byproduct of that, a little irony of the universe, when internally you become free of the content of your life needing to be in one particular way to satisfy you, you become free of that need for your life situation to be in a particular way to satisfy you, which most people have that great need. You become free of that because knowing the depths of space consciousness is the most satisfying of all.

That is the only satisfying state. So then the need for content to be in a particular way isn't there. And the irony of the universe is such that when you don't need for the content of your life to be in a particular way, it turns into, the tendency is for content to turn into good, not without limitations ever, but it becomes harmonious because you're aligned with the totality.

So a harmonious flow comes into your life, which often means it also improves the content as a byproduct, precisely at the point when you don't need it anymore as a desperate inner need. So people have demands, they demand that the world should make them happy. It doesn't.

It's not in the nature of the world to make you happy. You can try for a while. One could say the world is here to make you conscious, not to make you happy.

And then when you're conscious, happiness is there or something deeper than happiness is there, a joy that has a depth to it that is deeper than happiness, happy, unhappy, happy, unhappy, something deeper is there. So not to see the ultimate non-satisfactory nature of content, when you see that, it gets better because you don't need it anymore. So it's strange.

And many people realize in their own lives when they let go of a demand that this or that should be in a particular way or should happen, the moment you completely let go of this inner should, it happens. So only, Jesus said, only be concerned with the kingdom of heaven, which means kingdom of heaven is a strange description he uses to describe the transformed state of consciousness. He has other descriptions for it, the pearl of great price and all kinds of parables pointing to it.

He's talking of only be concerned with finding the essence of who you are, then everything else comes. And he, I believe he said, all the things that you thought you needed will be added unto you because you no longer need them. And of course, those things, they won't stay around forever either, nothing does.

They still have certain limitations, which are the limitations inherent in every form. But it's nice when certain things come for a while. Nice.

And then perhaps goes again, something else comes, forms arise, are born, die. And you are beyond that. So you leave here, change of content, same space, and on the deepest level, it's true to say that you never really go anywhere.

And so phenomenal existence with the world of form, the world of phenomena continues in your life, in the space, the space that you are, different configurations, forms, your life situation, make up your life situation. You may have certain problems in your life, your life situation. The more you access the space of now, the more quickly problematic situations become resolved.

Not by lying awake for hours on end and thinking about them. They don't become resolved. In fact, they don't become resolved through thought.

Thought may be a final form that your realization takes of what the answer is sometimes. But problems do not become resolved through thought. They were actually created by thought in the first place.

So it's only by going beyond thought that the problem suddenly disappears. It may not even become resolved. It disappears from your field of vision.

It may reveal itself to be only a mind form. People carry problems around, many people, that have no existence whatsoever except as a thought form. For example, fear of certain things that may happen to me.

He may leave me, she may leave me. What if this could happen? And this can develop as if it were an actual situation.

And you look more deeply, you see, we pointed at this briefly already. When you look more deeply, you see that the entire existence of the level of human problems are only thought forms. Not reality.

Only a challenge can be there in the reality of now. What are the problems in people's lives? Physical, relationship, financial, finding a life purpose, profession, work problems, and ultimately, all of them, thought forms.

Relationship problem. Let's talk about our relationship problems. Maybe we can work it out.

Yes, up to a limited point, a little bit of talking may be helpful, like pain bodies. But unless presence arises in the relationship, you can't work it out. It's only the arising of space consciousness of presence in the relationship that it can deepen and it can go beyond problems and the need for problems.

And as you know, that begins with listening to your partner when he or she speaks. The art of true listening. Listening in the field of aware presence, open.

Not exclusively focusing on the content when you listen. The words, because then your vision becomes immediately content-based thought. You listen to the words and then your face goes, what do you mean by that?

And immediately the reactive thought forms come up. No, that's completely untrue, I never said that. Why do you always accuse me of that?

Yes, you always do. No, it's not true, I don't always do. There's no listening, there's just true mind forms.

So not exclusively focusing on the form because in true listening, you are there as space. You're not there as form. You can only truly listen if you are there as space, the space in which these words appear and you allow them to appear.

It's again, of course, connected with allowing what is to be completely. So you listen to another person, you are the space in which these words happen. And as you listen, you listen not as a reactive entity, but as receptive space.

And that is the arising of presence, unconditioned consciousness in the relationship. And the words, if words come, are very different. If finally you do say something, those words are very different from words that arise out of the reactivity of the mind.

So to be able to be with each other beyond the movement of thought and not try to solve the so-called problems of the relationship, only on the level of thought. The same applies with not just partner relationships, relationships with children. Space, give the child space.

Be there as space, as spacious presence for the child. But if you're totally identified with a thought form which is father, mother, and you're totally identified with a role which is a thought form, a conditioned thought form, then you interact with a child only through the role of mother or father. And how this role identity thinks a father or mother should behave to be a good father or mother.

And the way they should behave is to tell them what's best for you because I must be, I'm a good father, I'm responsible for you. Do this, don't do that. No, you must do this.

Have you done that? Trying to be good and you get totally identified in the role and then the mother or the father, the father becomes excessively only father. The mother is only mother.

And for the rest of their lives, they can't get out of the role. Then the mother becomes stifling. If you only know yourself as mother without any spaciousness beyond the role, to be a mother without spaciousness is stifling for the child.

It's narrow. When the child is 30 and you are 60, you will still be in the role of mother and you won't even see that the child is an adult and you'll be calling them up and telling them what's best for them because you are trapped in the role and in a thought form, a conditioned thought form. And so, yes, you are also a mother, you are also a father, but that's a tiny aspect.

That's the form aspect. And any role that you totally slip into and identify with, which is a conditioned thought form, limits you and limits other people. So whatever role you play in life, you will have to play some roles.

That's because on the level of form, we have roles. But to be trapped in a role is to be trapped in thought, in a conditioned thought form. And then you yourself are imprisoned and the role will further imprison other people because it will only interact with other people as roles also because if you are trapped in the role of mother, for example, you will push the child into the role of child and keep the child imprisoned in the role of child until they are 50 and you die and you still imprison them in the role of child as you imprison yourself in the role of mother.

Not that you cannot honor the form of being a mother, but all your profession, you can become a... I've seen people at universities so identified with their role of professor after 30 years, they're totally that. And they speak like a book.

And I sometimes, you can only watch and sometimes wonder, is there anything beyond the role left there? There's such identification with roles. And a few people are able to play their role and yet something that is not conditioned remains as the essence of spaciousness.

And then always remains there's a simplicity that remains, there is a gentleness that remains. You play the role, whatever your profession is, whatever your function in society is, you can honor it, but let it be there in the spaciousness of presence. And then you can be with a child, not exclusively as your role, but you can be there in the child's life as spacious presence and the child comes into that space.

And then you don't talk to the child out of that, like a mother talks to a child, a mother who knows better, of course, a child who always doesn't quite know what's best. No, from spacious presence, all is equal. And you actually speak to the child, words that come out of that are words that are being spoken to an equal and you can listen to the child and be amazed how much wisdom can come off the child's mouth if you can only listen.

Wisdom that if you were exclusively identified with the role, you wouldn't even hear because you are convinced that the child doesn't know and you know because it's the role of mother to know. And so all relationships never confuse the role with the depths of who that being is and that depth is unconditioned. So the same in business, in many business interactions, people meet as their function, as their role.

It's a prison and it's liberating and people who are not trapped exclusively in the role tend to be much more successful than people who are totally trapped in their role. Everybody loves them. So little human interactions, going to a restaurant, there is a human being playing the role of waiter or waitress and temporarily while you're sitting there, you are playing the role of customer and people slip into these roles the moment they sit at a restaurant table and the waiter imposes the role on you and you impose the role of waiter on him or her.

It's an absurd limitation of yourself and the other person. So can you be there when the waiter comes or the waitress comes? A moment of spacious presence as the waiter or waitress comes into your field of vision and you look and then you honor the role that you are.

You don't have to behave in a weird way. Then you say, I'd like the soup followed by this and that. And the waiter also, the waiter tends to see you as your function there, as your role and then traps you in that.

If a waiter or waitress can be there for the customer also as spacious presence, that is so liberating. As a by-product of that, they would get three times or four times the tips they would otherwise get. That's a little by-product because it is so liberating to be in the presence of presence, the space.

Anybody who comes to you offering space, oh, people may not know why they feel so good. And so it's, everybody's, it's so important not to get trapped in the thought form of roles. Honor them, but be larger than that so that the little role is there, but the unconditioned is known.

And that is actually what true intelligence operates, not through the little role with the conditioned thinking that goes with that role. So in all human interactions, bringing, you are the bringer of space consciousness. It comes naturally with complete yes to what is this moment.

There is, you go beyond the form of this moment. This is how we started off today, saying, knowing the difference between form and formless, between the form as which you appear here and the formless reality that you are. The difference between the form as which I appear here and the formless reality that I am.

I mentioned yesterday, if I saw myself as a spiritual teacher, would be a delusion. It's a temporary form identity. In other words, not really an identity, but simply a function.

And then I walk out and there's no, what teacher? There's a being walking between the trees. What, there's no teacher left.

Why carry that, I am a spiritual teacher. And then with that would come other illusions. There would come the illusion that people come from different parts of the world to see me.

And that would be the source for ego. It would be ego fuel on the one hand, the self would feel bigger. They have all come to see me.

But on the other hand, there would be hidden fear. I hope I can live up to their expectations of me. I hope, oh my God, all these people have come.

I don't, I'm not ready. I don't know what to say. So you're drawn between feeling bigger and feeling threatened.

And this happens to everybody who is trapped in a form identity. And of course, nobody comes to see me. What for, they come for space, which is themselves.

That's so they come because there happens to be an empty space here. And then they recognize themselves in that. And so the empty space within them, the unconditioned consciousness arises.

That's why they come, not to see a person. So knowing the difference between the form that arises in the now and the depths or the space of now. And in this life, there are the two dimensions.

The dimensions of form, which, in which there seems to be time and the dimension of the formless. And most humans are lost in form in this world. You don't need to learn more about form.

You can, the world is full of learning about form. Universities are full of form knowledge, but essence, the world is hungry to know that which is beyond form, because that's the liberation from being trapped in form, physical forms, but more importantly, trapped in thought forms, conceptualized identities of me, which link into certain physical things, make thought forms out of them. And then you carry that role, that conceptualized identity around with you.

And it's never at ease for long, always incomplete, uneasy, fearful, needing more. I need more followers. I want people to follow me.

Just come and follow me. I need more. Enron Corporation, we need more capital, more money, more.

In an absurd attempt of the ego to complete itself. So this is the madness of the level of form when you only know that. When you know that which is beyond form, the world of form is quite okay.

Okay. Actually, quite nice. Beautiful.

There's a dance that goes on. The dance of form, of phenomenal, which you experience as you walk away from here. This place of now is filled with other forms and the dance continues.

So the essence of our retreat is not something that is now going to recede into the past. The form of this retreat as an experience is about to move into past and become a thought form as all forms do, future, present, and it's gone. The essence doesn't move.

This gathering was not about experiencing certain interesting events on the level of form, even though one or two of you may have done that. The essence of this is to see that which is deeper than content. Sense perception and thought and emotion.

Spaciousness, stillness, aware presence. Thank you for making this retreat possible. There would be no teaching without you.

The ancient saying says, the teacher and the taught together produce the teaching. It's a single process. Ultimately, it comes out of you.

Ultimately, you just recognized what you already knew, of course. Teaching comes out of you. Thank you.

Thank you to Marina for organizing this and Christina and Kim and helpers. Many people have helped to make this happen. Enjoy what comes into the field of now and you are not what happens.

You're the space in which it happens. As long as you know that, there's no problem. There can't be.

Eckhart Tolle Retreat Talk Titled Living Deeper Level of Consciousness

This is called a lecture, but it's not really a lecture. It's more a little bit like a meditation. Let's see if we can be here as completely as possible in this moment to be fully here, to inhabit this moment fully that is not a normal human state.

The normal human state is to be elsewhere with your attention, future, and as you get older and there's little future left, then you tend to live in the past, but always escaping from now. And to be here more fully, actually it helps to be in the body, to inhabit the now. One aspect of fully inhabiting the now is to fully inhabit the body.

And that simply means as you sit here and to have some of your attention in the inner energy field of body, there is a certain aliveness throughout the body. Very subtle at first. Maybe you can only feel it in your hands to start with.

But they're alive and somehow you can feel, sense that they are alive. That seems very insignificant to the thinking mind because the thinking mind has more important problems to think about. Of course, the problems it thinks about are to do with the future and perhaps the past.

So to be in the body seems insignificant to the thinking mind. And it quickly loses interest in being in the body because the thinking mind always says, okay, okay, you've told us to be in the body, now what's the next thing you're going to tell us? Because the tendency for the thinking mind is always to be with the next thing, not this.

It runs away from this to the next. Hence the enormous psychological need within everybody for the next moment. Where is it?

So as you sit here, feel that connectedness so that you're rooted within. Some attention is here throughout the body or if you can only feel one or two parts, that's good enough. Have some attention there and then there's quite enough attention left to listen in a state of alert presence.

So the body is, I sometimes call it a portal into that state of consciousness that we could call presence of the way forward state. One could also say that the body can act as an anchor for staying present. And then it's, you can simply be here with your attention fully in this moment without even the compulsion, which is so normal, to somehow label and interpret this moment.

You can allow this moment to be as it is. It's a very rare state for human beings. To be so at one with this moment, not against it, not reducing it to a means to an end, not resisting it internally or projecting yourself continuously away from it internally.

And so as you sit here, not even looking for the next thing that the speaker is going to say, it can, there's such fullness to being alive if your attention is here fully. There already is a depth and fullness to life that you miss when you continuously live in past and future. So we are here to experience, and many of you already live that way, if only perhaps part of the time, you're present.

We are here to experience what that means to be fully present and look at the implications of living in such a way. The strange thing that you might notice as you connect with the inner body and allow that state of alert presence to arise in which you perceive without the compulsive need to label mentally that which you are perceiving. And yet you know, this is very strange, you know what it is that you are perceiving, but you no longer know it through the old labels of the mind.

So there is a deeper knowing in you, far deeper than the knowing that is associated with mental conditioning, mental labels, mental noise, concepts, words, sounds. So as you connect with the inner body and allow that alert presence to arise, then you notice the incessant mental noise that is so normal slows down, perhaps even comes to a stop. There's a gap in which you are not thinking and you're fully conscious.

And you know that, you know no longer through the conditioned and acquired mental labels, there is a knowing that happens in the stillness. That is an important aspect of that state of being awake. And suddenly there is a depth to whatever you look upon, a depth and aliveness that wasn't there when you immediately, compulsively, automatically and unconsciously labeled everything and the mind immediately commenting on somehow fitting it into something, some categories, some mental judgments.

And so you simply allow this moment to be. And what arises, one could call that the timeless state of consciousness where you are no longer obsessed with past and future, where you have access to an intelligence that is greater than the conditioned intelligence that is thought, thought activity. And it's an amazing thing.

Most humans don't know that yet, that there is vast intelligence beyond thought, that thought is only a tiny manifestation, a tiny aspect of vastness of intelligence that one could almost say fills the entire space of the universe, that the universe is an alive, intelligent organism. And there is one intelligence that manifests itself as millions of life forms. There are many manifestations of that one intelligence, and one of them is the human mind.

Interesting, but only tiny. And humans equate intelligence with the ability to conceptualize, to store up information, to analyze, which means cut it into pieces. This is what they do at universities increasingly these days.

You become specialist, and the more advanced you become, the more little your pieces are that you examine at university because the mind is going into further and further differentiation and cutting up. And if any of you do PhDs or have PhDs or working on PhDs or have abandoned your PhDs as I did, you know how tiny the area is that you would spend three years or whatever it is working on. So intelligence is to, in our civilization, is the ability to cut information into little pieces and examine it, categorize it, compare it to other bits of information.

And yet, if you look at those humans who were creative in whom something new, totally new insights arose or artistic creations or sudden revolutionary scientific insights, they all report that they came from a realm that was not thought. Thought had also something to do with it. It had to give it form.

But the realization, the creative impulse, many people were asked, well, how do you create? Some didn't even know how they created. They couldn't talk about it.

But then it turned out that in all cases, the creative impulse is preceded by the ability to enter the state of alert presence that is stillness in which thought comes to a halt or becomes relatively insignificant. And there is an alertness that suddenly arises. And that is the influx of the unconditioned consciousness.

Enormous intelligence can then operate, move through you. So every artist, before the creative impulse happens, enters that state, whether they know it or not, it just happens. One could say it is almost a state of listening, such alertness as if you were listening, but there's no strain in it, no tension, just relaxed alertness.

And then the insight comes or action might come out of that state of none. And this is always a state of complete alignment with now. The normal human state is out of alignment with now almost all the time.

In other words, the present moment is reduced at best to a means to an end, because I need to get to the next moment, which is a mental protection. So there's always, one could say, almost a reaching out, a strain of needing to get there. So in the meantime, you have reduced the now, which is all there ever is, to a means to an end.

And unconsciously you believe that the future is more important than now, which means you're out of alignment with now. Or in many cases, there's strong inner resistance or denial of now. You don't want this now to be the way it is, a very normal state.

And so that means there's inner denial or resistance. Again, it is a state of not being aligned with now. And that is a very fundamental dysfunction in human consciousness, to be out of alignment with ultimately what that means, you're out of alignment with life.

And that, what is life? The one life that manifests as many billions of life forms, but there is the one unmanifested life. And you're out of alignment with that.

And you walk on this planet where everything else is in alignment. This is a strange thing. If you look at nature and animals, they exist in that state of the oneness with the totality, and they are in the now.

As Jesus pointed out already, 2000 years ago, he said, look at the flowers. How do they live? And how do you live?

And he said, really, look, the difference between the way in which these flowers exist in a state of alignment with now, I'm paraphrasing the New Testament, in alignment with now, and how observe how you live out of alignment and observe how beautiful, harmonious, and peaceful the flower is. And you can watch an animal. Of course, every life form has certain limitations that are according to the form of that.

But compared to many humans, animals exist in a state of great integrity and peace, one with themselves. Not trying to be something or trying to get somewhere. So this to understand that humans have lived in that time-bound state of consciousness ever since recorded history and beyond.

And how did it all start? And why did that happen? And how is it that human consciousness has become so dysfunctional?

And if you look at human history and different centuries, you can see it almost, it looks as if it were becoming, in the 19th century, everybody believed in progress. It's getting better and better all the time, they said. They also believed that science had already almost solved all problems that we could possibly ask.

And then the 20th century came. And then they realized how little they knew. And they realized how dysfunctional the collective human mind is, the destructiveness that was unleashed upon humanity by humans on other humans on a vast scale through the madness of political movements and ideologies and unbelievable suffering caused by humans to other humans.

If you look at that, and if that is not dysfunctional, what is? And it's been, this has been the worst century of all the 20th in terms of suffering and people killed. And this is a very young century we are in now, a very young millennium.

And already, when you watch TV, it's a continuation of the 20th century. And if nothing changes in human consciousness, we'll have another 20th century, except it'll get worse because science and technology continuously increase the effects of human madness, the tools created by, through intelligence. Yes, it requires great intelligence to manufacture these things.

And very often, intelligence in the service of madness. So there is that basic dysfunction in the human mind. And it is so deep, it's becoming so obvious now that very unlikely that human, the planet would even survive another hundred years of this same dysfunction.

How could, it's become so destructive. Why is it, how did it all start? And is there a way beyond that?

I am saying there is a way beyond, a new state of consciousness is already arising, but this must not be made into some new belief. It's seeing that a new state of consciousness is already arising within you, while the old state of consciousness, perhaps or probably also is still operating within you. So the old state of consciousness, to call it, this is the dysfunctional state is continuing.

This is what you hear when you watch the news on television. It reports about human madness. But at the same time, the new is arising.

We can only hope that it is arising in sufficiently large numbers of people and quickly enough before the old consciousness self-destructs. So we need also to look at the essence of the dysfunction because if it is a dysfunction in the human mind, it must operate in each human being and it must, should be possible to locate it in oneself rather than saying the evil is all out there. It's not evil.

It's simply a form of unconsciousness. And what is that unconsciousness? At some point in the evolution of humanity, there was the beginning of thought, an incredible evolutionary leap.

The ability to conceptualize, to think, to formulate mental symbols arose. This is probably what the book of Genesis refers to when it speaks of the first humans who ate of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Well, suddenly the mind was able to differentiate this, this, good, bad.

The knowledge of good and evil, the knowledge of good and bad. A few hundred years ago, Shakespeare wrote in one of his plays, nothing is either good or bad, but thinking makes it so. The arising of thought was an enormous thing.

And we cannot say that it was bad. It happened because it had to happen. Whatever happens has to happen.

There is nothing that happens that is not brought about by the totality everything is a web of interconnectedness. So whatever happens cannot be otherwise. This is what humans, most humans don't know because they are against what happens.

This now, this shouldn't be, but it is. Thought arose and very quickly humans became the dominant species because of the enormous power of thought. And over a long period of time, thought began to operate more and more.

And then gradually, human sense of identity of self, of who I am became bound up with the movement of thought. An image developed in the mind of me. Humans began to have a relationship with themselves.

Nothing on the planet before ever had a relationship with itself, nor to this day. The tree doesn't have a relationship with itself. The cat doesn't have a relationship with itself.

It is itself. And since the cat doesn't have a relationship with itself, its life is, compared to human life, not without challenges, but unproblematic. It doesn't carry the heaviness of a problematic sense of self derived from continuous thought activity.

And so a cat doesn't need therapy because it hasn't split itself into two, me and myself. Because now life is becoming very complex. So humans began to walk around with a self image, a self concept.

It took a long time to develop. Whereas before, life had been so unproblematic and easy. Human life was one of many ways in which the totality expressed itself, as it still does in nature.

And then that was, one could call that the original innocence in humans. The original innocence that is still there in nature. This is why it's so beautiful to go into nature.

It's why it's so beautiful to even watch an animal, even if it kills another animal, it's still innocent. And so humans lost the original innocence that is there when you are yourself. And then a phantom self arose that walked with them wherever they went.

And its main location is in the head, one could say. Me. And so life became increasingly problematic because they lost that rootedness in being that a tree has, a flower has, an animal has.

Without knowing it, it has it. Without knowing it, it knows itself to be one with the one. So it doesn't live in that neurotic state of continuous anxiety and tension.

Just an amazing event on this planet, this arising of self, a mind-made self. And so gradually that sense of being rooted in being, being one with the one life, I don't want to use words like God, they've been misused for too long. Being rooted in being one with that.

And then gradually they lost that. They became disconnected or still were connected but didn't know it anymore. So it's as if they were disconnected from life.

So they became little entities that felt separate from the totality. They had taken themselves out of the web. Then they say me.

They say I. And when they say I, they refer to a conceptualized sense of self in the head. They refer to their name, which is only a thought form.

A thought or a sequence of sounds. John Smith. I.

Who are you? John Smith. That sounds convincing.

But is nothing means completely meaningless. It means nothing. So you have the illusion that already you know who you are.

So and then John Smith is going to tell you if you ask further, well, who are you? Beyond that, he says, well, I am a father of two and an accountant and a graduate of that university. And he may have some longer story to tell.

Divorced twice and this. And so he will give you a little story, which is the story of the self. And there are other aspects to that self which are not always on the surface.

They are certain reactive patterns in the self. There are ways in which that self interprets the universe because it's been conditioned by its culture and its environment in certain ways. It is the content of the mind.

It is the emotions that accompany those mind movements. So two together, the content, the conditioned content of the mind, because everybody gets conditioned by their surrounding culture, the world, personal level, collective world, the country you live in, the culture you're living, the time you live in. The language is itself a strong form of conditioning, your first language, the way it is spoken, what it contains.

It's already a world view. One could say it's already embodied in the language. So at an early age, all that happens.

And gradually as the child, the first, after the child utters his or her name, when she is asked, what is your name? John Smith. Then that is the easily, now other things will cling to that first concept of self, in memories, experiences, knowledge, things that the sense of self gathers around itself to make itself more complete.

And for the rest of his life, John Smith is going to look for things to absorb into his sense of self, to add to his sense of self because his sense of self is not sufficient yet, has not completed itself yet. He doesn't feel that he's really fully himself yet. There is a sense, an underlying sense of lack, of not enough, of insufficiency, of I need some more, something more.

This isn't it. And this is built into the restructure of this mind-made sense of self. It's discontent, lack, fear.

It's always there somewhere. Because ultimately, it is only a mental formation, a conceptualized me in the head. And as such, it can never feel complete.

So it's condemned to seeking to add more to me in whatever form. Hence, the need, the enormous psychological need for future because it's through future that I can find the more that will complete me, that will make myself complete. And that's a deep-seated collective mind pattern associated with the self, the sense of self that is conceptualized.

Of course, the moment you live in and through a conceptualized sense of self, this is the fate of all humans. They have to go through that. The moment that arises, your entire reality, the world with which you interact becomes a conceptualized reality.

In other words, you see it through the filter of the conditioning of the conceptualized me, the sense of self. So whatever you look upon, interact with, is immediately, according to its conditioning, the conditioned self, interpreted, judged, labeled, according to the conditioning. So that is what humans have in common.

No matter what nation, what culture they belong to, although in the more advanced countries, the dysfunction is also more advanced, that's all. But they all have the same dysfunction. The way in which things are being labeled varies enormously.

If you were from a different culture, Arabic culture, and you walked around Stockholm, you would label things in a different way. The things that you call good and bad would be different. And when you go there, what you call good and bad there would be different from what the locals call good and bad.

Very different. But of course, each person is so identified with the mind-made self and its mental positions and labels, it's almost impossible to step out of identification. Identification means deriving your sense of self from the mental positions, and see that other mental positions are just different mental positions.

To see that one's own conditioning and mental position is no more than that, and does not contain the truth, it is an aspect, at best, an aspect of the truth, an aspect of the totality. In other words, all thought, all mental positions are fragments, fragmentary, relatively true, perhaps. They cannot contain the totality.

So humans don't know this. There's total identification with mind movement, with a mind-created self. And so, then there are the others, which have their form of conditioning are totally identified with that.

And they need each other to enhance their always insufficient sense of self. So this is why humans love to have enemies and make enemies, especially groups, but even individuals do it, unconsciously, of course. The groups that have their group identity, which is a conceptualized story which they're telling themselves, including patterns of reaction and behavior and thinking, these groups have a strong need to have other groups that are their enemies, because through fighting and being in opposition to others, they strengthen their illusory sense of self.

So the boundary around me, the more enemies I have, the stronger this boundary, which is mind-created around me, becomes. And the stronger the sense of separateness, which is the boundary, the stronger the illusion of self, of me, whether that self is a predominantly personal sense of self, or whether that self is a predominantly collective sense of self, which is our tribe, our religion, our nation, our group, doesn't matter. It's the same principle as at work.

It is a conceptualized identity. And the conceptualized identity is looking, is looking for problems and conflict, because it needs that to, so that this mental structure can define itself. Me, not me.

Me ends here, and there's the rest of the world. And some of the rest of the world I can actually use to make me a little bit bigger, so I'm reaching out to looking for things, new things to add to the content of my mind, to identify with, to make the self more complete. So everybody's looking out for self-completion to add more to me, because I end here.

And then other things in the world, the not-me world, are threatening, because there are many things out in this world that might take away things from me. So I'm, the world is also a dangerous place and a promising place at the same time. I fear the world, and I desire, I want amazing state of consciousness.

So whether on a collective or the personal, there's this great need to complete me through adding more content, mental, because even if you want to acquire more possessions in order to feel a little bit more secure in who you are, in order to feel a little bit bigger, because now you have a big car and a big house, and so your sense of self can expand into the car. The car, not really the car, but the thought form of car. The car itself is quite meaningless, because it's metal, and in a few years it'll be reduced to rust.

So it's not the car, but it is the thought form of car, if it's a big one, the thought form of car that the self, you identify with the thought form. So that is then added to the collection of thought forms that is me, and for a little while, the me feels just grown. I'm getting somewhere, because I've added that to me.

And then it won't be long before the thought form no longer really fulfills its purpose of completing me, and again, it's not quite enough, this car. And then comes maybe the house, and again, for a while it feels, the house, it's not the house, it's not the fact that you own the house. The whole idea of ownership is a fiction.

It's to do with a fictitious sense of self. What does it mean, I own this? You're telling yourself a story in your head about this house, and that story says, it is me.

I own this house, it is mine. It means nothing. If you were insane, and you said, I own half the city of Stockholm, and if you were insane, you could go around to the city telling this to people, and say, okay, you better go for treatment.

You're insane because nobody agrees with you. If you say, I own this huge building, and nobody agrees with you, then you're insane. If you say, I own this building, and everybody else agrees with you, and they sign a paper to confirm that they agree with you, then you own it.

In either case, it's a story. The only difference is, it's a story that nobody agrees with, in which case you're insane, or it's a story with which everybody agrees, then you're wealthy. But it's a story.

It's part of this, so ownership is part of the story of me. And of course, it loves that, it loves to own, and then, that's, of course, you can, no matter how much you add on that level of thought forms, the thought form of ownership, it's not ever really be enough. So then you have to go on to other things, to add more, to complete me, other people's opinion of me.

This is a little bit less tangible than heavy material things. So that becomes an important thought form if other people think that you are great, you are very important, and then the conceptualized self is always looking out for, to get that recognition. Please, thank you.

You are so great, ah, thank you. Or it might say, oh no, I'm not really great, but it thinks, oh, it feels so good. And then perhaps the entire, you might even, some people amass great wealth on that level, the wealth of thought forms that you are very important, you might become important in the eyes of the world.

And so, then the self certainly feels expanded. They might even build, they don't do that so much anymore these days, a big monument of me before you die. And then that thought forms, surely I must have made it now.

But no, you wake up in the middle of the night with a state of fear. It's not it, and you might even at that point look through the delusion and see what the world has built up around you is a fiction. What the newspapers are saying about you and the glossy pictures about you in case you are, let's say, a famous actor or actress.

And then you suddenly see, this is just a big, all this like a, there's nothing real here. They're talking about some illusory entity. They've created this illusory entity which has nothing to do with me.

And so at that point, perhaps you step beyond when so much has been added to you and you haven't arrived at that sense of having made it. And then at that point, you might begin to go beyond that. And this is usually the point where the spiritual life begins for people.

It's the realization that I cannot complete me on that level. I've tried. And okay, so everybody in a way has tried and failed on that level before the spiritual dimension opens up or before the spiritual search begins.

You must have failed somehow. Of course, everybody fails, except they delude themselves that it can still work out. But on the level of story, on the level of the conceptualized self, it cannot work out because it is in the very structure of that mind-made sense of self that it lives predominantly in a state of discontent and not enough and conflict and problems.

It is part of the structure, not the content. The form that this takes, discontent, not enough, problems, conflict, varies from person to person, from culture to culture. So that's the content.

But it is not the causal factor. It's the structure of a mind-made self which is condemned to continuous, to not making it. And only in movies do they make it.

In novels, but even novels, only in the bad ones, the bad ones have a happy ending and they lived happily ever after. That doesn't happen because the stories after the wedding continues. After the honeymoon, it goes on.

And then the person who was meant to complete you, make you happy, fulfill me, complete me for the rest of my life, fails to live up to that expectation. He or she isn't doing it. You're supposed to completely make me complete, happy.

Fulfill. In many ads you read, looking for man or woman to make me happy. Who could live up to that?

So really, you're looking to the world to complete you which is really the world then becomes translated into thought forms. But it cannot do that. So that's an amazing realization.

The moment you realize that, the spiritual life opens up, but what then happens, you walk into the spiritual, the world of spirituality and not knowing that you're still carrying the same mind structures into your spiritual seeking. At first it looks great. There's some wonderful, new, interesting ideas and you change your view of things.

In some cases, you suddenly believe in God. But not for everybody these days is spiritually equated with belief in God. Of course, spiritual is much vaster.

Or you might believe in certain new things, reincarnation. You suddenly find out about your past lives. And those things are usually called beginning your spiritual life.

And in a way it is. But what happens most of the time is that deeply conditioned mind structure of a self that is needing to complete itself, that goes then into, moves into spiritual seeking. And if you look, very often you find that deep down, I am still looking for that which completes me.

And I'm still looking to the future because it's not here now. So I'm looking to the future for that which will complete me. In other words, I'm looking for myself in the future.

Again, which is the essence of the mind-made self, which always is looking for an improved, bigger, greater version of itself in the future. So you might look for enlightenment. And to add that, surely then this is, then I will complete myself.

Of course, it's true. There is a, the purpose of your life would complete itself if that transformation of consciousness that is sometimes called awakening or enlightenment happens in you, yes. But you're looking for that as a future attainment.

And so the conceptualized me is still seeking an improved version of itself. So this is a collective conditioning that may still operate in the spiritual seeker. And it's good to see that because inevitably, after some time of seeking, for the ultimate, frustration sets in.

So many workshops. So many books, retreats, and meditation techniques. Why is it that I still haven't arrived?

And the self-talk then continues. Shouldn't I be now have arrived? Maybe that whole thing is a complete illusion.

What then? And some people then arrive at that. They, after 20 years, say, oh, this is all nonsense.

I've tried it all, and I can, let me tell you, it doesn't work. Just go back to your normal life and watch TV, drink beer. I'm not saying it, they would say that to you.

So you get disillusionment with some, and some continue to look, and some find something, maybe an experience, but an experience comes and goes, and then you remember this great experience you had. I want that back. I had it once.

And then you can base the rest, an identity around that, of somebody who had this great experience once. You can tell others about it. And after a while of being, after a while, you get entrenched in that image of somebody who had a great experience.

You don't want any other experience because that sense of self can become so entrenched. You don't know it. That's what you now want.

You don't want to go beyond because it feels you're so identified with it. You're so identified with that thought form. It has a momentum to it.

And so you get stuck in that. You might write a book about it. So that's a strange thing that the spiritual seeker, when you become a spiritual seeker, you do not immediately become free of the conditioning of your mind.

And it continues to operate. And so this, we need to see and recognize, oh yeah, because ultimately it means that there's a belief, the unconscious or conscious belief that through future, you will find yourself. Which is true on the level of everyday existence that through future, you can attain things on the level of your personal everyday existence where you, through future, you can save enough money to buy a house.

Through future, you can learn to become good at playing this instrument. Through future, you can acquire new knowledge, learn a language, become a physicist, get a degree at university. For all these things, future, of course, is needed.

But this is not what we are talking about. This is using future. We needed future to meet here because it was prearranged.

We said at a certain date, at a certain time, we are going to meet here. We need future. So you can add things to yourself on the level of doing, on the level of acquiring knowledge through future.

And that in itself is not, never a problem. You do it or you don't do it, or you add things to yourself and then you lose them again. You become the greatest mathematician or physicist after years of study, which is fine.

If your sense, if it's not a story in the head, if your sense of self isn't in it, it is simply a very enjoyable activity. If your sense, if the activities in the service of self, of seeking an enhanced version of self, then it becomes heavy. It becomes problematic.

It becomes conflict-ridden. So we're, nothing wrong with learning new things, even making money, but looking for yourself through that doesn't seem to work. So looking to the future for myself, even the spiritual seeker does that.

A greater me. The story finally reaches its climax and its happy ending. So there is a projection of a future state to be achieved, which is a mind form, me, the one who is enlightened.

And the same operates. How do we get out of, if that is an illusion, and if you cannot find yourself there, where are you? Who are you?

How do you step out of that illusion? You have to step out of time because all the thought forms, the conceptualized sense of self operates through past and future. The past gives you your identity, your insufficient identity, your insufficient sense of self, sometimes great sense of self.

If something has just been added, then it looks, I've made it, and then again becomes insufficient. So the past gives you your insufficient sense of self. The future promises completion of the insufficient sense of self.

The future promises you yourself. What is continuously missed when you live in and through a conceptualized sense of self is now because the conceptualized sense of self can't do much with now. It's not interested in now.

It's only interested in past, which gives it its identity, and it's interested in future, which is going to complete it. In the meantime, the now is regarded, more often than not, most of the time, as an obstacle to my self-completion. Isn't that amazing?

The now, the only thing there ever is, the only place where life ever can be, is regarded as an obstacle to finding myself, ultimately. This is why I need to make the now into a means to an end. I'm just trying to get, don't, I'm trying to get there.

There was a man practicing Buddhist metta meditation. I love this house. Love spreads out to the entire universe.

I love this person. I love this body. I love this house.

I love this city. I love this country. And the little, his little daughter comes in and opens the door and he shouts, oh, for God's sake, can't you leave me?

Can't you leave me alone? Can't you see I'm doing my metta meditation? He's trying to get somewhere.

He's trying to become a good meditator. He's trying to become a totally loving being. This is serious business.

So the amazing thing then, in that humans have made, the delusion, the dysfunction is to believe that now is an obstacle to finding myself. Of course, yes, it does appear to be quite often because the now seems to limit you quite often. What happens in this field of now very often is some kind of limitation.

Here I am sitting on this bus, but I'm meant, my destiny must be much greater than sitting on this bus. And I'm still sitting on this bus, and I know I'm meant for much greater things. Or in this little room, or wherever you are.

Here I am in this job. This can't be it. This is all wrong.

It doesn't fit into the story of, the now seems to conflict with the story of me, the way it should unfold. There's something wrong here. I need to get away from this now as quickly as possible.

Okay. And there comes the future, the projection of future, and a conceptualized self in the future. And so you leave the now, and you can see when people leave the now, they lose a liveness, a veil descends, and they're gone.

And most people on our planet are gone a lot of the time because they don't even see you. They see their thoughts. At best, they see you through their thoughts.

And you know that their thoughts are labeling you, and they're labeling you according to their conditioning. And they're trying to find out if you can complete, make them feel bigger, complete their sense of self, or whether you are a threat to their sense of self. They have to work this out quickly.

Every time you meet somebody, you have to figure out, can I use him or her to add to me, or is he or she threatening me? Of course, when you look at it, you can see it. It is a form of, yes, madness, but it's normal.

So normal these days equates with mad. That's how it is. That's how the mind operates.

So the amazing thing is to see, on the one hand, time seems to be such a strange thing and seems to be all pervasive and everywhere. Time, you can't get out of it. It's like sitting on an express train, and it pulls you along.

You can't get out of time. It never stops. Whatever any experience is fleeting, it comes, and it's gone.

Even us sitting here, very soon, it'll be past. Before you came here, it was future. This is very strange.

Before you came here, this gathering was in the future. Perhaps you thought about it. It had no reality except as a thought form.

Then it actually, here it is, the immediacy of it. And then, before you know it, it's gone because the express train never stops, and it's past, you remember it. But the memory, again, is only a thought form, and the only place where you can remember the past is now.

And the only place where you can project the future before you came here, that was now, because nothing can happen or be that is not now. So we have the strange paradox that, on the one hand, time seems to govern everything. Very strange thing, time.

I visited some people at Christmas that I hadn't seen in many, many years, and when I first saw them, for a second or two, it looked as if they had some dreadful illness. But then I realized, my God, time that did that to you. A shock, because all I could remember of these people was the photos taken 25 years ago.

Very cruel, time must be. So I don't know who, there was a poet, I believe, who compared time to a fire that consumes us all, and we are in the middle of it. Not a bad analogy, because what fire leaves behind is ashes, and of course, very soon, all of us will be that.

The physical forms will have been consumed by time. Another analogy has been given of time devours you. So it's, on the one hand, you have this paradox, it seems so real, and it does that.

It seems to do that to you, but on the other hand, past, because time means past and future, it means that movement from, on the other hand, it doesn't really exist. Where is it? It's always, life is always now.

It's always now, never not now. So where is time? It seems so real.

Of course, it's in the human mind, as the memory of past, the projection of future, and then, how can it do this to our bodies? If time is not ultimately real, then maybe the body isn't ultimately real. And I will leave it at that, because this is not philosophy.

Let's put this aside. Simply to see that how vital now is, and if now, if you regard it as an obstacle to where you want to get with your conceptualized sense of self, you miss the most vital, the only real thing there is, which is now. So many people have the feeling that one day soon, their life is going to start, not quite started yet.

Stepping out of the conceptualized sense of self, which depends for its survival on past and future, on continuously dwelling in past and future mentally, that keeps the mind-made self going. The self that the Buddha perhaps was the first, I don't know who recognized 2,600 years ago, the central recognition, realization of the Buddha was that the self is an illusion. That was the central core of the teaching.

Wow, and that was, that long ago, he recognized that when human madness wasn't even quite as mad yet as it is now, it was already mad, but not yet not this mad. And he saw it then. And he saw that as long as you're trapped in that illusion, you're going to suffer.

The illusion and the suffering go together. So not knowing who you are beyond the mind-made sense of self is very frustrating. You never may quite make it.

And even the spiritual seeker is seeking through future. If a spiritual seeker could stop being a seeker and simply acknowledge, honor, and say yes to now as the primordial spiritual practice, one must align oneself internally with the isness, the suchness of this moment. The only place where life ever unfolds is in the space of now.

So the simple bringing a yes to what is internally instead of no. No matter what form this moment takes because that changes continuously. Now you're here, very soon you'll be elsewhere.

So the form of now shifts again. But the strange thing is wherever you go, it's now. Any time you look at your watch, you may say it's such and such a time, but it's even more true that it's now.

Whenever you look at your watch, it must be now. This is even more true than whatever time it is or date it is. So a strange thing happens when you cooperate with the isness of now internally, welcome it, no matter what form it takes.

The form that the now takes creates the delusion that there are many different moments in your life in every day, in every hour, because the form changes so quickly, so often. But it's not true that there are many different moments. There's always this one now moment.

The form changes. The space of now remains now. Here we come to the essence.

I said the space of now, when your attention moves into now, there's the form it takes. Here it's this room, the voice, the lights, space. Your attention, you acknowledge this.

And suddenly you become aware of, words can only point to this. I could say you become aware of the now directly as a field that underlies whatever happens or a space that is always around whatever happens, a vast space that is the space of now. In it, things come and go.

So you can actually sense the underlying field in which everything happens. That means you've become still but alert. Because you cannot sense that unless you are still and alert.

And then you can suddenly know the now beyond that which is happening in it, which may be good or bad, changes. That is the depth. And now you are aligning yourself with the power that lies hidden in the now.

Which is one with the one power there is. And really it means you're aligning yourself with yourself. There's a depth that arises through the simple act of allowing this now to be.

Through that simple act, you go beyond the form that this now takes, which may look as if it limited you. And suddenly there's a depth within yourself. Before there was only a reactive little me.

Yeah, I don't like this, I want to get away from this now. And suddenly, through the yes to what is, there is this deep space which is so much deeper than anything that is happening in it. This is only a little pointer.

So you're becoming aware of the space of now through allowing the form of now. If you only react to the form of now, you remain trapped in a form identity which is the thought form of me, which is reactive. It strengthens itself through reactivity.

So as you continue to react to the form of now, you strengthen the self. If you allow the form that this now takes, then who you are beyond the self, the conditioned, arises as a deep stillness, aliveness, intelligence beyond noise, silent intelligence. So this cannot, who you are beyond form, obviously you cannot encapsulate that in a concept.

You are then, in Buddhist terminology, free of self, the illusion of self. Or you can use other terminology, Indian teachings. You have found the self as yourself, not the little mind made self, the one self, the essence of your being.

The Buddhist teaching is less likely to become a concept because it denies what you are not. And what or who you are emerges by itself. So there's, and that arises through the allowing.

And another, what goes with that realization is the mind is not very important in this. Thought doesn't get you there. The realization comes when thought makes room for presence.

And people ask, well, I can't, how do I stop my mind? It won't stop. A very quick way is simply to become friends with now.

Because a lot of that compulsive mind activity, most of it is to do with how you try to figure out how you can get away from now and create something better. Not that you cannot create anything better externally, but not through self, not as to find yourself. Playing with the phenomenal world is fine.

Self-seeking in that is frustrating. So the simple, for the spiritual seeker, the practice is simply not to seek in the future anymore. Bring the seeking into now.

And you might ask, how can I seek in the now? Doesn't seeking imply future? Where is it, where, where am I?

Seeking, doesn't it mean you're looking somewhere else? Well, there's an intensity to seeking. And that intensity can move into now.

You bring that intensity so it's not seeking for something, but bring that intensity that is behind the seeking into now, which is the, face the now with that intensity, that alertness. And whatever appears in it, you meet the now, so to speak. Ultimately, this is all language, it's never quite right.

But ultimately, you are the now, but don't tell anybody. You face the now fully, completely. What happens?

Now, more often than, a challenge comes into the space of now, as a difficult person or difficult situation, there it is, a turbulent moment of a person with a pain body attack coming at you, saying, you did that, or why don't you, you should have. And usually, you would go into the self would play out its conditioning, and it would react in the normal, predictable, old way of defense mechanisms come up, you shout back, or you hit him, if you're very unconscious. The normal, the thing that you can observe in people's lives, in personal interactions, after you know a person for a while, you can predict how they're going to react.

In relationships, that is being played out in most relationships, almost word by word, once a week, once every two weeks, action, reaction, pressing a button, defense mechanism, shouting, blaming, justifying, you, no, not you, me, you, you did that, and so on. It's all easily predicted, once you know a person, you can say anything, and you know how they're going to react. And so, because every reaction implies they are fighting this moment, they are fighting the form that this moment takes.

And if you happen to be in the space of this moment, they are fighting you. If it's a traffic light, they are fighting that moment, the situation, it shouldn't be happening. And there's a dialogue that goes with it in the head.

And so you realize the fundamental fact that whatever happens cannot be otherwise, because it's one with the totality, everything is totally connected. If it happens, it not only cannot, it cannot be otherwise, it is the right thing for this moment. So you get, you're taking responsibility for your life.

People think it's about getting the right pension plan and life insurance and save enough money and do everything. That's all peripheral, you can do or not do that. But the true meaning of taking responsibility for your life is to take responsibility for the one place where life is, which is now.

Not a conceptualized version of my life, which is a story. That's secondary, what you do or don't do there. You won't do the right thing anyway for the story.

But if you're now taking responsibility for life is then taking responsibility for this moment. What does that mean? One could say new age teachings may tell you this is happening because you manifested it.

There's some truth in that. I'm not saying that it's too extreme. Some people in this room might disagree with it.

I avoid saying things that anybody can disagree with. So I'm not telling you that you manifested it or that it has some truth in it. But to simply see that the inevitability of is, it already is.

This moment is as it is already. And it is one with the totality. And the little me says, this isn't what I wanted.

And it even gets angry if a new age teacher tells you you manifested it. He says, I resent that statement. How dare you say that?

I know very well that I didn't manifest this dreadful situation. So, no, you may be right. But the fact remains, this moment is as it is.

Is it possible to argue with that? No, it is as it is. To recognize is and align yourself with what is.

Yes. Say yes to this. And you'll be amazed if you meet what is in that state of yes, you meet it, whatever form this moment takes, the isness of this moment, you'll meet it in, there's a field of intelligence, of a current of aware presence with which you meet this situation and now.

All that is necessary is to give full attention to the challenge of this moment. It's so, very often it is challenging. That's what life is all about.

The world isn't here to make you happy, but to make you conscious. So you meet the challenge of now with a yes and then there's a flow of aware presence with which you look at this challenge, this moment, this situation. And in that, the conditioned mind is not operating because there is awareness there, aware presence.

Not the old thought forms are not operating. The old thought forms need to deny what is, need to try and get away from it. And the intelligence of the old thought forms is very limited.

It's no intelligence at all really, or very limited intelligence. So an enormous intelligence comes into play when you meet the now. The portal is open, you're not resisting it.

And through the non-resistance, this, what one could say, a current of awareness, which is intelligence itself, meets the form of now. And then if action is possible or necessary, action happens. If action is unnecessary or impossible, no action happens.

There's simply, the complete acceptance remains, no action is possible at this moment, that's it. You might be in prison. You tried cutting through the bars, it didn't work.

You tried other ways of breaking out, it didn't work. So you say, okay, at this moment, no action seems possible. And there you sit on a chair or on the floor, walls, ceiling, floor, stomach not full, body feeling cold.

This moment is as it is. And suddenly, a peace arises. And the mind cannot understand it.

Why can't I be peaceful in this dreadful place? But it's, where does it come from? It comes from because you aligned yourself with now, completely.

And then, if action is possible, it will arise. Perhaps suddenly somebody opens the door, and you're able to run out, unlikely, but possible. Or they let you free.

I received, sometimes I receive letters from prison, people who enter that they say, my life has changed totally, but I'm still in the same place. And I'm teaching others, they write, there are little groups in prison of people who are entering that state of presence, and they're using their situation as a teacher. The now, this is because the now teaches you to enter the surrendered state of consciousness, which is a state of alignment.

And one person wrote to me two years ago from prison, and said, I have to do another nine years here, and it's fine. And two years later, he was out. He wasn't even up for parole for another five years.

I don't know how it happened. The strange thing is, when you meet the now, in a state of alignment, which is the surrendered state of consciousness, intelligence comes into operation that is far greater than what you could plan through the conscious mind. Sometimes it comes as spontaneous action through you, and people have found it occasionally, accidentally, in very dangerous situations.

It sometimes happens that the conditioned mind makes room for a greater intelligence and suddenly takes over, and you do just the one right thing, and you didn't know how you did it, and there was no decision-making involved. It just happened. And then the old mind comes back, and then the reporters come and say, how could you have done such a wonderful thing?

You're a hero. And they say, I don't know. It just happened.

I did it. Don't know how or why. And so an intelligence comes into play because you are aligned with the totality that can also act upon that situation externally.

Suddenly, something comes in to resolve that situation. And so this comes in the form of coincidences, synchronistic events. The more you're aligned with now, the more you will find in your life happening coincidences, synchronistic events that suddenly come in, and you didn't know, wow, this is incredible.

How could this have? I didn't do it. It just happened.

And at other times, it may come through you as a realization which becomes a thought. This is where thought can be very helpful. When you are aligned with the greater intelligence, then thought can sometimes come in and give form to a realization.

Oh, and then suddenly you speak it. You say it. Or it may come as spontaneous action with no thought.

This is the simple way of everything. After that shift has happened of aligning yourself with now, you are being lived, not... And that is the, you no longer feel that I have to make a living and somehow get my life right.

All you need to get right and take responsibility for is this moment. So how do you, let's recapitulate. How do you take responsibility for this moment?

You take responsibility for this moment by getting it right. How do you get it right? What does that mean?

By recognizing the rightness of it already. You recognize it is already right, even if the mind says this is dreadful and there are many situations that you may go into in this world that the mind would call dreadful. And yet what you cannot argue with is that this is as it is.

So people have this realization in the seemingly most unacceptable situation where you would say, how can you expect this person to practice what you are saying in that situation? That situation is totally unacceptable and people have done it whose body could no longer function, couldn't move any limbs anymore. They entered that state and it happened.

People in prison camps have reported, some of them entered that state of complete alignment and the shift happened, enormous peace. And in many cases, the seemingly dreadful situations, a healing factor or a redemptive factor comes in, particularly in situations that the mind would have judged as dreadful or totally unacceptable. Of those situations, there may be many in this world because this world is a manifestation of the human mind, the world that we have created.

So it's not surprising that when you move about this world, you encounter many dreadful situations because the human mind is very dysfunctional, of course. So the healing and redemptive factor comes in through recognizing nevertheless that this moment cannot be otherwise because it already is. And that becomes the basis for change.

And instead of the little me fighting and saying, I'm going to show the world that I can do, show God I can do a much better job than he can, he should have resigned long ago. Or you project some image that this authority figure has failed completely. God, how can God allow this if he, all concepts, just this.

So that is the primordial practice. That's also the end of being a spiritual seeker. Oh, what a pity.

You could have a nice romantic image in your head about the spiritual seeker who hasn't quite arrived yet, but one day will arrive. Or the miserable seeker who's desperately seeking and very unhappy. All kinds of stories you can tell yourself in your head about me, my life, my...

So it's the shift of attention from being in thought to being in now. That is the awakening. The awakening is the awakening out of identification with thought, with mind forms, with a stream of mental noise.

You awaken out of that into presence, into now. So it's like it's the awakening from a dream. Very much, this is why for a long time in spiritual teachings, Eastern and also Western, the term awakening is used because it's very much like waking up out of a dream.

And even Jesus used many parables that are to do with staying awake, awake, wakeful, the state of wakefulness. The strange thing is that Jesus' teachings exist, we only really have it in fragments. There are fragments of a very deep teaching, greatly misunderstood, but it has great depth if you see it.

Now, if humanity were not ready for this shift in consciousness, these words would be meaningless to say you can, accept this moment as if you had chosen it. Remember, I'm not saying you chose it, but you can accept it as if you had chosen it because you recognize the inevitability of is. That must be sanity.

And so, many humans are now ready for this shift. And this gathering is part of that transformation. It's not so much that the transformation is going to happen on the planet, all I know that it is happening here and now.

It looks like a person speaking and some people listening on the surface level, but there's a greater depth to it. It is a collective event. This event, this is part of the transformation of human consciousness.

And it's much more significant than it looks on the surface, because on the surface, only a few people in a room listening to a speaker. Probably won't be on Swedish news tonight, not yet. So if you were not ready, it would all be meaningless.

I would be talking to an empty room and saying, surrender to this moment, become aligned with now, and there's nobody there. That would mean humans are not ready yet. They can't hear it.

If you can hear it, it means you're ready, because some people ask me, well, isn't it only after you've become liberated, then you can accept the now? So they say, aren't you telling us something that only after liberation we can practice? It's a good point.

But the truth is that you are already in the middle of the liberation. That's why you can hear it. This is, and even if you cannot yet dwell in that state continuously, it is emerging through this form.

How else could you have sat here for so long without running out of the room or falling asleep? So that's the good news, with all the bad news that we hear when we listen to the media. And there's no need even for you to believe in anything, that it's happening, it's living it.

And even if you live it five minutes a day, five minutes of alignment with now. Wow. That's more than some humans do in a lifetime.

So let's honor this beautiful, deep, good now. It always is good deep down. Surface, good, bad, good, bad.

Deep down, there is an inherent goodness to now. So there's no need to believe in that. You can easily see, find that for yourself.

Thank you. As you know, this gathering is part of the transformation of consciousness that is happening. The essence of that transformation, one could put it this way, is that thinking becomes secondary in your life.

It is no longer running your life, dominating your life. You are no longer run by thought. For a long time, thinking has been primary.

So we are here not to add to thought, but to enter that realm that is beyond thought and to dwell in that dimension that is free of thought. And from there, be able to use thought. Unproblematically, and even in a very powerful way, because thought has certain power.

But before you can have full access to that power, almost paradoxically, one could say, you need to have gone beyond thought. So we are here to allow that dimension in yourself in which you are fully conscious and yet no conceptualization, mental labeling is taking place. That is the essence of being fully awake.

We are allowing that to arise here in during these three hours, strange, three hours time, to enter that state of consciousness that ultimately is beyond time because thought is bound up with time. All time is in the mind. Thought and time go together.

There's nothing wrong with it. In this dimension here, you need that. But not getting lost in it, finding that deeper dimension in yourself.

And the strange thing is, there isn't all that much that you need to understand about that state that is free of thought because needing to understand more about that state is thought attempting to grasp that which by its very essence is beyond thought. And so thought might say, I don't quite fully understand yet what you mean by free of thought. Can you define a little bit further?

Now, the essence of our being together here one could say is, although I want to avoid two esoteric sounding words, it is a kind of, with reservations, I use that word, it is a kind of transmission of a state of consciousness, not coming from a person because that state of consciousness is beyond person and all personal selfhood is thought-based. So that state transmits itself only, of course, if there is a readiness. Otherwise, it would not reach you.

The veil of thought would be too dense and the transmission of that state that is free of thought would not reach that dimension in yourself that is also free of thought because of the density or one could say the noise of the veil of thinking. And then you would sit here and think he isn't really saying very much. It's not enough.

To fill me, to add more to me. So to be attentive to the transmission and it doesn't go one way, something in you responds to presence because that is the presence in you. Presence is the word I sometimes use to describe the state of consciousness that is free of thought.

And that comes forward here. So what that simply means in simple terms, what is all that is needed here for you is to not believe that the essence of this intensive is in the words. One could say the essence of this intensive is in the space in between the words.

One could even say the essence of this intensive is in the stillness that arises here in this room and within yourself. Stillness being one way of one perspective on that state is, yes, it is a state of stillness. Cessation of mental noise.

That is the awakened state. That is where the conditioned does not operate. It is the arising of the unconditioned.

There is something else in you that does not want to be here. There's a momentum to the conditioned self and to thought itself that feels uncomfortable with this because it is threatening the primacy, the dominance of thought. And that may rise up as a wave in yourself of thinking that takes you away from here completely.

It can also rise up as a restlessness. And when that happens, all that's needed is to be aware of that. Don't expect anything.

Don't expect the state that is free of thought to be there as your predominant state. It's arising and it tends to arise briefly then become obscured again by thought. Then it arises again.

Obscured again. So it's a shifting back and forth for quite a while. But as this happens, already a change is taking place in what one could call the way in which thought operates in you.

One could say your relationship with thought is changing already because even as thought arises, you can recognize thought as thought and not totally believe in every thought that arises. Totally be identified with the perspective that is implied in a thought. Every thought is some kind of judgment, some kind of labeling.

It implies a perspective. No thought contains all perspectives and it's conditioned. So you're no longer totally in the stream of thinking, but you can be there and see that stream very often.

Maybe there is in the background an awareness. And then the same thought that before made you unhappy periodically, a thought about me and my life situation, a thought about me and there's something to do with me, some judgment, the same thought arises. Perhaps it says, you see, you have failed again.

You see, there's no point in all of this. You can't do it. This is just one of many possible thoughts.

Or the thought may arise, if only they would let me do things, because I'm so much better than everybody else. And you don't completely believe in that because you also notice when these thoughts arise and you completely believe in these thoughts, you can notice what that feels like, the emotion that accompanies the thought that you are not good enough or not worthy, or that you are so good, if only others could see it and you can watch the emotion that arises when you completely believe in a thought. And more often than not, it's some form of pain that arises when you totally believe in each arising thought.

So one day, your life may look very dark and bleak because a certain stream of thinking arises that habitually comes up. It may be connected to pain body, which we will look at. So one day, your entire life looks totally bleak and all your thought processes are negative.

And if you completely believe in each thought that arises, then that will feel dreadful. So, you know the two masks they have in theaters, comedy, one day, good thoughts, and then tragedy, mouth goes down, drama, bad thoughts, and totally in that. And one could say behind that, there actually can be a presence that watches both kinds of thought without totally believing.

You see it for what it is, conditioned thinking. And then quite quickly, thought loses its power to make you unhappy. Why?

Because if you look at arising unhappiness, how closely it is linked to certain thought processes in your head, not really to the situation, but to the way in which you interpret the situation through thought. And the way in which you interpret the situation through thought, of course, is to do with the conditioning of your mind. And so, this is a wonderful, thought is no longer, can no longer make you unhappy.

You see the relativity of thought, and you see how repetitive many of the thoughts are that go through your mind. How often they have done exactly the same, made you unhappy. The same thoughts in some people for years, year after year after year, the same thought patterns arise periodically, sometimes every day.

And they totally believe in it. They don't know that, for example, this thought may be there because that is, my mother told me that when I was four, five, six, seven, 10 years old, she would say certain things, just one of the ways in which certain thought patterns become conditioned thinking. And so, you might have noticed, parents who are not very intelligent tell their children that they are stupid.

They cannot see that children don't have the same maturity as adults. They say, you're stupid, you're stupid. After a few years, of course, you get conditioned into believing that there's something not quite right with you, and basically you are stupid.

You are stupid. And it's not always on the surface, but it comes up periodically in some way or another. This is only one of many possible ways in which society tells you who you are, and this goes conditioned thinking.

The world tells you who you are. School environment, social environment. Or you could rebel against that.

Which is also conditioned. You don't conform to anything anymore. You do the opposite of what your parents expect you to do.

And that can make you unhappy, too. And you're not free. You are forced to go into another form of conditioning.

So to be there as the witness of the conditioning that is taking place continuously, the conditioned thinking, thought processes. And then they don't make you unhappy anymore. They are recognized as conditioned thinking.

The old record, it used to be called record. Now it's the old CD, with better sound quality, but basically still the same. It's playing again.

There it is. And that's an amazing thing. If thought loses its power to make you unhappy, then you realize your unhappiness, how closely it is linked with being identified with the mind, the thinking mind, the stream of thinking.

It's not in the situation. I mentioned last night, Shakespeare. Nothing is either good or bad, but thinking makes it so.

And most people react to a situation in their lives, anything that arises in the now. They react out of the conditioned thought patterns. And they confuse totally.

They mix up the situation and their reaction to the situation, which is conditioned thinking. So they might say something like, something absolutely dreadful has happened to me today. It's just this awful thing came, and this awful person came, and he was so rude, and you're telling a story, you're mixing up the simple event and your own interpretation and reaction to the event.

They become a single phenomenon. You can't see that here is, all events are neutral in the now. The way in which I react, or the way in which I interpret the event is the conditioning of my mind.

And in very unconscious people, the two get totally confused. So the event and their reaction become one single phenomenon. And you say something awful has happened.

The awful is my reaction. The event is as it is, always. This is just a simple example.

So to see how the conditioning colors everything, what an amazing thing to become free of that, to see how little freedom otherwise there is in a human being. If that unconditioned dimension does not arise, you live as if somebody had placed a script in your mind, and now you're identified with a script in your mind and for the rest of your life, forced to act out the script in your mind, like an actor on stage who has completely forgotten that he's acting out a script. So identified with a role that he or she doesn't know who he or she is anymore.

Beyond the role. So that's the conceptualized self with its conditioning that we pointed to yesterday. That is the essence of not knowing who you are.

And that's why, and then you're trying to fill yourself up by adding more. It doesn't work. So this is freedom arises now, the possibility of freedom arises here and now as we allow that dimension to arise that is unconditioned.

And then honor, yes, you still honor the forms of your life, the roles that you play in relation to society. You play certain roles. They come to an end eventually.

You play the role of mother, you honor that. If you're totally identified with your sense of self and you are only a mother, and those kinds of mothers can be too much. And you can never let go of your role of mother.

And then your children become adults and you want to continue to protect them. But of course, there's an English word, smothering, which is to stifle. Then that's what you do.

You cannot free, you're so identified with the role, you cannot allow it to come to an end. And so we all know mothers, this is just one example, who cannot relinquish, let go of their role. So when you are 30 and 40 and 50, your mother still totally acts out that role towards you.

You're a little child. You don't know what's best for you. I know what's best for you because you're only a little child.

I'm your mother. I know. And they have wonderful intentions.

They don't, so this is only one tiny example of being trapped in a role and being identified with certain thought forms with their respective reactive patterns. And there's so much suffering created by humans for each other because they cannot, they cannot recognize that they are trapped in a role. And then the adult child whom the mother does not want to grow up remains a child in the eyes of the mother, reacts against it, feels stifled, feels angry, doesn't realize that the mother is only trapped in a role, and then mistakes the role that the mother is trapped in for who she is.

And then they hate each other. And so, and then the possibility arises to honor the role that you play temporarily as mother, that usually that comes to an end when the child reaches adulthood and throughout the child's life, you realize that mother is a temporary function which is honored and is a way of relating. But not exclusively, there is another dimension where whatever role you play and honor, while you play and honor that role, there is another dimension in you that also flows into which is beyond the role.

And that would, for example, if you are a mother, you would relate to your child, not exclusively through the role model, but another, an unconditioned intelligence would come in that relates to the child, not as a child, because even child is a temporary role. You're not reducing yourself or the other person to a role because inside a child, there is great intelligence already. So although you treat that on the one level, you are the mother relating to the child, on a deeper level, you are consciousness relating to consciousness.

And you honor that in the other person that is beyond the temporary role. And people will love you for that because you free them by recognizing that dimension in them that is beyond the roles that they are playing and that they perhaps themselves are completely trapped in. But they feel when you recognize a dimension in them that is beyond the role, you free them a little bit and they feel freer in your presence.

So what that means is presence is arising in you. And so you might meet a person, a bank manager. You're meeting your bank manager to discuss a loan, an important business loan.

And so you're going there. And if you cannot look beyond the temporary role that you are playing and the temporary role that he is playing, and perhaps he is completely identified with his role, he is totally a bank manager. Perhaps even when he gets home, he can't let go of being a bank manager, it happens.

Or maybe at home, he adopts some other role. Let's say he is totally trapped in his role as bank manager and his whole identity is in that. And yet you come there and now, how can you do that?

How can you not be trapped in role playing with him? This is very simple. It doesn't require a complex mechanism or technique.

The simplicity of stepping out of roles in yourself and others, not keeping others trapped in a role, because you would be a little apprehensive in your role. He is the dominant role in this interaction and you are the one who needs a loan. And simply, and this is key, simply by bringing into that interaction a space of stillness, alert stillness.

As you sit there and listen to him explain the figures, the numbers. As you sit there, you sit there not as a role anymore because the moment you allow that alert stillness that is presence, that is the state, that is the space between thoughts, you allow that to rise and perhaps you need to sense your inner body as an anchor so that you can be there in stillness. And you listen and alertness is there as you sit with this bank manager, just one example of thousands possibly, all the same.

You sit there in that state of alert presence, allowing this moment to be as it is, completely not needing to prepare the next statement, but simply be there as a field of conscious presence. You've stepped out of your role. You can go back into the role and just play it a little bit and then ask a question.

Well, what are the terms of this loan? How many years do I have to pay it back? Okay, and then you can enter the role a little bit so that you function in this world so that he doesn't think you're not going to give him a little piece of paper that says, I'm in total silence, I'm practicing, so I cannot answer your questions.

Because if you do that, without realizing it, you will have created another role, a very spiritual one, hoping that this will impress him. It probably won't. But, so it's not that anybody really notices that much of that shift.

You remain normal, so to speak. You can function normally. You don't have to become abnormal in your behavior.

Sometimes, as this arises, the ego can come back. Ego means conceptualized sense of self. It can come back at any stage and claim some new story of me as the great spiritual one, for example.

I was in a casual conversation with somebody and I simply asked an innocent question, where were you born? And he said, I was never born. And he looked very superior and made me feel, how could you have asked such a stupid question?

Of course he was never born. And so it's not necessary to stand out with anything. The strange thing is, as you step, you can enter a role and then almost one could say you have one foot out of your role in being, in stillness, and one foot in your role.

And it's a strange thing that happens. Everything works so much better. Even the roles, the interactions that you play with the roles, so much better.

An enormous enhancement of human interaction. Why? Because you are no longer trapped in a narrow self concept.

And when you are trapped in a narrow sense of me, all you ever, the only way you can relate is through wanting something from somebody or fearing something from somebody. So that would be the case with a bank manager. You would sit there and you would manifest both characteristics of the egoic state.

You want something from him, of course, and you fear him also. He might not give it to you. And that emanates, of course, the egoic state with its wanting and fearing emanates.

The wanting emanates, I need something from you, and the fear emanates. And that creates more ego in the other person, more deeply entrenched in his role because you strengthen his role by wanting something from him and fearing him. So you trap him even more in his role because you want something from him and you fear him.

That's part of his role, how he relates to others. They all want something from him and they all fear him. So you keep him, his role gets strengthened because you're trapped in your role.

So his role loves that because now he feels he really knows who he is because you're confirming to him that the essence of his identity is this bank manager. So both are being trapped. You trap yourself, you trap him.

And this is one example of hundreds, continuously it happens in daily life. Your function, your different roles, getting trapped in the conditioning. I said to somebody, are you a teacher, school teacher?

And she said, how did you know that I'm a school teacher? Everything in her was a school teacher. It was after 20 years, 25 years.

And so not to be with her and then to allow, bring in the space of stillness into the interaction. You free yourself and you free the other person. And an intelligence begins to operate in that situation that could not operate before when you were trapped in conditioned mind structures.

So that's, it is as simple as that. It does not require complicated steps before you can get there. Or some weird techniques.

Simply sit there in alert stillness, be there. And you step out of every role, not losing your capacity to honor that role and function as that role. So that is the beginning of the new state of consciousness.

That is unconditioned. And that is something that is very new in most humans. That it's possible to bring stillness into every interaction.

Not that you lose the capacity to speak. You might speak less, not in any way that anybody would notice necessarily, but you may speak less. But what you speak will have greater power because it comes out of the intelligence of the unconditioned.

And gradually the old CDs losing their momentum. They are running down. The more you allow the unconditioned to arise, the more the old thought forms are running down because they are not replenished.

So this is how any situation you use, no matter where you are, bring some stillness into that. If a little gap, especially human, the human situations. Now, I would recommend to practice not only in human situations, but use nature as a teacher for the state that is free of thinking, stillness.

And when you go into nature, use that and allow stillness to arise as you perceive anything natural, particularly natural, because man-made things tend to be made through thought. Except those man-made things that express the highest quality, great works of art, or sometimes works that embody enormous quality. Why do they, and people can sense.

It doesn't require a lot of sensitivity to sense that certain things have quality and others don't. Quality means somehow the doing, whoever made this, did not make the present moment into a means to an end. Full attention was flowing into the doing.

The doing was not with a profit motive or producing as many pieces as possible within one hour. But there was the quality of attention, of giving full attention, which means stillness. Because whenever you give full attention to anything, there is a field of stillness that arises.

Thought is not attention anymore. Your consciousness level goes down into thought. And then it can suddenly go up again into attention, which implies still presence.

And some people enter that state while they make something, are great artists, and that what they make somehow still contains that energy field of that state of consciousness out of which that work of art came. That is the difference between art and just non-art. Nobody really can say, what is it that makes this into a work of art, and then this is not really art.

It didn't come out of presence. So whatever you do then, whether you make something or whether it is simply a perception, whether it is simply a moment of perception, the only way I can describe that is to say it is of high quality, quality, which implies this moment is not made into a means to an end. It is honored fully.

So the arising of this new consciousness, the arising of stillness is so closely connected with what we talked about yesterday, which is not making this moment into a means to an end. Let's go back to the bank manager. You're meeting the bank manager.

If you want something from him, you're reducing him to a means to an end because you're reducing this moment to a means to an end. I need to get this loan. Now the obstacle that then appears in your past that you feel you need to overcome is what appears in the now is this form of the bank manager.

Now he may be an obstacle to where you want to be. The mental projection, I need that. You're not honoring this moment fully.

It's a means to an end. And most human beings live like that continuously, which means no true intelligence ever arises in their life. No true power ever arises in their life, even if they might be intelligent on a small level, intellectual, good at manipulating words and become a great professor of this or that.

But if you look at their lives, it's not an expression of intelligence. So see how freeing this is, bring stillness. So use nature whenever your visual perceptions, you look at a tree, a flower, the sky, water, auditory perceptions of nature, birds, the wind and the trees.

Perceive it through stillness. Labels are unimportant when you're out in nature. A depth arises that was never there before.

Be with a tree and then a thought may come after five seconds, 10 seconds, and then you watch the arising of this thought, which may be about the tree or maybe about something totally different. Maybe about the stock market. Then you watch the thought arise and subside and you stay with a tree and again, a space of stillness arises in which the perception happens.

You will be amazed how much nature can teach you because nature lives in the state of oneness. Oneness with itself, with the totality. And most of nature is very still.

So nature can teach you the state of no mind, as it's sometimes called in certain teachings from the East, no mind. Nature is a master at no mind because there's no mind in this flower. Yes, it's an expression of consciousness manifesting as this beautiful form.

Are you reducing this to a label? Can you truly stay with the mystery of this and allow the perception to arise in a field of stillness in which thought may still come here and there, it no longer matters very much. The thought comes in, goes away, the field of stillness remains.

And then something one could almost say communicates itself to you from the flower. But the main thing is what you're being taught is to exist in the state of no mind. But you have not the fundamental difference between you and the flower or between you and the cat is that you have been through the stage of thought as the human species has.

You go beyond, you're rising above thought. So one could say the whole of nature is pre-thought. Humans now transcend thought.

They rise above thought into no mind. But you meet again in the state of no mind, but there is a depth of knowing in you that is not there in the flower. The flower exists in the beautiful state of holiness, wholeness, holiness.

But as you transcend thought, there is a depth to that same state in you that is not yet in the flower, but you bring it to the flower. The flower exists in that state naturally, always has done. Humans have lost it and now are regaining that state of primordial connectedness with the one.

And whenever you lose something and then regain it, you know it at a deeper level than before you had lost it. So you can bring, it's not only that nature teaches you, one could almost say that nature is also waiting for you, for that state of consciousness to arise through you in which nature, because ultimately you are not separate from this flower, you are deeply connected. And ultimately nature recognizes itself through you, through your state of consciousness.

It recognizes its own sacredness and beauty through your recognition. And nature loves you for that. That is your interaction with nature.

So nature becomes a teacher of the state of no mind. But the greatest teaching is to sit in that field here, allow it to arise here. Use one of the doorways into that state.

And now one could say I've pointed to three. One is you sit here connected with the inner energy field of your body. If you are not, you become restless.

You rise up into the mind and you're no longer really here nor do you want to be here. As a thought-based entity, you don't want to be here. So if that is the case, observe that you're up here trying to get to the next moment.

A restlessness arises, impatience. You're thinking about who you're going to see tonight, phone calls that you have to make. And tomorrow morning, the problems you're facing, the normal human state is back.

Go into body. Once you recognize that, it's fine. It's not a personal matter at all.

Discontent, restlessness, not wanting to be here is the normal human state. All that you're expressing is a normal human state of consciousness. But the only difference is that most people don't know that this is what's happening to them because it's normal.

But you can see it. You can see the impatience, the restlessness, the not wanting to be here, the wanting to be in some future moment, tonight, tomorrow. But when you get there, tonight or tomorrow, where do you want to be in the next one?

That's, so to watch the madness, it's arising in you and it's not personal. Madness is not personal, it's normal. It's human, normal human consciousness.

I always want to be in the next moment. And watch that and then, okay, there it is. When you see, the moment you see it, something else is already arising.

That which sees your state of consciousness, to recognize your state of consciousness.

Already the seeing frees you. You're no longer totally it.

See, so any movement in yourself, it may be semi-physical at this very moment. Anxiety, restlessness, or any emotion that runs through you that's maybe connected to a memory or to some kind of anticipation of what is going to happen. A life situation that you're thinking about and you're experiencing emotions that go with those thoughts.

You see that. You see that you've been trapped almost all your life in that stream of thought. And if nothing happens, this is how you will die.

To the end of your life, discontent, restless, looking for the next moment. That is the human condition. So it's seeing it, mm, okay, all right.

And feeling it. And not saying, I should not be feeling this. I really should be beyond the human condition by now.

Doesn't work. There's the human condition. There's you feel what you feel at this moment.

Certain thought streams are going through your head. What can you do except to see it? And it is part of the is-ness of this moment.

What can you do? It is as it is. You bring acceptance to the agitation perhaps that you feel.

Okay, so something else arises the moment you accept this moment. Inner or outer level, doesn't matter. Presence arises.

Everyone here has a life situation, as I sometimes describe it. A past and a future, perhaps. There's no certainty about that.

But probably, you have a future. Certainly, you have a past. Usually, your entire attention is absorbed by that.

This creates a conceptualized self. And this is what walks with you wherever you go. Now, is that here, sitting here?

Are you sitting here with the burden of your life situation, remembering the problems that you had yesterday and what somebody did or didn't do or situation, anticipating the problems of tomorrow, having the story we talked about yesterday, the story of me, how is it going to unfold? It's very problematic. Take, this is the life situation, not being able to get out of this into now, the only place where a new factor can come in, the only place where true intelligence can actually change your life situation and not make it into a continuous repetition of the past.

That's all the future. If there's no, if the unconditioned does not arise, your future is a continuation of past on the surface, big changes may happen. You might go to a different country, meet a different partner, different financial situation, but certain patterns will be there, repeat themselves.

Unless you find the space of freedom. So it's, again, life situation and roles, they are all connected. You play certain roles as part of your life situation.

Learn to step out, even while you honor the situation, never be totally in it. Is that possible? Yes, it's possible for you now.

To have, you have the choice. Choice? Who has a choice?

You. Who am I? Consciousness.

There's nothing but consciousness. Consciousness is choosing presence. Consciousness is choosing to step out of identification with roles and forms and thoughts.

It's a cosmic transformation. It looks like something changing on the human level, but it's only a tiny aspect of that. The arising, the change in planetary consciousness.

So all I have to teach here, and it's not really teaching, there's only one thing, and it's a, from one perspective, it's a tiny shift to step out of the stream of thinking, to accept this now, to use a portal that can take you into the dimension of no thought, a tiny shift, and yet a very radical transformation too. That's all. There's nothing else here that you need to be shown, and you can only be shown this because it's arising in you already.

Stepping out of that stream, allowing the alertness to arise. The alertness that the Zen master pointed to when he was asked to explain the meaning of Zen, and he became quite famous as a master because he never gave any explanations, nor did he hit people. All he ever did when asked to explain the meaning of Zen was to raise his finger, and he would look at you in the state of absolute presence.

No thought, just pure conscious awareness. That's the essence of Zen or any other teaching, that state of consciousness. Not to exist in that for the rest of your life, but that's the essence of your being, and the rest is a little out of form, including roles that you play with.

But not lost in your life situation, lost in the story of me, thinking it matters so much what happens to me, because you only know yourself as the form, as the story, as the situation. Then it matters so much. But when you know yourself being beyond the form of your life, there's an essence knowing, then what happens or doesn't happen to you is relatively important, but not absolutely important.

Relatively, yes. Do I have $10 in the bank or $10 million? There's a relative difference.

It will make some difference to your life situation, whether you have $10 in the bank or $10 million. It is relatively important. It is not absolutely important.

If you have 10 million now, two years from now, you may have 10 left, or you have 10 now, maybe you will have 10 million. Gain and loss in everybody's life. If you think it matters absolutely, it becomes part of your sense of self, and when you lose it, as you will, you suffer, you lose yourself.

So Jesus said there's only one thing that matters. You're worried about many things, he said to someone who was trying to get things done. You're worried and concerned about many things, he said to a woman called Martha, but only one thing matters absolutely.

Then everything else in your life is relative. It's honored, but you have some distance from it, a space around it. Nothing stays with you for that long.

You have a space around whatever happens. That is the space of stillness. That is the space of peace.

That is the space that comes as you enter that beautiful state that is the surrendered state of consciousness, allowing this moment to be. Space consciousness, one could say, arises. Everything else is object consciousness.

Thoughts, mind forms, emotions, sense perceptions, objects in your consciousness arise. In the unenlightened state, you identify with the objects in your consciousness, thoughts, and every object says, I matter, can give me your attention. Every thought says that.

Believe in me, I matter, I'm really important. Because a thought is a little, it's an energy form. It's a little being, temporary being.

It has a little existence as an energy field, and the entity wants to grow. It says, look at me, I'm very important. Objects in consciousness arise, and humans tend to identify with certain objects that arise and think, that's me, me, me, and none of it is you, because it's not going to last.

A possession is an object in consciousness. The BMW is an object in consciousness. The big house is an object in consciousness, or the belief that I have failed, I'm unemployed, and poor is another object in consciousness, another mind image.

And they arise continuously, knowing yourself not to be an object in consciousness, but simply you know yourself as consciousness. The objects are relatively important. Positions that you attain, they come, they go.

Worldly recognition comes, goes, or never comes. Money comes, goes. Whatever you do, move, place here to there, movement, people in your life come, go.

Situations, conditions, states of health come, go. Objects, sense perceptions arise. Objects in consciousness.

And knowing yourself as the underlying stillness. That is the essence of your being. That is this place of freedom from conditioning.

That's all you can learn here in these three hours to access in yourself that dimension. Not through a technique, some technique may work, but techniques tend to give you time to get there. Or you, as the practitioner of a technique, give it time.

Even if the technique is designed to take time away from you, you, the practitioner, may need to become, to achieve something through the technique, another mind object. There are beautiful, simple techniques like watching your breath. When you watch your breath, you have to be very present and you cannot think while you watch your breath.

Breath moves in and out of the body. And if you truly feel the breath moving in and out of the body, you cannot think. The moment you think, you've lost awareness of the breath.

And then you're not present anymore. And then from watching the breath, you can easily sense there's the breath and there's the watcher, the field of awareness. I am that.

I am that. I am that is the fundamental identity beyond form, the essential I am-ness that is pointed to in the Old Testament when God talks of him, her, itself as I am that I am. I am no longer this or that.

I am prior to, before the arising of an object in consciousness as this or that. Those are the forms, temporary forms, temporary roles. So the presence is the realization of the essence of your identity, which in the unenlightened state gets mixed up with mental forms and stories and roles.

So there is an essence in your story and in your role that is the truth, but it gets totally mixed up with the form. Because everybody feels there is something incredibly precious to my being, and that is me. I don't want to lose that.

Everybody feels there's something very valuable and precious in here that gets totally mixed up with the story that people are telling yourself about who they are, and then to realize that that is the I am presence that has nothing to do, ultimately, with your life situation. It can be realized at any point in your life situation. You may be in prison or live in a palace.

You may sit on a bicycle or ride in a Rolls Royce. At any stage or state in your life situation, can that be realized? In good weather or in bad weather, it can be realized.

But by the way, it's more likely to be realized in bad weather, and of course, that comes soon enough in everybody's life. It's more likely to be realized through loss because an object is removed from your consciousness. A form is removed from your consciousness that you had identified with as yourself.

What is left when you lose someone close to you dies? You lose your possessions. You lose your status in society.

You lose the role that you have been playing. All of us will experience or have already experienced that you cannot go through life without experiencing, sooner or later, fundamental loss, also gain. But what you gain, you lose again.

And loss has been, for quite a few people, the awakener. Why? Why not, when something good happens and you get added something, why didn't you awaken then?

Because loss means an object dissolves in your consciousness that you had identified with as me, a thought form. It could be as simple as you arriving at the place where you parked your expensive new car and it's gone, relatively insignificant event. But for some people, if your sense of self is in that, it's very painful.

There's an empty space where there was your car. And then, if you don't start screaming and shouting and trying to, and you stay with that for a moment, you stay with that moment because you have learned to face the now as it is. And what you face in that moment of loss is an empty space.

And if that empty space is faced, the thought form that was linked to that outer form, car, me, big, better than, stronger than, more powerful than, that thought form has nothing to link itself into anymore. There's only an empty space. And at that moment, the thought form also dissolves when you face totally the space that is there when you lose something.

And that means there is a little hole in this stream of mental images and mental noise through loss. And when that hole appears, the opening, what comes through that opening is unconditioned consciousness. If we used slightly religious language, we could say it's whenever some kind of death happens, because it is always a form of death.

If a form dissolves, the dissolving of a form is death. So even your disappearing big car is a little death. And whenever death is faced totally, there is an opening.

The form is gone, there's just a hole there. And you face this moment as it is. Then what comes through that hole, one could say the formless one life is shining through that.

That. One could even say God comes through because every form obscures God. Let's just take it as a poetic statement.

Every form obscures God. Whenever a form disappears, that which is beyond form, the one life that manifests as form, but is beyond form, suddenly shines through, the formless, the divine, the light from God, doesn't matter what you call it, the unconditioned consciousness. And it shines through.

The moment it's there, it's so much peace in that, such aliveness in that, and yes, sacredness, joy also. And that is the essence of who you are. Traditionally, most human beings have found it through loss, through death.

Then teachings came, and the teaching points to the possibility of letting go your identification with those forms, so that the opening that otherwise is only caused by some disaster in your life, some form of death in your life, some great loss in your life, the opening that otherwise can only occur in the face of that, when you are ready to hear the truth that is contained in a spiritual teaching, it happens without the need for further disaster in your life. The opening is here now, as you enter the state of yes to now, allow the stillness to arise instead of fighting against it.

The little me entity has been fighting against stillness all its life. No, no, don't stop, don't listen. Fighting against the now all its life.

We talked about it yesterday, of making the now into an enemy, and all your life trying to resist it and get away from it. So the opening arises without the need for further disaster. But probably only because you've had enough disaster already.

In other words, you have experienced loss, otherwise you wouldn't be here. So there's already, the hole has already appeared, maybe more than one in the fabric of your existence. And that is good.

But here we choose death and then realize nothing important really dies. Because we choose, or as the expression goes in the holy book, die before you die. Sometimes translated as find death before death finds you.

And this is what's happening here. And once that's happened, you don't need disaster anymore. Unless you do, then you'll get it.

Disaster means something big is taken away from you. Death in one form or another comes into your life. And then there's the potential in every death, in every loss, there's a potential for realization.

The opening is there if you face it. If you run away from it, the potential is lost again. So there are many people in this world who have experienced great loss, but no inner change has happened.

Which means the potential, the opening immediately got obscured again. The moment was never faced. So the ultimate, the true death is simply the facing, the complete facing of this moment.

And more attention to this than to your life situation. This is amazing. This now is more important than your life situation with its problematic story.

It always is more important and is the only place where true change can happen, even in your life situation. So stepping out of that heavy conceptualized me past, future, into this. Your attention moves out of the forms into this.

You give enough attention, of course, to make little plans to do this and that, no problem there. You deal with everything that needs to be dealt with, but mainly you deal with what you can and must deal with at this moment. You honor this completely.

That means your attention, your consciousness is moving out of being trapped in the mind forms and becoming alert stillness out of the prison of mind forms. And suddenly there is the alert stillness in which you are free of the burden of the problematic life situation and the conceptualized sense of self. And the amazing realization comes there is no problem here in this now.

There cannot be. No problem can survive in the space of now. All problem making is connected with identification with thought processes and a self derived from thought processes.

Is it real? Is any problem real in your life? You can only find it.

Is it real at this moment? Is it a challenge at this moment? Is action possible at this moment?

You face this completely. If no action is possible, there's simply a yes. With that arises space.

What I sometimes call space consciousness, which isn't consciousness of something. It's consciousness. Amazing, amazingly simple.

And amazingly profound. What is perhaps the most profound statement in the Bible is be still and know that I am God. That contains all the words which are ultimately all synonymous.

Be, be, being, still, know, knowing. There is deep knowing in that stillness. Great intelligence and be still.

Be still, know that I am God the one. This statement contains the essence of all religions, of all teachings. And each word contains the power.

And each word is synonymous with each other word. Being, stillness, knowing, the I am, and God, they're all one. And so that, in a way, is the greatest mantra, if you can call it that.

And that was in the Bible, that is uttered by God, that statement, what does that mean? That statement is uttered by consciousness itself. The I am.

It's amazing that it should have found its way there because a lot of it is only relatively true. The great sage Ramana Maharshi, whom some of you may have heard about, who lived in India, passed away in around 1950. He taught mostly through stillness.

In other words, people would ask him a question and he would just look at you. In the state, of course, of stillness. Not thinking, what a silly fool you are to ask such a question, no.

He would just look in the field of stillness. And that was the teaching. But occasionally, out of that, words also came.

Once he was asked, how can we know, one person asked him, whether we are making progress on the spiritual path because we might be deluding ourselves. And he said, that's very simple. The degree of absence of thoughts is the criterion for progress on the spiritual path.

Oh, the degree, that means the extent to which thoughts no longer occur, which means the extent of inner stillness is the degree of progress on the spiritual path. Oh. And one or two minds in this room may be saying right now, oh my God, then I haven't made any progress because my mind is so noisy.

And then you watch that thought and allow it to be. And there's the arising of stillness around the thought. It's so simple.

And then stillness is there as an undercurrent in your life, even while you're in the shop. How much is that? Okay, I'll take it, money, thank you.

And again, it's to do with not being totally drawn into the function of that moment, the role of that moment. Customer, shopkeeper, who wants something from each other, who make the other person into a means to an end. And so there's a little gap as you hand over your money with a little field of aware, still presence.

Three seconds, four seconds, don't need to just, you hand over. You're waiting for change. Then you get a few seconds.

It seems insignificant from the point of view of mind, but you have freed yourself and the other person from the delusion of being the temporary form, the temporary role that we are playing. And you continue in your role as customer, but it's only like something you've put on. You're not it.

Any situation, you are the bringer of space, stillness into that situation. And then words come, action happens too. And even while the words are being spoken, there can be stillness.

If you should lose yourself in the words, which is very easy to do, the moment you open your mouth, mind draws in your attention and you get drawn into identification with the quickly arising thought forms. So it's very easy to completely lose yourself in that again. And then only afterwards you suddenly notice you got totally lost again in that.

And then you say, oh, okay, I lost the now. And then you re-enter the now, it is. How do you re-enter the now?

Presence simply arises. Or you could feel the sense the inner body becomes an anchor, look at this moment and say, oh, that's it is how it is. Say yes to that, that's the beginning of stillness.

Or bring complete attention to sense perceptions, especially in nature and alertness. And that alertness is still. So as you look at that tree, you're aware of two things.

The tree, the form, that, and the stillness in which the perception happens, which is the awareness in which it happens, which is consciousness, which is the I am. I'm ringing this bell. As I ring this bell, the sound arises in the field of now, in the field of awareness.

And as you listen, you can be aware not only of the sound, although to be aware of the sound, especially as it dies down, you need to be alert to follow the sound with your attention. It requires a certain alertness, especially as the sound begins to disappear. When it's disappeared, what remains is an empty space of awareness.

The disappearing sound is a form of death because it comes to an end. And that is always when the form meets the formless. It's a beautiful moment of sacredness.

So listen again and be aware not only of the sound, but also, one could say, of yourself as the field of presence in which the sound happens. Still, very still, there is an incredible joy and aliveness in knowing yourself as consciousness itself, whether something is happening or not happening or what is happening in that field that you are, doesn't really matter anymore that much. And if it doesn't matter that much anymore, it improves greatly what's happening.

This is why Ramana Maharshi, the teacher I mentioned just now, he said, your true nature is happiness. I wouldn't use that word. I would say your true nature is joy.

It is there when you know yourself as the underlying awareness, not as something in the awareness, as awareness. And that awareness knows itself. It is, one could say, it is awareness of awareness.

It senses itself. It knows itself. I am.

I am. I am life before it becomes something. And I am everywhere.

Of course you are. You don't need to be. I am in the flower, manifesting as the flower, the same presence, the same consciousness manifesting as that.

So you recognize yourself, this essence of I am, when you look at a tree or plant or flower. Oh, it's me. You don't tell yourself that.

You sense that. And another human being, you look into the eyes of the bank manager. And the same I am presence is there underneath the role of bank manager.

And you look at him and recognize yourself. And in that moment of recognition, you love him. Truly.

Because whatever you recognize as yourself, you love as yourself. And then the words come true that they tried to practice but couldn't. Love thy neighbor as thyself because thy neighbor is thyself.

Recognize thy neighbor as thyself. Then of course you love him or her. So in that self-recognition is the love for all life forms as yourself.

And then you can say with the teacher, some of you know J. Krishnamurti who taught for 50 years or so. In one of his talks, he suddenly stopped and said, do you want to know what my secret is?

And everybody said, yes, please. We've been waiting for that for 40 years. And he said, okay.

Here it is. I don't mind what happens. Oh, I don't mind what happens.

That was his secret. Now perhaps, I don't know how many of his listeners understood that, but now perhaps we can see what it is that he meant. What happens is a form that arises, comes and goes.

When you know yourself as the stillness, as the I am presence, what happens is allowed to happen. That's why life gets so much better. All the things that you thought you needed will be added unto you.

A statement from the teaching of Jesus, which simply means, the things that you needed, I need that. It tends to happen that life brings them to you when you no longer need them. And then at some point, of course, life takes it away again.

That's okay. We'll take a little break. Perhaps 15 minutes of clock time.

Welcome. I should say welcome in many languages. So many nationalities here.

So some of you have come a long way, traveled a long distance to be with yourself. And sometimes that's how it works. To be with yourself, I don't mean the self that is such a burden to carry.

You may be carrying that also, but that's not why you've come here. but something deeper than the story or the conceptual self in the head that needs and wants something. Of course, that's also come with you here.

The self that needs or wants something. And it may be expecting to get it here, to add something to itself, but that's not how it works. So I sometimes use the expression portals, openings into yourself, a new state of consciousness, one could say, unconditioned.

And portals are here all the time. And one could consider our entire retreat as a portal into that state of consciousness that we may call presence. So the retreat is not here to add anything to you.

One could almost say it's here to remove something. Yeah, but not even that. To show something that's already there.

And the teaching, to use that word, it's not really any teaching. The totality of this weekend, long weekend is the teaching. The words are not that important.

While we sit here in this beautiful space, you may be a little tightly packed in the back. Maybe tomorrow we can move forward a little bit more. But while we sit in this beautiful space, always remember, and I will keep reminding you so that you don't get attached only to the words, to pay attention to this.

This is one important portal that is here. To pay attention to the silent space that is here. It's here in this room.

So while we sit here, there's always a dimension of silence or silent space. And all that's required of you for it to become a portal is to pay attention to it. It does not mean that you cannot pay attention to the words.

You listen, the words are there, they go in. But as you listen, you also listen to the silence. And the mind, the thinking mind might say, this doesn't make sense because listening to the silence, there's nothing to listen to.

All that's required is simply to acknowledge, to pay attention, to notice the silence. To the thinking mind, that is not a significant event. It is a non-event.

It is a non-happening. It is completely uninteresting, has no fascination whatsoever, and adds nothing to who you are. That's why the mind-made self, the heavy self that you carry with you is not interested in it and can't even do that.

In other words, you cannot listen to silence through thought. The moment you notice the silent space, the stream of thinking ceases and you haven't lost consciousness. That's why we are here.

That is one portal that is opening up. There's only one thing here to learn, and it's not even learning, because learning would imply that you need to absorb something new. There's only one thing here to discover.

And in many of you, probably most of you, that has already emerged, which I sometimes call the unconditioned consciousness, the state of presence, or more recently, I've been calling it space consciousness, as opposed to object consciousness. Most humans in this world know only object consciousness and are identified with object consciousness react. Object consciousness is anything that takes on form.

Thought is a form, a thought form, an object in consciousness. Every sense perception is an object in consciousness. Object consciousness, the words that you hear are object consciousness forms.

The silent space has no form, can't grasp it. Space consciousness, that dimension of depth or stillness that is already in you. And in many, I know that that has already emerged, although it may get obscured from time to time again by total absorption in object consciousness, thought, reactions, me, and you yourself become an object to yourself, a mind made me with its story.

You have made yourself into an object in consciousness, an uneasy entity. And that uneasy entity is also here. The reason why you are here is that something else has emerged, which one could call a new consciousness on this planet because it's been so rare until even now, it's still rare, but until recently, it's been so rare for that dimension to be realized in a human being.

And suddenly now, many people are beginning to realize it. It's still rare, relatively speaking, relative to the population on the planet, but in more humans, it is emerging already. And you may not even know that this is why you've come here.

But the self, the object consciousness, me, has also traveled here, and it may have its own agenda here. It wants something because it is never enough, never complete, never fulfilled for except short intervals between two wantings or two fears and two not enoughs. So that self, what is traditionally called the self in Buddhism, that is called the self has come with you.

And of course, wherever you go, it will travel with you also. And it won't leave you alone for too long. And it's back, I'm still here.

And that is that part in you that after a little while here, maybe tomorrow afternoon, will already begin to feel restless because not enough is being added to it here. And it will start thinking, how much longer have I got here? I have to stay another two days.

And then it'll project itself to the third day when you're going to leave, because that is then becomes the next significant event. Whereas this retreat to that self is a non-event. So it will project itself away because it always wants to be in the next moment, not in this one that is a characteristic of object consciousness of the self.

So it won't be happy with this for long. So that it's good to know that that also is there in you and it does other things. It's not happy with what is for very long.

And it likes to complain and react. And I don't mean complain in saying, you're stepping on my foot, please remove your foot from my foot. That's a simple statement.

You can do something to alleviate this, please do it. That's not a complaint. I mean, the mind pattern of inner and sometimes outer complaining, which is to do with a deep seated pattern in the mind made self that is the reactive.

And although these are beautiful surroundings, some of it's perhaps hard to find a more beautiful spot on the planet, yes. And yet the self will easily find things to be unhappy about because we live in the world of forms. It's in the nature of the world of form that it is not totally satisfying.

Things go wrong in it. And the self loves that fact because then it can complain. And here there are many people in a relatively small space, plenty of opportunity to complain about other people, maybe in the head only or whatever conditions are not quite right.

And in complaining, which is a deep seated pattern, reacting, complaining of the deep seated pattern of the mind made self, the conditioned entity, in complaining and reacting, it momentarily strengthens its sense of self because when you complain, you are right and somebody else is wrong. And so it's unconscious. It is an unconscious attempt to strengthen one's sense of me, of self, which is never quite enough.

So you need to strengthen it somehow. So you cut here, there may not be much else left for it than to feel unhappy about something and then focus on that. Could happen.

The pain body may come in and add to it. We're having a full moon on Saturday, which sometimes triggers pain bodies. So just to know that there's a dimension in you of depth, which has brought you here.

And there's the dimension, the shallowness of a mind made me that cooperated enough for you to be here. Okay, I'll go along with that. In quite a few people, it didn't allow them to come here.

At every retreat, there are people who at the last minute or a day before or a week or something, am I, should I go? There's no, what's the point? And after much agonizing, they cancel.

So something in them prevented them. This is quite normal. Maybe they'll come to the next one or they get other teachings or teachers, maybe talk just situations.

Everybody gets what they need. So sometimes it interferes enough, but with you, at least it cooperated to allow you. And some of you hardly made it here because even a few days ago, you weren't quite sure whether you would actually go.

So to observe, I may be talking a little bit more about it tomorrow so that you recognize it clearly when it's there, because that's really all that's required for it to recognize the conditioned entity that until recently was your entire identity. And it's really enough to recognize it. Oh, there it is.

And of course, there is something deeper in you that's arising and opening up. And that has brought you here. Throughout, we are using the portals that are available to us here.

And one is silence, not only in this room, but also out in nature, which is the other teacher here. There are quite a few teachers this weekend. The beautiful nature that you're going to walk in, move in.

It's not only that all the beautiful things that you see, thousands of life forms, that's beautiful. There's also a vast sense of space or spaciousness and a silence that underlies it all. If you can listen to it first thing in the morning, you will hear the birds.

Beautiful sounds. They are objects in consciousness, perceptions, beautiful. And then notice, just as you do it here, the silence or the stillness out of which the sounds come.

And suddenly the sounds have greater depth to them. That depth is your own depth, ultimately. It's the depths of the universe.

And you can then listen to that beautiful sound, just the joy of life celebrating its own existence through these little forms. You can listen to that. And if simultaneously you are aware of space, you can listen to those sounds without any interference by thought.

And that is the arising of the new consciousness in which a vast intelligence operates, far greater than thought. And you haven't lost thought when you need it, it's there. So we use the portals that are here naturally and through a silent space here, no matter what you listen to in nature, no matter what you see, there's also a vast spaciousness, a harmonious whole that holds it all together, all these thousands of beautiful life forms.

You can be aware of that also. So the more you are aware of silence and space, the more that inner spaciousness, that inner stillness, they open up. And that is the depths of who you are beyond a little mind-made entity that also has its own level of existence.

It will continue, yes, but you are no longer captivated by it and thinking that that's all there is to you, this uneasy, fearful, needy entity. And then we are using here, well, other portals, of course, the main one you could say, and I'm sure you are familiar with that already, is now, every portal takes you into now, to be internally aligned with what is. That's a wonderful portal.

Whatever is, is as it is now. Allowing this moment to be, and this is our practice this weekend. Internally, to be aligned with this, to actually pay more attention to now than past and future.

You're not going to lose them. If during this weekend, you don't pay that much attention to past and future, or they will want to reassert themselves, return attention to now. Welcome now.

Whatever happens in now, some things, the little me might react, and then you notice, oh. And you realize it's important. Whatever is, you can't really argue with, because it already is.

Action then arises out of the surrendered state, not out of the resistant state. That's intelligent action, if action should be needed. So, whatever happens at this moment, and nothing can happen anywhere else except this moment.

Nothing ever happened that wasn't this moment. Nothing will ever happen that's not now. So whatever happens can only happen now, and is, one could say, although the little me doesn't like that, whatever happens is connected with the totality of all life, the totality of the universe.

Buddhists knew that 2,600 years ago already, the interconnectedness of all things. Modern physicists know that, that there are no separate events. There only seem to be separate events.

There's no such thing as a separate event or a separate entity. Everything is connected, interconnected to the totality, the web of the entire cosmos. Therefore, whatever happens is inevitable.

Otherwise, it would not be. It's connected to the fabric of the whole. So the is-ness of this moment could not be otherwise.

And the mind says, oh yes, it could. If he hadn't done that, this wouldn't have happened, but he did that. If I had acted differently, it wouldn't have happened, so it could be otherwise.

That's what the mind argues in that way, but the fact of the matter is it isn't otherwise. I can raise my arm, now it's raised, and the mind said, yeah, but you didn't have to do that. You could have not raised it, but now it's here.

Perhaps another universe has already branched off from this moment where I did not raise my arm. This is what physicists speculate about, that every moment, different universes come out of infinite possibilities. If we carry on talking about this, this will take us into philosophy.

The fact remains, this moment is as it is. It is. And then it changes, and again, it is as it is.

It may change through you because you accepted the is-ness which led to intelligent action because it's only now that the portal is open into true intelligence when you're not the reactive little entity that can't accept the is-ness and needs a future which is no more than a thought form, isn't it? Nobody has ever encountered the future except as a thought. Nobody has met it ever.

It only exists as a thought form. The past too only exists as a thought form. They seem so real.

Time, past and future seem so real. And you can say, yeah, they must be real because I'm getting old. I'm burning up in time, and I'm shriveling just like a fruit, a fresh fruit, and then it shrivels.

And then it's gone. Everything is being burned up in time. That's true on one level, it looks so real.

And then if you look, yes, but time, past, future, never here, never. Nobody's ever met them except as a thought. So it seems to do things to things.

And yet, if you look more closely, it doesn't even exist. No conclusions. Because then it becomes philosophy.

There's nothing wrong with philosophy, but not here. Just to see, even to see a paradox, to see the paradox of time and the timeless. So on this retreat, we use the portals of silent space here and in nature.

We use nature itself. We may talk about that tomorrow, which doesn't exist except as a thought form. We use the portal of now, which simply means our practice this weekend is to become friendly with now.

It doesn't sound important enough. I want ultimate realization. Well, just become friendly with now.

I want to attain the ultimate, just become friendly with now. Yes, but what about the ultimate? I want to add it to me.

And finally I'll be complete when I attain the ultimate in the future. So the entire retreat then can be considered as a portal, potential portal into that unconditioned consciousness, space consciousness, just words, pointers. It also helps, and here is another portal, to feel the inner body as you sit here, a certain aliveness in your energy field, simply to sense that the body is alive, a little bit anchors you in now.

And that I recommend when you go to bed here, because here you don't have television to stimulate your mind or other things, radio. And if you're not staying here in the retreat place and you happen to have a television in your room, I would recommend that you don't switch it on this weekend or the radio. Are you going to miss something terribly important?

Probably not. When you listen to the news on Monday, it'll be the same. 20 years ago, it was the same.

Anyway, in the 20th century, similar things happened worse. So when you go to bed, lie there on your back, feel the energy field of the body, just notice it. It's not a big deal or complicated matter.

Simply start somewhere in the body, hands, feet. Oh, there's the hand. And then attention is there.

And then attention is in the general overall feeling of inner body that anchors you quite simply in now. Thoughts will slow down, may even stop if your attention is fully in the body. So instead of being immersed in some kind of thought stream, which is going to be about tomorrow or your return trip home, or the problems that are waiting for you when you get home, and it'll be saying, you should have stayed home, you have too many things to deal with, you shouldn't have come.

Those usual things that happen in mental noise. Then you start out of that into the aliveness of now, and you use the inner body as a portal. And it should wake up in the middle of the night, and the mind wants to start up again.

Me, my story, my problems. And then you notice, oh, let's go into the body. The mind will be saying, no, you can't.

There's no point. You can't, not now, you can't feel your body now. There's too much to think about, too restless.

Yes. And then you feel the body. Don't necessarily have to believe what the head tells you.

Not now, it says, not now, think, think. Every thought says, I matter, give me attention. It doesn't say that openly, but it wants, because it's a little energetic entity, and it wants more energy for itself.

So it wants to be taken very seriously. It says, I matter, give me more attention. And then you, usually it gets it.

It just pulls, okay, this matters. And then it leads to more proliferation of thought streams coming out of that one. And it's probably problematic.

And you're lying there in a nice bed, there is no problem except as thought forms. If there were a true problem, it would be right in front of your eyes and you have to take action. Challenge, it would be a challenge that exists a lot in life.

But problem and accumulation of thought forms concerning future, sometimes past, has no actual existence except as a thought form. So it says, I matter, give me your attention. Off you go into a stream of thinking.

Can't sleep, just so much on my mind. And it burns up life energy. And then you wake up.

And there's the heaviness of me. I really can't face another day of this. So notice the tendency for mind to want to draw in all your attention.

Sometimes coupled with certain emotions, let's say me, then the emotion energizes the thought. And that becomes a person's sense of self. No space around it, just that, trapped in the form of me.

And then you suddenly notice, oh, the emotional turbulence and mental noise. They think, oh, okay. The noticing is the arising of something that is not conditioned, just to see it.

And with the seeing comes the possibility of stepping out. And then say, okay, I can actually feel my hand. Feel your hand, says thought.

Think about your problems. So you sense and you lie there. And you don't even want to go back to sleep because it's so beautiful to be anchored in your inner energy field.

And now, why go back to sleep? Enjoy your sleeplessness. Oh, it's great.

For a while, I went a little mad. I loved that state so much of not being able to sleep that I would drink two or three cups of strong coffee before going to bed, just so that I could enjoy that incredible sense of aliveness in the body. Not through the coffee.

The aliveness was there anyway, but I wanted to stay awake as long as possible. No need for that. And that reminds me, I would recommend that you don't, although we are in Italy, I'm sorry, that you don't indulge in alcohol this weekend.

You can indulge after. Because when presence is fully there, it doesn't matter anymore. But the arising presence can easily become obscured through a couple of drinks.

And then you go back into, hmm. So this is simply a recommendation. We are also going to spend some of this weekend in silence.

Again, a recommendation. There's no thought police or speech police. So I may recommend certain periods during the weekend when we are simply in silence, at least external silence.

Thank you. So it's good to notice, and just a few days here are enough to encounter many different states in yourself. Loving it here, oh, this is a great cruise.

And two hours later, hating it. Just notice. Notice something in you, as I said, wants to be here.

Something else doesn't really want to be here. It went along and might regret it now. And just notice that.

This room is open during the day. So you could come in any time also. Just if you want to sit, just sit.

Be still, listen to silence. Going out into nature, even, I recommend that even if you've come with a friend, every day to spend some time alone in nature also. So just walking, sitting, looking, listening.

We will talk more about that. So one recommendation then, we've been talking about thought is not to take any thought that arises this weekend. Too seriously.

Remember the thought says, I am serious, I matter. But it's not that serious. In this evolutionary leap that humanity is now taking, of which you, the form, is an important part.

You are that evolutionary leap of human consciousness. In that leap, we go beyond thought. We're leaving, we've gone through the whole huge evolutionary cycle of being totally identified with thought.

And now it's time to go beyond, because if we linger any longer in this state of consciousness, which has become dysfunctional, because it is the end of a cycle. If we linger any longer, humanity will not survive as a species. It will destroy itself and the planet.

The madness will simply increase as it's been doing throughout the 20th century. So we are stepping out of thought. Thought can still be used beautifully, creatively, but no longer have our self in it.

We are also going to spend certain periods of time, or rather no time, in stillness together. If there is a lot of interference through thought, simply use a portal, listen to silence. Feel the inner body, whatever.

Or simply say, okay, there's mental noise, that's how it is, what can I do? There it is, all right. The arising of that new consciousness, one aspect of it, one way of looking at it, very limited way, everything, every perspective is limited.

One aspect of that is, one can say, it is the arising of stillness from within, alive, vibrantly alive, but still. And out of that, sometimes dynamic action can flow. It is not a passive state.

Our little opening ceremony, I almost forgot, awakening, the bell signifies awakening out of thought. Thank you. I will see you in the now at 10 o'clock, as you walk back to your room and throughout this weekend, and walk on the, what I call the razor's edge of now, one step at a time.

It's miraculous, that now, miraculous. Take off clothes, just that. Who cares about the story of me?

You can go back to it. This is where something new can come in, only through that opening.

Eckhart Tolle Retreat Talk Titled Living the Liberated life

Sounds True and Namaste Publishing present Living the Liberated Life and Dealing with the Pain Body with the author of The Power of Now, Eckhart Tolle.

It seems almost paradoxical we are going to spend some time together tonight in order to explore a dimension of consciousness that is beyond time. We are spending time together to move more deeply into the present moment and to experience a dimension of consciousness that opens up when your attention is completely present in this moment. And there are two levels of teaching, if you call it that, it's not really teaching, there are the words and there are the silent spaces in between the words.

Usually people don't pay attention to the silent spaces between words and in this, our civilisation there actually aren't many silent spaces anymore. In your head there may be an almost continuous dialogue unless you are beginning to encounter within yourself the dimension of stillness. What happens when you pay attention to a gap between sentences or between words, the silent space, immediately there is some stillness inside you because it's only through the stillness that you can listen to the silence, to become aware of the silence, of the gaps.

Now what does stillness mean, that's just a word, we could use other words, I sometimes use the word presence to describe this state of consciousness that is now emerging collectively on this planet, although at the moment only relatively few people are able to access it, but there is a state of consciousness that is emerging on the planet that is very different from the consciousness that has been dominant throughout human history and compared to that new state of consciousness that is emerging, a state that has been pointed to by many teachers in the past but has always been misinterpreted, the original purity of all those teachings has been misinterpreted by the human mind and completely misunderstood. So what does it mean, stillness, the human mind says stillness isn't interesting enough, it's a state of consciousness that is free of thought and yet you're fully alert, fully awake, fully present.

It doesn't mean you will never think again, thought will come in again, but you will always be rooted in that state as you learn to live in that state and this state emerges more fully and us sitting here together this evening, what's really happening beyond the personal level is that this state of consciousness here is emerging. On a personal level it might look as if I were telling you useful things, how to live free of problems, free of suffering, free of conflict, but it goes far beyond the personal level and the main, the essence of what I speak about and point to, you cannot actually understand through the mind because the essence is precisely beyond the mind. By mind I mean thought activity, mental noise.

Most humans are trapped in that continuous mental noise and identify with the mental noise as themselves, as me, and there's a continuous monologue or dialogue going on in the head and that grows, already young children start to develop it and gradually you identify with the mental noise and image arises as this is, that's me and you're completely trapped in this continuous stream of incessant thinking and that is, your sense of self, of me, gets identified with that, so my problems, my suffering, what about me, what's going to happen to me, it's a mental image of a sense of self that is never really at ease, never feels really at home, is always trying to get somewhere but never quite gets there. Many times it thinks it's got there but then realizes, oh no, I'm not there.

It tries to get to some state, some relief, some state of happiness or fulfillment, completion, perfection, in whatever way, no matter, the bank robber is trying to get there in some way but he's robbing a bank in order to get the money because he believes that the money will eventually enable him to feel a more intense aliveness, a more deeply rooted sense of self, of identity and that's of course an illusion but even the spiritual person who is practicing certain techniques for years is trying to get somewhere, a state of perfection, a future, this mind made sense of self is always reaching out to the future because it believes there's salvation there somewhere for me, at some point in the future I'm going to make it. Whether the making it is becoming wealthy or the making it is becoming a spiritual master or enlightened, basically it's the same mind structure still at work.

So to be condemned to an almost continuous state of unease, something is never quite right. I need to get somewhere. This moment is never quite right or very, very rarely, only when a desire has just been fulfilled there's a moment of relief and then immediately something else arises.

That's something to observe in oneself, that state of unease with what is, with the present moment. That's part of the old consciousness, it's embedded in the very structure of the human mind. So no matter what you do, you can't get rid of it on the level of mind.

And then gradually all this mental noise becomes self-serving. It simply is there to reinforce itself, it goes around in vicious circles. And all we're doing here is allowing a deeper dimension of consciousness to emerge because it wants to emerge.

Otherwise there wouldn't be much chance. You can't make it happen. But you can allow it to happen.

The very fulfillment of your existence as a human being on this planet is the flowering of consciousness. Stepping out of the conditioned self, the conditioned mind, all the mental noise is conditioned by the past. Stepping out of conditioned sense of self, my history, my story, me, equating your sense of identity with your story, your history, all that's the conditioned.

And it is possible to step out of that. And what's, what is there beyond the conditioned little me, the little sense of self derived from the past, and that needs the future for its fulfillment, and at the same time feels threatened by the future, because the future is going to kill it. So it's a double-edged sword that continues running towards the future, away from this moment, seeking fulfillment.

At some future moment I'm going to get there, but at the same time feel deep down the future is also going to kill me. So humans live between these two, fear and desire movements. And for most people, all their motivations, all their actions arise either out of fear or desire.

They're all connected with future. And that also is embedded in the very structure of the human mind. It's interesting to observe it in oneself, even to observe that you are not at ease in this moment, even to observe that just 10 seconds ago you were thinking about your dinner tonight, or the problem that you're going to have to face tomorrow, even to observe that is already the beginning of another consciousness emerging.

If you can observe what the mind is doing, that is not part of the mind. You're not judging it, you're simply watching that. That is the stillness emerging in you.

That is the dimension of consciousness that is deeper than the mind, vaster, of infinite potential. It contains infinite vast potential. And once you access that, you will find it amazing that humans have lived for thousands of years trapped in a sense of self that was so limited to see themselves as a little person with a little history and a little future, and to be trapped in that sense of self.

It's such an illusion, and it's so, it's a prison. So just to watch, even at this moment, is, am I at ease, or is there some part of me that wants to be somewhere else? Do I want to be in the future, or am I trying to get away from this moment?

It's always, that is the essence of the old state of consciousness, and when you observe it, that's the beginning of a new consciousness. I sometimes, it's sometimes called the witnessing consciousness. You observe what the mind is doing, so you're not totally trapped in it, and that is only the beginning.

That is only the beginning, and then it emerges more deeply, more fully, as the state of stillness, which you may get glimpses of even here, and perhaps at this moment, when the mind is not moving anymore. You're alert, completely present, completely open to the aliveness of this moment, and most humans are completely, totally unaware of that, that the fact that there is an infinite source potential for aliveness concealed in what looks like so insignificant to the mind, and that's this moment. It's like the atom.

The tiniest of things contains vast energy, once it opens up. So the very life energy, energy that sustains the whole universe, you can have access to it through the little doorway that opens up when your attention moves into this moment, and it always means you become very alert, very present. That's stillness.

Stillness, alertness, presence, they're all one. So stillness, don't misinterpret stillness as meaning you're going off to sleep, or the kind of stillness you have when after a few drinks you might drift off a bit in life, you can't remember your problems, so you feel a little bit better. But even drink can sometimes mean, people sometimes drink to get rid for a little while of the torture of their mind telling them what their problems are, the problematic sense of self, the me.

So they drink and for a moment they don't remember their problems, but of course there's a price to pay because you go, there's a lowering of consciousness, so you go lower towards the vegetable realm. And what we are doing, we are not moving in that direction here. It's fine for vegetable, plant life has unbelievable beauty and aliveness to it, and in many ways it's more enlightened than humans, because it doesn't inhabit a world of problems.

This flower has no problems, and even by the time it comes to die, it's not a problem, it just dies. And yet there is an aliveness there, and it's also an expression of consciousness, a beautiful expression of the divine consciousness, just as you are. So we are moving beyond thinking to a more awake state, a more alert state, a more present state, compared to which the thinking state is a dream-like state.

To be immersed in thinking, this mental dialogue, you're only peripherally aware of your surroundings, because you might be walking in the woods in the most beautiful surroundings, but you're thinking about your problems, my problems, what about me? You're not there. If then something happened that would give you a little shock, you would suddenly, for a moment, enter a state that is present and alert.

If you were suddenly confronted with a bear, you would come out of your thinking state, out of your problems, and there would be the bear. And that's not a problem, it's a situation that requires probably some action. Either you move away, or you make a noise, or whatever.

But the difference between that state is so, and this is a state that can happen to some humans accidentally in certain situations. You're driving, and suddenly, something goes wrong, and you know an accident is imminent in two or three seconds. And you've been driving for two hours, immersed in your world of problems, stress, this, that, to deal with whatever.

And suddenly, all that drops away. This is an example when the state of consciousness that I'm pointing to emerges accidentally, and many people have reported they knew an accident was inevitable within two or three seconds, or five seconds. And they suddenly found themselves in an inner state of extreme calm and serenity, and they were totally there, totally alert.

All fear had left, and later they survived to tell about it. Said, this was amazing, how could this be, because it's such a dangerous situation. And I felt so serene suddenly.

There are many reports, and many similar examples. So this state of consciousness can sometimes emerge briefly, usually accidentally. Some people seek it out through dangerous activities.

It's the only way they can be free of the burden of their mind, the burden of the personality, of the me, the burden of this problematic me that they think that's their reality. Because when they're climbing up the wall of the mountain, they can't think about that. They have to be present, totally alert in the now.

But when they come down, they get back in their car, they re-enter the world of problems. So they can't be in the state, they think they need to be engaged in that activity to be in that state, but that is not the case. You can choose that state now.

If you're sitting here, what I'm saying now might not yet apply to all humanity. But if you're sitting here, there's enough consciousness in you to choose a state that is free of the problem-making mind. And you realize when you enter the now, that there is no problem ever in this moment.

There may be a situation that you need to deal with, that is never a problem. Anything that comes into the now, you may need to take action, do this or that, and you do it. It arises out of that state of consciousness, of presence.

But dwelling mentally on situations, investing the situations with the sense of me, self, and going around in circles, lying in bed at night, sleepless. And wherever you go, you can't stop this machine, the noise machine in the head, because you don't remember where the button, the off switch is. That is torture.

The most wonderful realization is that in the state of consciousness that I call presence, there are no problems. Perhaps challenges, but they never turn into problems. If you cannot take action, everybody in this room has certain, is involved in a certain life situation.

Some better than others. Some life situations are relatively good and comfortable. Other life situations may be problematic.

There may be shortage of money, there may be health problems, there may be relationship problems, work, and many kinds of completely fictitious problems created by the mind. What if this happens, or that happens, or I lose this, or I don't get that, or he leaves me, or she leaves me. So another level of problems is total fiction.

It comes about through the incessant mental noise. It's a very radical reversal of the normal way to live. Take your attention, whenever you think you can't stand your problems anymore and it's getting too much, and you wake up in the morning and say, oh, not another day.

No human is meant to live like that, waking up in the morning and saying, I can't face another day. And nor in nature that doesn't happen. The flower too, when the sun rises, the flower opens up, because it responds to the sun, and no flower has ever said, I can't face another day.

No animal has ever said, I can't face another day, except perhaps animals that are suffering deeply because of what humans have done to them. But no animal in the wild would... an animal wakes up, and a plant, a flower wakes up, and immediately is in a state of aliveness.

And you can see it. Jesus talked about it when he often would say, look at the flowers. And when he said, look at the flowers, he meant it.

He wants you to really look and see the incredible beauty and aliveness. And if you look deeply enough, you will see that they are actually celebrating life. And this is how life is meant to be.

Humans are meant to celebrate life too, in a completely different way. They also are an expression of the divine consciousness. Now we impose our world view also on nature.

So whatever world view you have, gets projected. So humans these days say, the whole of nature is a struggle for survival, because that's their own life, that's their own mind. If you were free of that mindset that says everything is a struggle for survival, you would actually see that most of the time, nature is celebrating life.

And the moments of struggle are very short. Animals mostly live in a state of ease. When they get hungry, they might kill.

That's a very brief moment compared to most of their existence. So to carry this burden of problems, which is the mind, which gets heavier as people grow older, often the burden increases. Past gets heavier and heavier inside.

You carry a heavier and heavier burden of past. But even young people carry a heavy burden of future. And gradually, you can no longer feel life.

You can no longer feel the aliveness that is in the very depths of your being, because of the mental noise. It covers up an incredible deep sense of vitality and aliveness that is life itself. But it's covered up by mental noise.

Jesus talked about it. He said, I want you to have life and more abundant life. I want you to have more abundant life.

He didn't mean more abundant consumer goods. He didn't mean more shopping malls. He was not talking about the things in life.

He was talking about life itself, the aliveness of life itself. And if the only place where you can be in touch with that is through the stillness, underneath the mental noise, the vibrantly alive stillness, presence, underneath the mental noise. There you get, because the stillness is also a feeling of intense aliveness.

That's the place where you are connected with something much vaster than the little me. When you touch that incredible sense of aliveness, the only place in time where you can do that is now. When you touch that, a vastness of life is there.

And as you have access to that more and more, you begin to, that begins to be in your life, not just as a glimpse, but for longer periods you dwell in the state of connectedness, as I sometimes call it, connectedness with being. Where life feels good. It feels good to be alive.

This is the most simple terms I could, even a child would understand that. It feels good to be alive. But in that goodness that is life itself, out of the goodness that is life itself, things emerge.

Out of the vibrantly alive stillness that is in your very being, things emerge out of that. Thoughts may come suddenly out of it, but they will be creative, new thoughts, not the old gramophone records that you've been thinking about for 10 or 20 years. Insights, realizations come out of that, because that's the source of all creativity.

So you're touching life itself, not the manifest it was, life before it becomes something in its original form, or rather no form, the formless life that you are. That is your essence. To be connected with that is to become free of the world, of attachment to the things of the world, of grasping and clinging and needing.

And there's an incredible sense of, you suddenly know how precious you are as that life. No matter whether on the external level you are an important person or a non-important person, that's the world telling you you are important, or the world telling you you haven't made it. That has nothing to do with finding that place within yourself where you become free of that, and you no longer believe what the world is telling you, because after all, the world is insane.

And if you believe it, you believe what an insane world is telling you. If you doubt that the world is insane, pick up a history book, or switch on the news. It may not be 100% insane, but let's say 90%.

So you're allowing an insane world to tell you either that you are important and believe that, and a few years later the same world will tell you that you are no longer important. You've lost your position and somebody else is chairman of the board now. And you thought that was your identity.

And you might even have to return your American Express Platinum card. And that is painful. If your sense of identity was in that, something that is funny, really, to that person would be very painful.

My God, I'm nobody again. And I thought I was somebody. How can I survive without the Platinum card?

And then somebody else believes it when they tell you, you are no good because you haven't made it in the world. Oh, I failed. Life has treated me unfairly.

I've missed out on life. I never had a chance. Or I had a chance, but I didn't use it.

So the world telling you, the insane world now telling you, you are not important or you are nobody. Look who is regarded as important in the world. Actors, singers, whatever, politicians.

And most of them are miserably unhappy with the facade of happiness. And those are the idols of the world. So your sense of self is no longer derived from that.

And that's a wonderful liberation. What the world is telling you becomes completely irrelevant. Because your aliveness has such depth to it, you know that nobody could take that away from you.

And indeed, nobody's confirmation that your life is incredibly valuable. And self-esteem, you no longer need to tell you that you are good enough when you are in touch with the very goodness of life itself. Until then it may be helpful to have little affirmations telling you that you are good enough.

Then you move beyond when you are in touch with the very goodness of life in yourself. Then you no longer need mental concepts of who you are. And this is what Jesus meant when he said, I have overcome the world.

Not that he had any worldly power. So that is, that depth of aliveness is here in you at this moment. But you need to be open to that.

And a very helpful point of entry, and many of you are living it already, is to feel the aliveness that is in every cell of your body at this very moment. Every cell is vibrant with life throughout your being. And to feel that, to be connected with that.

You don't have to, and you'll notice when your attention moves into the body, the inner energy field of the body, I sometimes call it the inner body, but you could also call it the joy body because there is deep joy in that aliveness. When your attention is there, the noise suddenly subsides in the head because the attention has moved from the head into your being. And you are then rooted in the now.

You are rooted in your being. And it's almost as if your whole body were coming to life suddenly. That's what Jesus meant when he said, your whole body will be filled with light.

That is the light of consciousness. And then there's still plenty of consciousness left to perceive the world as you sit there and feel the aliveness in your being. You're rooted in the now.

You're rooted through that, that's the opening, that's the doorway. You're rooted in being. Everything is an expression of the divine consciousness, one form or another form.

Every organ and cell, DNA and so on, has vast intelligence that the human mind could never understand. Even in a thousand years we'll still be exploring how the body works. It's so easy to be connected with an intelligence that is greater than the mind.

Simply feel the aliveness of the inner body and you will soon come to a place of, feel there's joy there. The joy of life itself. And it doesn't depend on what's in your life as the circumstances, because circumstances come and go.

They may be negative at the moment, they may be positive at the moment. They rarely remain the same. If they're positive now, they may get negative next year.

There are constant fluctuations out there, but there is a place that is free of that. And people in prison who have written to me are practicing that, and living that, and finding an intense joy and aliveness despite the dreadful conditions of their external circumstances. So those external circumstances, I call that your life situation.

Good, bad, indifferent, it changes. You lose things, you gain things. Life situations continuously fluctuate.

And even the greatest success story eventually will move into old age, loss of beauty, or loss of wealth, or loss of the ability to move. On the external level, nothing lasts. The Buddha discovered that.

Everything is impermanent on the external level. And yet there is a place where you're free of those things. Those things can no longer influence, affect your state of being.

So you become free of the world. And it doesn't matter, if you're homeless now, you might think, okay, first I need to find a home, and then I will practice going within and going deeply into the now. Because there's a fear, which is the mind's conditioning, if I go deeply into the now now, I will be stuck in this now that I don't like that I'm in now.

That's a very subtle thing, a very subtle resistance. I don't like my life circumstances, the mind says, so I'm not going to go into the now, because I don't want to be in the now. I want to get to the future, and once I get to the future, then I'll go into the now.

Perhaps the American Express Platinum card will take me into the now. And of course, the miracle is, you do it now. No matter what the circumstances of your life are, there's no excuse for not doing it.

And the quickest way out of undesirable circumstances, homeless, even prison, penniless, or even physical condition, the quickest way out of that is to enter the present moment and connect with the vast aliveness that is there. Just waiting for you to touch it, and then that vast aliveness, you're not just practicing that when you're sitting still in your room, it's not just a meditation practice, it's a way of being. So you begin to dwell in that state of connectedness, and you will notice how suddenly there's more creativity in your life.

There are more insights, realizations of what is the right thing to do. You will wake up and suddenly know, oh, this is what I have to do. Because they arise out of that state, life itself begins to live through you and move through you.

The little person struggling to make a living or to be a success or to make it is not really needed anymore, the struggling little me. So life itself begins to move through you, and it does it much better than you could ever do. Because ultimately you are alive.

By you I mean the fictitious little me in the head. And then very quickly, life situations actually improve, because you bring to every moment that deep sense of aliveness, of being there, and you can honor this moment fully. That means immediately a sense of deep care flows into what you do, all your interactions.

When you're completely there, you give your complete attention to whatever task is at hand. And even if you were in a job that the mind tells you is boring and you want to get out of, the quickest way out of that, and you might have been stuck in it for years, thinking I need to get out of it, is to bring a different state of consciousness to it. Giving care even to the tedious things that you have to do and bring that to it.

That means the resistance to the now suddenly goes. And the resistance to the now is an essential aspect of the conditioned human mind. It is always fighting this moment in one way or another.

No, I don't want to be here. I need to be somewhere else. And that's when the resistance to the now goes, then life can move freely through you.

Then problems disappear. And of course nothing is made into a problem. Challenges still come, but you respond to them in the now.

Out of that sense of presence and aliveness you see, what can I do about this situation now? And you become still. And then action arises out of that state.

No longer the agonizing, oh me and my problems. And you never again will wake up in the morning and say, I can't face another day. It's a dreadful condition, but many humans are in that.

You will then wake up and you will open your eyes and the mind is not going to start immediately and tell you what your problems are, so immediately the burden descends on you of, oh I can't face it anymore. You wake up and immediately connect with the aliveness that is in every cell of the body and hold that state. It feels good to be alive and the mind hasn't, why does it feel good to be alive?

Because the mind hasn't started up yet and reminded you of your problems. Because underneath that it always feels good. Life is always vitally alive and beautiful.

And so life becomes a celebration continuously, not a needing to get to some future moment to become happy or become somebody or to make it. And the miracle is that everything flows with greater ease then. And you are even likely to be more successful as if it mattered.

Because whatever you do in that state is done with care and even love. You honour the now. You honour life itself.

You open your arms to life itself. That is love. That is a deep sense of care that you give to whatever arises in the now.

Yes, how can life not be cooperative if that is your state of being? And how can life be cooperative if you continuously say, no I don't want to be here. I want to be somewhere else.

Or even I want to be somebody else. So it's like being closed, resisting the now, denying the now, running away from the now. Anything but this, the mind says.

And then the shift happens. You honour life, then life can help you. It's been trying to help for years.

You just can't get through. The sun tries to shine. It doesn't mean you are big and powerful so you can keep out even life.

You are not separate from life. If you keep the shutters closed in a room, the sun just won't come in. It would love to come in, but if you keep the shutters closed, the sun doesn't really mind, but it would love to come in.

So that is the state of non-resistance to the present moment. And the most miraculous transformation of consciousness as you enter that state is there. And there is always, as we started off by pointing to the stillness, when you do not resist what is, the incessant mental noise slows down, subsides, huge gaps arise in the mind stream.

Because almost all the mental noise is continuous resistance. So you open yourself up to just this moment. That is the ultimate spiritual practice.

And nothing could be more simple, and yet it seems so difficult because of the conditioning of the mind.

This concludes Session 1. Our program continues with Session 2.

[Speaker 1] (54:47 - 1:52:38)

Session 2 with Eckhart Tolle Fear and trust can't go together. Trust is simply the absence of fear. So you cannot make yourself trust or even affirmations won't do it.

You can even repeat affirmations and put them on your bathroom mirror. I trust in life. I trust that life is supporting me.

But eventually you have to go even beyond the affirmation. And the trust arises naturally where you actually don't need any more affirmations because you're there, the reality of it is there. Affirmations are maybe a transitional stage when you haven't quite arrived at the reality of it.

Then you say, I'm wealthy. But when you have 50 million in the bank, you can take off the affirmation from your bathroom mirror. It's obvious you know you're wealthy.

You don't need to say it anymore. Bill Gates doesn't have the affirmation on his bathroom mirror. And that's only external wealth.

This is not going to save him. Even with that he cannot buy peace. But just giving that example to see when you have, when the reality is obvious and it's there, then you don't need the signpost anymore because every affirmation is a kind of signpost that points you in the right direction.

But there comes a point when the signpost isn't needed anymore because you have arrived. So that the trust, trust, when you feel you go into the inner body and then there's the first very subtle and then you feel increasingly more intensely the power, the aliveness, the stillness. And yet the incredible energy behind that.

And then you know that is actually, that is most, on the most fundamental level, that's, I am that. I am that. I am not the little me in the head.

And that is going to, that lives and acts through you. That power is there. And when you know yourself as that, that's trust.

Then you suddenly, trust is your natural state. No longer something you need to figure out how to get there. Trust is your natural state so that even the concept trust disappears because it's so natural you don't even have a word for it anymore.

Many concepts disappear when the reality to which the concept points arrives. The very mental concept of it is not really necessary anymore. I rarely talk about love, although I did this morning, but I don't talk about it too often.

It arises naturally out of the state of presence. And you don't even, you don't need to keep the concept in your head and tell yourself that I'm loving, a loving being. It's not needed anymore.

I sometimes surprised when people tell me things and I say, oh, people sometimes, because I'm kind of present and people say, oh, you're so patient. Oh, I'm so patient? I didn't know I'm patient.

I hadn't thought about it as patient. It never occurred to me that I'm patient. I didn't have this concept at all because patient still means that you're trying hard to be here.

There's some kind of effort involved in being patient. But when true patience is there, you don't even know you're patient. You're just present.

Patient still means you're half way, you're half there and half not there. You're practicing to be patient. Okay, I'll be patient for another half hour, but then I will have had enough.

So it's wonderful when all these concepts are not really needed anymore. But there is a stage when they may be helpful. There is a stage when the affirmation on the bathroom mirror is okay.

But there also comes a time when you go beyond that. You wouldn't want to be staring at a signpost. If you want to get to Rome, you wouldn't be staring at a signpost for years that says Rome, that way.

And then there are the collectors of signposts. They have a whole bunch stored up and then compare them. This compares to that one and this tradition and he said that and he said that.

And if you become a collector of signposts, then it's hard to let go because you have a precious collection. In a way, all teachings are signposts and you don't need to even identify with any particular form of teaching. There can be certain traps on the spiritual path to identify with one particular form in which a teaching comes.

And then he says, okay, I'm a Buddhist. And the other says, no, I'm a Sufi. And the other says, well, I'm a Zen Buddhist and you are Theravada.

Zen is actually superior. Again, images come in and they can be obstacles when you identify. Ego on the spiritual path can creep in at any stage.

So to look out, now ego means a new image has formed again in your mind of who you are. Ego is a very subtle thing you can observe in yourself. Comparison.

Ego likes to compare itself. Comparison is an ego device. So ego compares itself to others in a subtle way.

And whenever ego is a feeling of inferiority or superiority arises, as against others, both the feeling of, okay, I may not be as good as that person or as knowledgeable or as spiritual as that person, that's ego. Or feeling I'm more spiritual than that person, I've been practicing for longer, or my tradition is better than that person's, then that's the superior ego coming in. Even to have an image of yourself as spiritual, the ego goes into that.

Trying to live according to an image in your head, trying to be spiritual, to see yourself as spiritual, that's another ego trap. And then you become more unconscious in a way. Ego means unconsciousness has returned, and despite your meditation practice, then you find there are lots of things that if you have an image of yourself as spiritual, then there are lots of things you can't, you have to deny that arise inside you, and that would be, if you looked at them openly, they would be telling you, oh no, you're not that spiritual.

You have to push them aside. Anger, whatever comes up, if it no longer fits your self-image, you push it aside, and then it goes building up momentum like a boiling kettle, a boiling pot if I put the lid on, and the steam is building up, and then suddenly you get an outburst or a wave of depression. In Christianity, often they have tried to live according to what it's like to be a good Christian, trying hard, and anything that doesn't fit the self-image of me as a good Christian has to be pushed aside, and then you can't push it aside forever.

At some point, the unconscious will again emerge and overwhelm you as rage, as anxiety, as depression, a mood, a dark mood suddenly coming in. And so presence is to live free of self-images, because that's mind. It's conditioning.

Free of needing some image to tell you who you are. You don't really need that. And this is why I said you learn from animals, although animals have no self-image.

They are themselves. They act naturally, spontaneously, or rather, life acts through them. They have, of course, their limitations of their particular form, and yet they are more deeply connected to the source than humans in their normal state.

So, that's again, that's why it's so helpful to learn to watch an animal. It doesn't live through a self-image. It is itself.

It's a natural, the natural state. And what we are returning to is the natural, that's in India, as I sometimes use that expression, the natural state that humans lost a long time ago. So, that's wonderful.

You're returning to that. So, simply observe when some new self-image has formed, or some old self-image has returned, look so often, be aware of comparison, comparison as an ego device. In a subtle way, you're feeling better than, or not as good as.

There's the ego. Better than, not as good as. Another sign that you're living through a self-image is defensiveness.

Defensiveness arises when somebody questions your beliefs, questions a statement that you've made, doubts this or that that you associate with your self-image. So, observe defensiveness coming in. And it's always, you're always defending an image, because who you truly are doesn't need any defense.

It's so powerful, cannot be attacked, cannot be, it's totally beyond anything that could be injured or attacked in any way. It doesn't need any defenses. So, observing when it happens, when you observe it, you're no longer trapped in that unconscious movement.

When you observe that an image has arisen in your mind, and you've become identified with that, at that moment, oh, that's the, again, the unconditioned has come in. You're suddenly aware of it. When you're observing that you've become defensive about a position you have taken, may even be something spiritual, my mental position, you've identified with a position, which means an image has formed in your mind of me, and that needs to be defended.

Therefore, the Course in Miracles says, it has some wonderful statements, Whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. Whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. But the knowing is not part of the illusion, that's the beauty of it.

The moment you know that you have identified yourself with an illusion, the knowing is not the illusion. You have recognized the illusion, and in that knowing, you are free of the illusion. So, the more illusions like that you discover in yourself, the better.

Because every time you discover a mind pattern, an old mind pattern acting itself out, a self-image, defensiveness, grasping, clinging, the moment you become aware of patterns, the awareness or the knowing is not part of that. That's why it's so wonderful, the more you discover that's unconscious in you, the better. It doesn't mean that you have failed.

Discovering it is, this is how it works. To recognize it. To recognize illusion as illusion is not illusion.

You have recognized. The recognition is not part of the conditioned mind. The recognition is the unconditioned.

It sees, it just sees. So, this is the wonderful thing that means you can afford the luxury of allowing whatever arises inside you to arise. You don't have to deny anything when we do this work, if you want to call it work.

You don't need to deny anything, which you need to if you live through a self-image. Anything that doesn't fit the self-image is denied. But in this work, whatever arises, you allow it.

Emotional patterns, mind patterns arise, and there comes the recognition as they arise. When I say allow whatever arises to arise, you might ask, well, doesn't everybody live in that way? No, they don't.

The allowing implies that there is an awareness. And the awareness is not part of the conditioned. When I say allow, it implies there is a presence that observes the pattern as it unfolds, either in your head or externally as a behavior pattern when you're talking to someone.

So, just watch. The more you see, the more consciousness grows. The more unconscious patterns you discover in yourself, the more consciousness is growing.

So, it doesn't arise anymore to say, oh, I shouldn't be feeling this, I shouldn't have that thought, I shouldn't. This doesn't arise anymore. The deep, the allowing of inner states, it's a wonderfully liberating practice.

And then you know that there's no inner state that is actually you, no inner, no conditioned state is who you really are. That's why you're free to allow them. Otherwise, if anger comes, and you identify with it, oh, I shouldn't be that, I've been on the spiritual path for so many years and I'm still getting all this anger.

I shouldn't. Then you want to repress it or deny it or say, no, I'm not angry, I'm just... I'm never angry.

Don't accuse me of being angry. You are angry. The typical ego interactions.

Me unconscious, you are the one who is unconscious. And observe how mechanical defensiveness is. The mechanical nature, the condition, it arises almost like clockwork, almost automatically.

Somebody pushes a button and the reaction comes. And when people know you, after a while, if they want a reaction, they just push the button. It's like a robot.

A few months ago, I was walking in Stanley Park in Vancouver by the pond. Just an example of... I'm always watching around me because one can learn so much by simply watching people.

No, I don't mean... Animals, of course, are deeper learning, but you can learn about dysfunction by watching people. There was a man, an old elderly man, feeding the ducks with breadcrumbs.

And then two youngsters, teenagers on bicycles, 16 year old, came up. And they were wearing a badge, some voluntary workers, ecological voluntary working brigade or something. And they talked to the man who was feeding the ducks and said, Oh, do you know that feeding the ducks is actually bad for them?

Feeding them breadcrumbs because it fills up their stomach and doesn't give them enough nourishment. And he was feeding ducks. And then he said, Yeah, yeah, I know.

And he continued to feed the ducks. And then they said a bit more. And then the defensiveness came up.

He actually admitted that he knew it was bad for them, but somehow perhaps it gave him pleasure. Maybe it's the only interaction he has in life to feed the ducks. So the pleasure he derives from feeding the ducks was greater than knowing that it's actually harmful for them.

And then he said, Okay, I'm not stupid. Nobody's going to tell me what to do. I'm not stupid.

So ego reaction came like clockwork. And he started talking angrily and defending himself. It didn't make much sense because you can't defend behavior that you've just recognized as wrong.

But the ego doesn't care. It was an automatic defense mechanism. And he talked for several minutes, getting more and more angry, defending.

Now, what was he defending? A mental position, a mental image, his ego. And finally the youngsters who perhaps were present, seemed quite present or well trained at least, they said, Thank you for listening to us.

Bye bye. And then the man walked on. And I walked on and 50 yards further on I could see him.

He was again feeding the ducks. Now let's just see if presence had been there in him at that moment. Let's replay the same scenario.

He's feeding the ducks. The youngsters come, say, Do you know it's harmful? Perhaps the first statement was actually true.

He said, Yes, I know. And then he would say, I know you're absolutely right. But it just gives me so much pleasure.

I can't help it. I just feel that I need to feed the ducks. But you're right.

I'll stop now. Or I'll just give them the rest of what I have. But I know you're absolutely right.

But it's just that I love the ducks so much and it gives me so much pleasure to feed them. Now that is his true power would be arising where the ego would have said, No, you become annihilated. This is weakness.

Defend yourself. But if he had honestly expressed that, not needing to defend an image, then a true power would have arisen in him. His true power would have come forth into the ego that looks like becoming vulnerable.

Like becoming vulnerable. But it's not its true strength. And the whole interaction, the quality would have changed with it.

There might have been a true communication between two human beings, the youngsters and the old man. There might even have been love. It could have been a wonderful encounter.

But the ego didn't allow that. It needed to defend itself. People get more and more trapped in that.

And this is just a tiny example. Now imagine somebody living his whole life in that way. And most people are.

Not so much perhaps. Perhaps everybody in this room recognizes a little bit of that. Sometimes more than a little bit in their own lives.

But most people in this room are not totally, nobody in this room is totally trapped in those ego patterns. Everybody who sits here, there's some already areas of freedom where you go beyond ego opening up. Otherwise you wouldn't be here.

The ego wouldn't have allowed you to come here. Or if you had come anyway, it would have become too painful. You would have gone home by now.

Now the interesting thing, when presence, the dimension comes in and you observe defensiveness, then, oh God, there it is. And then sometimes through the simple fact of observation, you go beyond it because that's the power that is where you don't need the defensiveness anymore. And then there's the shift suddenly.

And always the mind will tell you, dangerous, defend yourself, protect yourself. So you learn by observing other human beings and then observing yourself, of course. The spiritual teaching or teacher, if it is true, says, okay, do you realize that you don't need to suffer anymore?

Are you fed up enough with suffering? Or would you like to hang on to suffering? Anybody who has come here today has already suffered enough.

Otherwise you wouldn't be here. So in a way, your suffering has been wonderful because it's taken you to this point. I know that I wouldn't be sitting here without having had dreadful suffering and pain.

So it's taken you here. And now the message that comes is, further suffering is not necessary if you voluntarily step into the new state of consciousness. You choose the kingdom of heaven.

Life doesn't have to drag you into it, kick you into the kingdom of heaven. It's painful. It did that to me.

But now my job is to tell people that you don't have to wait for that to happen to you. Choose the new state and you are able to do that. I wouldn't tell this to anybody, but not anybody comes here.

If you come here, your level of consciousness, the new consciousness is sufficiently emerged already for you to understand what I mean when I say you can choose to live in the state that is free of suffering. You can choose the state in which suffering is not possible anymore. Unhappiness does not arise.

Not a state in which you close yourself and you become, OK, nothing can touch me anymore. Protective shell, nothing to do with that, because if you have a protective shell around you, that means that all the beautiful and good things can't touch you anymore either. That's not what it is.

It's a state of complete openness, a state of such intense presence that unhappiness has nowhere to cling to anymore. Because unhappiness can only cling to a mentally made sense of self, a little me, past, which moves continuously in past and future and continuously ignores the now. So the realization that in the now there are no problems and there is no unhappiness.

And the unhappy me that lives through past and future dissolves as you become present. That's the teaching. That's the very same message that the Buddha gave 2,600 years ago and a few people got it.

And then misinterpretation started because the mind started getting in there and saying, OK, let's work this out. What does it really mean? How can we categorize it?

How can we make a system out of that? So a heavy superstructure of mind stuff arose on top of the beautiful teaching. So this always happens.

The mind tries to get in there and so the heaviness of religion arises on top of the purity and simplicity of the original teaching. And this is the simplicity of the original teaching. We are going back to that.

Freedom from pain. Freedom from pain is possible now. Now first that means you understand how pain arises.

It arises by not being present to this moment, by running away, by fighting, by denying, by running away internally from what is. So that's how pain arises. Always.

When you accept what is, the new state of consciousness immediately is present. So you can't separate acceptance of what is from the new state of thoughtless awareness. The moment you fully accept what is, the new state of thoughtless awareness is present.

The whole mind stuff is resisting what is. Its very existence, the very ground for its existence is the continuous state of resistance to what is. So resistance to what is and the old consciousness go together.

So our practice is to not resist what is and thereby access the power of life. And yet that may not immediately free you of all pain and suffering because humans have been in that state for many thousands of years and there is an energy field of pain that every human being inherits simply by the very fact that you are born into the human condition, into the unenlightened painful human condition, in ultimately mad human condition up to this point. You are born into that so every human being has a share of human pain that comes even from very...

As you are born into this world you are already born with a burden of pain. So this is a very important part of our practice and realization. This is not a facile thing of saying, OK, from now on we can all be happy.

It goes deeper than that and we are not running away also, we are not running away from the fact that in you there lives an energy field of residue of past human pain. On a personal level pain from childhood that leaves residues, energetic residues, different things, painful things that happened to you in childhood and of course far beyond that in time. But let's just talk from the level of your present existence in this form.

Pain that is carried over from your childhood and beyond and leaves, doesn't go away completely, it leaves residues of pain and energy fields, everything is energy. Then those energy fields get together because they feel, they vibrate at the same frequency. So emotional pain gathers into one mass of pain, contracted energy that isn't flowing freely, an energy that I call the pain body that humans carry inside, an energy field of pain.

And if you don't recognize that, no matter how much spiritual practice you do and even what we are doing here, if you do not see, if you do not recognize how the pain body operates, it will trick you every time and you will lose consciousness through it. So I want to address it now. So first we realize there is an energy field of pain in me that may manifest either as turbulence, anger, heaviness like depression, tightness, fear, whatever way it manifests, it's not pleasant, it's painful, it's past pain, residues, but very much alive still.

You carry it inside. But you're not always conscious of it and I talk about it briefly in one chapter of the book so we go into it a little bit more deeply now and now there's the added energy of presence that we take into the pain body. The pain body is sometimes dormant and sometimes active.

It becomes active when you suddenly feel it very strongly, when it needs to feed on further experience of pain. As it always has to do regularly, like it's a little entity almost, it needs feeding temporarily on the experience of further pain. And you will know that this has happened when a relatively insignificant trigger produces an incredible outburst reaction of pain.

A minor thing goes wrong or somebody says something or your partner does something or says something and there's suddenly a deep or even a thought comes in and suddenly it serves as a trigger for an immense arising of deep emotional pain. At that moment, the pain body, this energy field, has come up out of its dormant state. It is ready to feed on more pain.

It produces first two ways in which it... I haven't quite put it that clearly in the book. I'll explain it in the next book.

There are two ways in which it feeds on the further... because that's all it can feed on. The pain body consists of that energy of pain it needs.

Please, where can I get more pain? It feeds on your thoughts when it's ready to rise up. It will control your thinking.

It rises into the mind. And the mind, which is your thought activity, becomes aligned with the pain body. Every thought you think is destructive and painful.

And the pain body loves it. It gobbles up the energy of every thought that you think, every destructive and deeply negative thought. It eats it up, so to speak.

And it's having a good time. It's feeding. And at that moment, one way of putting it is one could say that that is the addictive quality of human pain.

Addictive because it loves its pain. When the pain body has taken you over and has succeeded in pretending that that's who you are, all your thinking is completely aligned with it. And it's feeding on it.

At that very moment, the least thing you want, the last thing you want, is to be free of pain. At that moment, pain is what you want because at that moment you are the pain body. And anybody who tells you that if I came into your life at that moment and gave you this message that a life free from pain is possible, you would hit me over the head.

Because the pain body would be there and I would be talking to the pain body and the pain body would be talking back at me. So the pain body needs to come in periodically and you all have experienced it with partners, finding the ideal partner and after a few weeks realizing that there's another side to them that periodically they become a little monster. And then thinking, oh, I must have made a dreadful mistake.

You haven't. Everybody has a pain body, including yourself. But it's a bit more difficult to see the little monster coming up in yourself.

Now, the pain body will use your thinking. It will feed on your negative and destructive thoughts. It can go on.

Now, how long the feeding time lasts of a particular pain body varies greatly from person to person. It could be a brief one, a pain body that feeds very quickly, could be an hour or two. Some pain bodies have a feeding time of several weeks, even months.

That's extreme. And in very extreme cases, there are some pain bodies that have virtually no dormant stage. They are continuously feeding and active.

But that's more rare. Much also happens. You sometimes meet people who are, and you look into their eyes and you can see the pain body is looking at you through their eyes and they are waiting for an excuse to have more...

They want you to give them a painful reaction. They want you to be angry with them. They want you to attack them.

That's people who are totally possessed by the pain body. So, level one, the pain body feeds on your thinking. Level two, the pain body feeds on the feedback of emotional pain from other people.

So, it will not only use your thinking, it might even predominantly use somebody else's reactions. In relationships, when the pain body is ready to arise and feed, it will provoke a reaction in your partner or the partner does it to you, pushes the right buttons because it wants pain. The pain body loves the drama.

This is why drama is an essential part of most relationships. The pain body needs feeding and you could be saying, suddenly it comes in. At the slightest trigger, there it is.

So, it feeds on the other person's reaction and that's where drama arises in the relationship. And it will give me more pain. Peace.

And the mind is aligned with it. So, the mind will find wonderful ways of rationalizing and it will add to it through heated discussions or shouting matches. And then the other person's pain body awakens and the two feed on each other until feeding time is over.

And the two pain bodies subside. They go to sleep, digesting food and then the relationship for a while is harmonious again. And then the cycle starts again.

So, pain body feeding on thinking, pain body feeding on other people's reactions. Now, I mentioned the unhappy me, a mind pattern that people are identified with, an unhappy sense of self. This mind pattern, when the pain body is active, becomes amplified.

It's energy, the energy of the unhappy me when the pain body moves into that mind pattern that already has been telling you your life isn't good enough and so on and you may not make it and life has passed me by and so on. Now the pain body moves into that mind pattern and its energy gets amplified ten times, twenty times, fifty times, a hundred times. In other words, the unhappy me, when the pain body arises and flows into that mind structure, the emotion flows into the mind structure, the unhappy sense of me becomes dreadfully unhappy and loves its unhappiness because that's what it consists of.

Now, all that it is, it is not a foreign body that lives in you. There's nothing that is not life energy. Even the pain body is life energy except that it isn't flowing freely.

It's got stuck somewhere. And when energy gets stuck and cannot flow freely, pain arises like a river. If a river cannot flow, water accumulates and pressure accumulates.

But it's really beautiful life energy. The water is still beautiful but there's pressure accumulating inside. That's what the pain body is.

Now, as we bring presence, this consciousness into the pain body, it can no longer fool you into completely identifying with it. The presence, as the pain arises, from now on, and many of you are already practicing that, pain arises, the pain body comes up and at that moment you will recognize it as the pain body. That's the beginning of freedom from it.

The recognition, when it comes, slight trigger, provocation, even a thought, deep pain arises in whatever form. In some people it's a very active pain, active, aggressive pain. In other persons it's a passive form of pain, poor little me, victim pain.

Doesn't matter which pain bodies have different qualities in different people. It may be turbulence or heaviness or tightness or constriction. It doesn't matter what it is.

As it arises, you will know there is a witnessing presence. And you watch, oops, there's the pain body, and you feel the energy field of it in your body. Often you can feel it in the solar plexus or stomach area, sometimes in the belly, as a dreadful sense of, oh, heaviness, or some people perceive it as a big hole, some gaping hole inside.

Or it may be intense anger. But whatever it is, you watch it. This is why sitting here is so helpful, because the witnessing presence, which is part of this new state of consciousness, gets so much strength simply by sitting in this energy field.

So the watcher will be there, watching the pain. So the pain cannot use your mind anymore. It cannot feed on your thinking because you are watching it directly.

It cannot creep into your mind and then become an unhappy me. So all that's left of the pain is an energy field of turbulence or heaviness, but the pain has not become an unhappy me, an unhappy sense of self, of who you are. That's the beginning of the end of the pain.

But our practice is allowing what is to be, and that also applies as long as the pain body is there in you, allowing the pain that is there in you also to be. That is a very powerful practice. So I'm not saying we are not fighting the pain.

We are not even trying to get rid of it. You bring the consciousness, which is a very compassionate state, of allowing what is its very powerful state. It implies you are present as the one who is able to allow.

You are the one who is able to allow the pain to be. You know you're not creating this pain at this moment because you practice accepting what is. So it's not pain that you are creating.

It's old pain. You bring the acceptance to the old pain. This wonderful state, this powerful practice, does not just concern what happens to you externally, allowing this moment to be as it is.

It includes the arising of pain in the pain body. You watch it, feel it, allow it. So you bring presence into it.

You meet the presence meets the pain body. Here's the pain body and there comes the silent space of presence. And you hold the state of presence as the turbulence happens.

Then the pain body is not replenishing itself. You've cut the link between the pain body and your thought processes. It's not feeding on your thinking anymore.

You're watching it. Now the best time to catch it and watch it is as it first arises in you. When you first notice it arising to immediately become very alert with every cell of your body and feel it.

There it is. And stay alert, stay present, continue to watch. This is the beginning of the transmutation of pain.

The more you watch, the less it can feed. It loses its energy charge every time you stay present as the watcher of it. It's not gaining new energy.

In fact, it's losing energy as the pain body but the very energy that was trapped in there as the pain body becomes part of the aliveness of who you are. Many people's life energy is to a large extent trapped in their pain body. They have little access to their aliveness because the pain absorbs so much of their aliveness and it's all trapped in there in a big unhappy me.

And nothing is flowing. There's no flow whatsoever. There's only a huge contraction.

Many human beings are one big contraction. That's amazing. The egoic state is one big contraction.

Nothing flows. And as the energy becomes freed that's in the pain body, there's an incredible increase in aliveness and vitality. And of course, pain goes.

It will not go the very first time you do it. You will have to do it many times. Many times it will try to arise again and it will arise.

Many times you will lose it. You will lose yourself in it again. That's alright.

It's all part of this. There will be times when it will take you over again. And afterwards you remember, oh, there it was and I missed it completely.

You might have gone through three hours of drama with your partner and afterwards you say, oh, that was the pain body. I missed it completely. That's alright.

Next time maybe you'll catch it and know that it's there. The good thing is that the pain body becomes actually your ally in your presence practice because without it very few people would have enough motivation to enter the new state of consciousness. Every time the pain body comes, until you know this fact, the pain body will trick you every time and you will lose consciousness every time.

But now that you know this, whenever it comes, it becomes incorporated into your practice of presence. So the more often it comes, the better it is. You're lucky if you have a strong pain body.

You're lucky. It's good for your practice. It can become a great teacher.

That is the most, actually the most powerful part of your practice is to work with the pain body and see how quickly the transmutation happens when it no longer is an unhappy me. It's simply pain. Not pleasant, but you can allow it and there's an incredible intensification of presence every time you bring it to the pain body.

Now those of you who have very dense or heavy pain bodies will need more intense presence. Most people that I know who have gone to become almost free of pain, not yet many who are completely free, but they will be, are people who have had very dense pain bodies because their motivation is stronger to be free.

...and Namaste Publishing present Living the Liberated Life and Dealing with the Pain Body. Session 3 with Eckhart Tolle.

In Eastern terms we are talking about karma. Karma really, ultimately, is all the conditioning from the past including the past pain that you mistakenly believe is who you are. Karma is to be identified with all past conditioning and to be condemned to relive and act out continuously your past conditioning.

So pain body is an important aspect of karma. So what we are addressing here is going beyond the unconsciousness that is karma. What we are talking about here is actually the dissolving of karma.

There would be no end to karma otherwise because it renews itself. That is why it is often likened to a wheel. It renews itself continuously.

This is an end to pain, an end to suffering. Use your relationships in your practice and realize that no matter who you choose as your partner, they will have a pain body. Don't look for the ideal partner without a pain body.

And that is good. Use the relationship because it is so much easier to become aware of your own pain body in a relationship than if you live alone. Great opportunity for practice.

If both of you understand how it works, you could have an agreement that you will help each other when the pain body arises in the other person so that the other can stay very, very present instead of going into reactivity. Stay very, very present. And if the partner gets taken over by the pain body, stay so present that you allow it without reacting and thinking that that's who that person is.

Allowing it. If your partner doesn't want to cooperate, you just do it for yourself. It only takes one person, ultimately, to be free.

It's great if he or she does. For many women, pain body arises as the approaching menstrual cycle comes. I mentioned it briefly in the book.

Because there is so much collective female pain. One aspect of pain body is collective human pain. Now, collective may be the pain of a nation that you belong to.

Certain nations have more of a heaviness to them than other nations. The new world has relatively less heaviness to it than the old world. Because the old world, Europe, Asia to some extent, there is so much past there.

The heaviness of past and the heaviness of past pain is very much apparent. Certain countries, you just get off the plane and if you are sensitive, you feel the energy field of the collective pain body. Eastern Europe, in many countries, you can feel it the moment you step.

Germany, I feel it the moment I step off the plane. Russia. And every individual who lives part of their pain body is the collective pain body.

Pain body is never a personal problem of yours. It's a human condition. It's your share in the human condition.

Not a personal problem. There are no personal problems. Every pain that you have in your life is your share of the human condition manifesting in a particular form.

One aspect of the collective pain body is the nation, the national. United States has some pain body but less karma. There's less karma here than European states and certainly some European states.

And even such a thing as a relatively short-lived like Vietnam War or something adds a bit to the collective pain body, the experience. 50,000 men killed in some distant country and Secretary of State at that time in his autobiography now says, well, in retrospect, it was probably a mistake. Human madness.

Just one more manifestation of human madness. But if you and some of you were actually, I know, had to go there and suffer pain there and that's fine. You work with that now.

Now there's also female collective pain body. Just as there's a male collective pain body, the female collective pain body that every woman partakes in has to do with dreadful pain suffered particularly through women being treated as slaves and as worthless property for thousands of years. Not always.

There was a time before that when women had their rightful place. But for thousands of years in most countries, women became victims of the patriarchal mind-dominated state of consciousness. So that becomes particularly pronounced when the menstrual cycle starts.

The very thing that is the femininity in you on the biological level is very painful. It awakens the female pain body just as it happens. And this is in the old traditional teachings in Buddhism they say, no, women can never make it.

They can't become enlightened because every time they go through their cycle they lose consciousness. So they say, OK, we'll have to exclude women. And they did.

And so it's become more and more lifeless by doing that. And it's become more and more mind-dominated. The very fact is that the opposite is true.

If women can use that knowing that that is the time particularly when the pain body arises and become present at that time it will be through that that women become very quickly now free of their pain body by bringing presence into especially when the pain body arises at the approaching menstrual cycle bring presence into that and become very alert watch the pain arising watch it, allow it to be be compassionate towards it which is what the allowing is be compassionate, the compassionate one who allows the pain to be and who is able to hold it to hold the turbulence the state of presence is always a gentle embracing of what is it's bringing a gentleness to it which is a very powerful gentleness bringing the gentleness to it and embracing what is and holding it in that embrace and you stay present as you hold your pain the pain and watch the turbulence of it hold it the more you hold it the stronger very quickly your sense of presence grows much much stronger as you hold the pain and the pain will slowly lessen but it no longer matters because your acceptance of the pain is so total you are not making that moment into a means to an end because I want to get to the end of my pain your acceptance of pain is complete and that's where your spiritual power lies in fully accepting it but of course now it hasn't become you, it hasn't become an unhappy me you are fully there you are fully present with it you fully accept that there is a pain body vibrating in you and you may have to hold that pain for quite a while when the cycle comes it can go on for a few days and bring presence to it you may occasionally lose it and then remember again and be present with it again by losing it I mean it may succeed in moving into your mind and control your thinking again and then suddenly you remember and you hold it, holding it so that pain becomes an incredible teacher and every time it happens you bring the presence to it that's why women are going there is always more women coming to consciousness groups than men women will move forward more quickly now than men I've seen that, I'm seeing it all the time and part of the reason is that they will be able to work with their pain bodies which up to now has looked has been a great obstacle now becomes a great help as you bring the presence to it men still are less in touch with their bodies women of course are also in the mind but men are even more deeply entrenched in their mind structures so there is a difference they of course also have pain bodies but the predominant thing for men is identification with their head the predominant thing for women is identification with pain body so these are just the focal points wonderful practice and I'd love to know those of you who have already been practicing after reading the book how you're doing and what obstacles there are where it is becoming difficult or any questions that arise out of that but it is so this practice is so easy and so wonderful and so powerful that it's amazing that it's taken humans so long to get to this point but transformation can be very quick now very quick so make your pain body into your ally your pain body is not your enemy when you make it into an enemy that's the old mind thing starting over and making even the pain body into a problem how can I get rid of it forget about getting rid of it just watch it that does it, just watch and then at first the pain seems overwhelming and the more you bring your presence to it the more you realize how powerful your presence actually is and that the pain ultimately just ripples on the surface of the vastness of who you are all human pain ultimately is surface ripples or little waves pretending to be very big waves and when you realize the vastness of your being then very quickly you realize ultimately it's just a little bit of pain but it blew itself up to gigantic proportions that's the practice of liberation it doesn't take long people ask me sometimes well how long do we have to do that for that can vary from person to person depending on the density of the pain body and other factors it doesn't really matter the practice itself is beautiful but I have seen people with extremely heavy pain bodies reducing the energy charge of their pain body by about 80-90% in two years of practicing this now that's people with incredibly dense pain bodies so that is possible it is not that you need a lifetime of practice to become or even as some traditional you will make it, you will need some teachers may tell you ok you need 5 more lifetimes or you will make it in your next lifetime or in 20 years time I will give you liberation after you have given me all your money let's ask a question if one arises is the microphone going there while the microphone travels there we are present not waiting for anything to happen

hello I am wondering how you handle when two people's pain bodies collide for example my wife who I love very deeply there is my raging pain body and there is my pain in the ass body which sometimes rages back and I am wondering how one handles that

yes now use the relationship as an essential part of your practice the pain body is not there continuously as you know it arises at times and it will start arising in one person either you or your partner be there as it arises in yourself watch the beginning of it the beginning of pain that implies I wouldn't be telling this if you did not have the necessary degree of presence to be there as the witness but you have now if only after sitting here for 3 hours there is enough presence for you to be there as the witness of the pain as it arises if you catch it at an early stage it is easier to stay present and it won't take you over if it arises so quickly and that happens in certain pain bodies whose energy field predominantly is anger anger has a fiery quality to it and an angry pain body as opposed to a heavy depressed pain body an angry pain body you have virtually no time to watch it arising because it arises like an explosion and is there fully fledged in one second so if it is an angry pain body it is very hard to watch it arising because it arises explosively if it is a different pain body a heavy one, fearful one it is easier to watch it arising and trying to get into your mind so being there as it starts the partner can be very helpful because you may already at an early stage become identified with it and start to argue and of course the arguing will already be energized by the pain that lies behind the mental rationalizations and arguments and your partner may still be present and become intensely present and watch as your pain body arises your partner watches the arising if you can't watch the arising of your own pain body which sometimes you may not be able to yet your partner can do it for you almost that's how wonderful the relationship can work your partner becomes the witness if you lose the witness your partner becomes the witness that can be a very powerful practice so what then happens if I am with a partner I can see the pain body arising and already creeping into her mind wanting me to react and enter the state of intense presence which is also a state of great openness and you feel immediately every cell of your body vibrates with life and you hold that state of complete openness and presence and you watch the arising of the partner's pain body going through the mind now it will try every trick to pull you into unconscious reaction to the pain body pain bodies have extreme cleverness your partner will try every trick it will push buttons that have worked in the past every time in making you unconscious say just the right thing that he or she knows is going to make you unconscious and give an emotional reaction and you stay present do it for them if they lose themselves in the pain body you hold the presence and watch how the pain body tries every trick to pull you into unconsciousness and that presence it emanates as an energy field around you so if you are with someone if you stay intensely present there is an emanation of presence around you it's very hard for a pain body to remain active for long in the energy field of presence even if it comes from another person now it may be that the pain body will remove itself the person will run out of the room or jump in the car and drive off or there will be a sudden and this can happen and it's miraculous in the middle of being taken over by the pain body there is an awakening and there is a sudden aware presence that suddenly is able to watch the intense pain taking place it could even happen in the middle of a shouting you are shouting at your partner and at that moment the presence arises and what that feels like is like you are an actor on stage acting out a script a very powerful script forgotten that you are acting out a script and suddenly there is a remembering that this is just acting out an acting out of a conditioned pattern and there is suddenly a watching presence there that's amazing so you help each other if the other person loses him or herself you stay present presence never means that you withdraw or protect yourself and you need to be this is why being here is helpful to become familiar with the state of presence some people mistake it for a state of aloofness when let's say you are being attacked by your partner's pain body and then you go into withdrawal it looks like this that's not presence and then even the little me can say I am beyond such I am not touched by the pain body I am beyond such unconsciousness so presence is open complete it's the allowing you allow your partner to be where he or she is it's a deep allowing vast power comes with that and again you are embracing whether you embrace your own pain or you embrace your partner's pain and you can remain in a state of love and you realize there is a movement of pain and you don't need to point it out through words that probably wouldn't work anyway at that point but also be careful that the pain bodies are very cunning it is possible that your pain body may be arising and projecting something at that moment and saying to your partner there is your pain body all kinds of things can happen but if you are present that will be fine I know of some couples who give themselves a secret signal when the other notices the pain body arising in the partner and for some that works a little hand signal but it can be sometimes it doesn't work at all when the pain body has it the pain body is already there and is being told something and of course the reactive force can be very strong one signal that definitely doesn't work that somebody suggested to me so it is helpful sometimes after you've had an interaction governed by the pain body to talk about it and see where it started where it came in first how it used the mind how it used arguments and mental positions of me being right and you being wrong how it moved into those mind structures and talk about it afterwards it is a good practice to retrospectively bring presence into an event when you got completely taken over by it so after consciousness has returned you kissed and made up and had a nice meal or whatever else you have afterwards and then talk about it that was the pain body did it start in you or in me let's trace it back to the beginning that was the beginning moment when you didn't phone me to let me know you were going to be late or you didn't put the garbage out it can start with very insignificant things so retrospectively to bring presence into the whole growth of it and then next time see if you can be present as it happens wonderful practice and whenever you lose it afterwards see where you lost it not in some kind of oh I have failed to strengthen the little me that isn't good enough no just looking at it objectively see that's where it started that's where the whole pain movement started that's good practice too so talk to your partner so you can help each other in it it makes it easier if you help each other because it's always one partner when it comes into one person the other will still be for a little while conscious so that's a great advantage next time I come let me know how it's going the mic is coming

I wanted to ask you about consciousness in children and if we can prevent them from having the pain body

oh that's a good question asking about consciousness in children and if we can prevent children from having or developing a pain body now many children absorb pain body at an early age from their parents pain body that adds greatly to some pain is already present in every human being even as they come into this world that adds greatly to the personal pain body you absorb the pain it happened my pain body grew very quickly in the first 6-7 years of my life because my parents pain bodies were both there with great intensity many homes are like that children absorb their parents pain body now of course you are asking the question for the people in this room there is consciousness moving in the most helpful thing you can do with children is to bring consciousness into your own pain body or if you live with a partner both of you do it so that you don't emanate and act out continuously pain body and then they absorb it but even those children or parents are not getting lost in their pain body they will still have a certain amount of pain and many children even 3 or 4 year olds you can often observe how an angel within a few seconds can be transformed into a screaming monster the transformation is so amazing we take it for granted that is normal this beautiful being light shining out of his or her eyes not much mind started yet the egoic me is not very strong yet so there is still a lot of being flowing through their eyes and suddenly they go into dreadful contraction and throw themselves on the floor and start screaming that's the pain body and it's relatively short lived with children because their mind isn't developed enough for the pain body to hang on in their mind for a long period of time so it goes through quickly and leaves them it subsides again quickly now the greatest thing you can do for children is to point out to them that there is something happening after an event like that a screaming fate or other children may do other things extreme withdrawal to say what happened when this energy do you remember yesterday when you had the screaming fate what happened there, who was that I see by talking, by pointing out that there was an energy movement in the child and perhaps giving it a name you can help the child to stay present and watch it as it arises you can't do it in the middle of it you'll have to do it afterwards you can't talk to a screaming monster but when the angel is back you talk to the angel and say who was that monster not to induce any guilt or anything like that but in an interested way isn't that funny, where does that come from has it got a name and then next time it happens just as it arises oh there, so and so is back you can say it even while it's happening although of course that won't wake them up at that point but a little bit of awareness will be there at that point and after it has subsided you say again oh there it was again, wasn't that funny and if you can catch the arising of the pain body in the child just as it first starts you can say oh it's coming on, can you feel it that means very quickly the witnessing presence in the child will grow and they can actually watch the movement of the pain body in themselves and that is wonderful that's something that every parent everybody who sits here can do easily so you are not trying to get rid of it it's almost like it's a phenomenon that you and the child together contemplate say wow and you have to admit openly if your own pain body has taken you over you can say do you know what that was the same thing happened in me what happened this morning you talk to the child that was mine and a point may come when the child may tell you oh there's your pain body that is a truly functional home when that happens and children can do that and they would love to be there as the watcher it's like a game, it's fun here's something to surrender to now even with something before we ask the next question even with something like that this is a minor irritation unless your pain body is ready to awaken in which fact it could be a big irritation unfortunately it's stopped now anything like that you can practice even with little irritations practice, see if you can be in complete acceptance of that what was up to this point irritating just completely allowing it allowing it totally so you work with it, whatever it is you work with it, allowing it totally and see what happens anything that you allow totally takes you into peace into the state of great peace it's amazing anything that you allow completely so the work with children is wonderful

[Speaker 4] (2:29:26 - 2:29:44)

all of us have pain bodies as you point out and most of us go to a job and I'm wondering if you can recommend ways in which we can use what we do at work

now at work usually you go into an environment that is dominated by little me's and egos and big ego structures, unconsciousness at work many big organizations are still run there are maybe a few exceptions but many organizations are still run by that consciousness, that state of consciousness so a great help is not to expect others to be conscious not to expect consciousness where there isn't consciousness you will be very often, as you do this practice for yourself you will very easily observe unconsciousness and pain bodies arising in other people at work, being acted out through their mind and it will happen continuously in some companies more than in others and it's the same practice because it's basically a relationship, it's bringing presence into relationships when pain body arises in somebody else don't go into the reactivity that would be the little me fighting somebody's pain body which can easily trigger your own pain body and you get a big argument the practice is relinquishing the reactivity of the little me so you allow unconsciousness in the other person doesn't mean you give in every time it's getting hold of the state of presence and bringing presence into your work to the conference table, to the committee meeting and as you sit there little egos having their battles all around the table you watch and perhaps for a moment you remember this moment and that brings back the state of presence and then you sit there in the state of you feel intensely connected with the body and you watch everybody's contribution without mental judgment you bring presence to the conference table to the committee meeting not the reactivity of the me where you watch and then you may find yourself making a contribution and saying something out of the state of presence and it will bring a different quality to the whole interaction there's one person there who brings in a different consciousness and then see what happens so instead of, there's nothing you can do to change others as such and most of the world still lives in unconsciousness that's how it is, don't expect it to be otherwise so it's allowing it's in the allowing people their unconsciousness this by the way also implies to your relationships with other people like long standing relationships with parents which to many people or grown up children and parents for many people that's a very problematic area because there's so much past in there there's often so much unconsciousness and dysfunction in families the most beautiful thing happens let's say it's your parents when you can allow your parents completely to be who they are you give up, which is really the little me you give up the desire to be understood by them the little me says you need to understand me they won't but you will feel a weight being taken off your shoulders there's a relinquishing of the need to be understood by your parents oh that's a relief, they don't need to understand me and then there's a letting go as this all comes with presence there's a letting go of wanting them to be different wanting them to behave differently accusing them of having done this or that or having failed to do this or that there was nobody there to have failed there was just unconsciousness in motion nothing personal in it they did what they could do according to their level of consciousness really there was nobody there to ever have done anything or not done anything it was unconsciousness playing itself out that's why Jesus said forgive them for they know not what they do when you realize they didn't know any better there wasn't enough consciousness if Jesus had lived now he would have said forgive them for they are completely unconscious that's what it means it's just unconsciousness playing itself out and then even that drops away the feeling that they should have done something differently and the more presence arises in you the more you realize nobody ever did anything to you the presence, it's only the little the identity of the little me feels hurt or injured when the dimension of presence arises presence always remained totally pristine totally pure totally fresh fresh and knew nothing ever happened to it the reality of who you are nothing ever happened to that no matter what pain was inflicted on you in your childhood as presence emerges you realize there's a dimension in you that was never touched and then forgiveness happens automatically you don't have to try to forgive as long as you try to forgive it's not really working or I should be forgiving because I'm spiritual you cannot really make yourself forgiveness happens naturally as presence arises and you feel the vastness of who you truly are beyond the little me forgiveness is just there you don't even have a word for it anymore so it's really towards all relationships whether at work or with parents between parents and children the most powerful tool is to allow everyone to be who they are which is an aspect of allowing this moment to be as it is on the canvas of this moment very often people will appear in it very often this moment will come to you as a person it may come to you as a person's pain body coming out of this at you the practice is allow it to be that's where power flows through the mind says no you can't allow it to be you should be doing something about it the most powerful transformation happens through allowing to be so when I say allow the present moment to be very often that means allow this person to be allow the unconsciousness to be there it's fine and then you will notice relationships with your parents improves dramatically when you give up the desire to be understood you don't need that anymore you realize there was nobody there who ever did anything to you or failed to do anything so you can see miraculous transformations in situations through allowing that's where the vast power comes through whether it's at work you can try it out what's coming up soon?

Thanksgiving wonderful place to practice when all the family gets together for some people it's agony having to go through that now this time see if you can bring in complete acceptance of what is, everybody around the table happens to be part of this moment then allow this moment including the turkey dinner and whatever it is people acting out their conditioned behavior you can predict what they are going to say next because they said the same thing 10 years ago allow it to be and then your next practice will be Christmas they get together again that's always a good and the ultimate test is parents you may, Ram Dass said his famous statement if you think you're so enlightened go and spend a week with your parents can you say a little bit about the intense pain of losing somebody through death, somebody who you're really close to or the pain of a marriage dissolution

yes, thank you now the pain of great loss either loss of a loved one through death or loss of a relationship which is also a close relationship is also a kind of death there may be some situations where surrendering to what is seems impossible some situations are intrinsically so painful that you just no matter, you may have been successfully practicing surrendering to what is but suddenly something happens and you just can't and intense pain arises and this is the second level of surrender the first level of surrender is surrendering to what is that's the most perfect surrender but this may not always be possible yet the second level of surrender is to surrender to what you feel so if pain arises because you couldn't surrender on level 1 to what is, it just wasn't possible if pain arises you surrender to the pain you accept the pain and that is a strange thing at first everything inside you says no, this is dreadful, I don't want the pain the pain may flow into your mind but if you surrender to the pain that can be a wonderful opening the pain of loss, deep loss feel it and accept the pain the pain that you feel so completely that almost as if there is not a person there anymore who is suffering the pain there is only the pain and there is a complete acceptance of that at first it seems unnatural to do that but as you continue to accept it and be with the pain instead of running away from it after a while something happens and the pain turns around and there is suddenly a vast peace underneath the pain which is not a denial of the pain it is only by going into the pain and allowing it you touch it suddenly whenever there is loss, whether a big loss or a little loss it is an opportunity the fabric of your existence suddenly a hole appears in it something vital is gone that is an emptiness great loss leaves a feeling of great emptiness and that great emptiness at first is deep pain because there is a reaction the emptiness is painful the reactive me reacts now if you allow the emptiness to be that is there where there was that being is gone there is a hole the winds of grace blow through that hole that is left when there is great loss there is an incredible opportunity there if you only allow it in the absence, whenever there is an absence of something that had been greatly valued it leaves a nothingness the nothingness is at first very painful as you surrender into the nothingness there is a fullness that is hiding underneath behind there and some people have done that they have lost everything all at once there have been reports of people losing their position their family and their homes all at once it is almost as if the fabric of your existence has only holes in it now and at first there was an influx of incredible unbearable pain and then there was complete surrender and suddenly there was what Jesus calls the peace that passes all understanding coming out of what was intense pain through surrender and so that when somebody dies close to you surrender to the pain surrender to the feeling of the pain and see how it becomes transformed and what happens after that there is such an intense depth of peace and aliveness, if it could speak of course it doesn't speak if it could speak it would say all is well, there is no death if it could speak that's what it feels like but you don't even need the words and it will happen to everybody some great loss will come into everybody's life somebody close to you will die another great loss will come your own death at some point will come approaching and you can see and perhaps everybody in this room by then will have already gone beyond identification with the little person and the little me and already has access to a dimension that is beyond death the reality of who you are that is beyond death I don't want to give you any belief that's why I don't want to talk about it too much we are here to experience to be the timeless consciousness the timeless state of consciousness that is beyond birth and death that is your reality and everybody else's reality it is often through pain that you have access to it and here it's an easier way but if pain is happening in your life at this time and coinciding with being here that is wonderful life has given you this at this time the two come together and that's beautiful so anything you cannot accept externally and pain arises or something whatever arises as a feeling accept, surrender to what you feel surrender to what is if you can't, surrender to what you feel about that

Eckhart Tolle Retreat Titled Allowing Presence to Arise

[Speaker 2] (0:08 - 0:22)

Two experiences I've had in the last few days are sleepiness and almost hypnotic visual sense and I was just wondering if you could comment on that.

[Speaker 1] (0:22 - 0:25)

What do you mean by hypnotic visual sense?

Just the quality of the light in the room changes and the depth perception and the closest thing that I'm familiar with to it is an almost hypnotic meditative state.

[Speaker 1] (0:39 - 15:04)

Yes, thank you. The arising presence sometimes can affect the ways in which you perceive things you might see because there's greater aliveness in your sense perceptions, they may change for a while. Some people report almost something as if they had taken acid, almost certain visual changes.

Those just accompany the inner transformation, the presence, but the sleepiness is one of the ways in which the ego protects itself against presence. And that is not uncommon for suddenly to feel a wave of sleepiness or people start yawning several times and they slept, perhaps slept well the previous night and they sit in a meeting and suddenly they go, hmm, hmm, hmm. The ego is saying, I don't want to listen to this, I'm going somewhere else.

That's one way in which also the pain body, they're intrinsically connected, doesn't like listening to this. The pain body is a little entity there. It doesn't like listening to this, it feels, oh, they're talking about me.

And even worse, they're looking at me. It doesn't want the light of consciousness on it because it needs the darkness of unconsciousness to thrive. So it doesn't, and when it does that, then it has certain strategies, certain ways and means of obscuring presence, of taking you away.

One is the sleepiness that can overcome you. Another one is, that's more rare but it has happened, pain body suddenly rises up very strongly, very quickly before it can be observed and takes over the mind. And suddenly, before there was a peaceful looking person sitting, suddenly there's an angry entity because the pain body is getting very angry.

In one meeting we had, there was intense sense of presence throughout the room. I was talking in the way I talk and suddenly from the back of the room somebody said, when are we going to start meditating? Of course the pain body didn't really want to meditate, it just wanted to get away from presence and say, okay, let's meditate, that's better, that's not threatened, let's go through some technique, at least that's not threatening.

But it probably didn't even want that, it just wanted to be unhappy about something and interrupt, just don't be here. And then I suggested that person should go out for a while, sometimes it works if you go out for a while, after a few minutes come back. And that person I saw went out, came back after a few minutes and then went back out again.

I haven't seen her since. But even in her, the presence must have arisen so the process has started. It's being obscured.

The process will continue one way or another. That's the beauty of it. And I've had, when I used to see individual people, I have encountered one or two very interesting pain bodies.

And quite often witnessed a transformation of somebody sitting there and suddenly looking into the eyes of the pain body. And the pain body demanding an emotional reaction. And trying all it can because that's what it needs.

And it demands an emotion, an emotional reaction from you. And then gets frustrated when it doesn't get it. There's simply a presence.

And then the frustration becomes too much. This particular pain body I'm just thinking of then ran out of the room, down the stairs. And I thought, I might never see this person again.

And ten minutes later he came back and said, I'm okay now. And after that session, because sometimes when I write things down after I see people or I see things that I didn't know before. I then had the expression, a pain body attack.

And then of course there's also such a thing as a mind attack. Very often they go together. So another way for the pain body to obscure presence or to take you away from sitting in that energy field, the collective field that we have here.

Feeling threatened by it. But not being able in many cases to come up because the presence is too intense. It doesn't want to come up into the light of presence.

Only a very few pain bodies have enough courage or strength to come up. So it doesn't come up, it wasn't to come up into the light of presence. So it cannot manifest as emotion.

When it cannot manifest as emotion, it can manifest as a physical symptom, as a physical pain. So some people have told me that as they sit here, suddenly there's a sharp pain here or some other symptom there. I can't sit anymore.

And then when they put some attention on it, some have told me, suddenly it shifts to another part of the body. It doesn't want to be looked at. So it can turn into...

Another way the pain body can exact revenge is by arising after this beautiful field of presence. Sitting in this beautiful field of presence and more and more presence arising in you. The pain body temporarily, so to speak, goes into a corner and says, Okay, I'll wait in this little corner.

And then when you go away, either a few hours later or a few days later, suddenly the pain body comes out of the little corner, the dark corner, and manifests very strongly. Almost to compensate for presence. I'm still strong enough to obscure presence, and I'll show you how strong I am.

Quite a few people have told me of pain body attacks after a gathering, one or two days after. At last I'm drinking some of this water. It's fascinating to watch.

So those are the main symptoms of pain body obscuring, attempting to obscure presence. Another one is suddenly a memory comes of a painful event. And there's emotion associated with that memory.

And immediately the mind starts working on it or with it. And you're off in some event that happened ten years ago. And that was dreadful.

And you wouldn't be in such a state if that hadn't happened. You wouldn't need to sit here if that hadn't happened. And so it takes you off into dwelling on painful memory.

And you're reliving the emotion. And you're not here anymore. Once you know it may happen, it's fine.

You watch it, even if it obscures presence temporarily. Then suddenly presence is back. And then you watch the pain body in motion.

Allowing remains the key. Not fighting anything, any manifestation of it. Not fighting if it's a physical pain, not fighting that, allowing that.

Even if it's tiredness, it's okay. You allow that. Restlessness, that's another one.

And you can't sit still anymore. Sometimes when people sit, I can see one person's leg suddenly starts going. They sit like this and go.

Then I know they're not here, not in the body. But there is an emotion going and it's restless. It doesn't really want to be here.

Or they go like that. And again, it's something to watch. Even very, very common things are minor manifestations of that.

For example, tapping you. Like going like this on the surface somewhere on your knee. It often is a beginning pain body.

They say, okay, I'm still patient. But not much longer. Interesting when with greater presence, there comes also greater observing what the body is doing.

The body may be reflecting pain body in one way or another. Or you feel a sudden great tightness somewhere or contraction holding in. You sometimes find it even with meditators.

They're very good at sitting still for five hours. But it's like putting a lid on a boiling kettle. Leave me alone, I'm meditating.

I'm not to be disturbed. Or even better. In Buddhism they have a meta meditation.

Meditation on loving kindness. Which is beautiful, but you spread loving kindness. It starts from yourself and then out into the universe.

And then a little daughter comes in. Leave me alone, can't you see I'm doing my meta meditation? And there's the spaciousness again.

It's always there. Even when words are being used. There it is underneath the words.

Okay, the mic is coming here to the front row.

Thank you. In various scriptures, Christ included, there's a reference to the devil and hell. And I guess even in the Hindus, there's quite a bit of the same stuff going on.

And I was reading your biography, not your biography, the interview last night that John had. And he had mentioned that when you read scriptures, when you come from the sense of presence in reading them, you get a feeling what was true and what was interpreted by someone else. And just your feeling on, because so much has been said on sin and hell.

It sounds like the pain body sounds like Satan. Yes, yes. So it just gives you a feeling on that.

[Speaker 1] (15:50 - 26:42)

Thank you. You'll be amazed if you reread the New Testament, the four Gospels, how often Jesus is reported to be driving out demons. It's almost as if every other person he meets has a demon inside.

On every page, almost, he travels to another village and he drives out more demons out of people. And so at first I didn't know that demonic possession was that common. What they were talking about is simply the pain bodies, different concepts, different words.

It is true that certain heavy pain bodies attract certain entities, disembodied fields, energy fields, because everything is energy field. The physical body is an energy field. Even a thought is an energy field.

So all kinds of energy fields. And a very heavy pain body can attract an energy field that corresponds to its frequency. Similar pain.

Just a field of pain. There's nothing spooky about it. It attaches itself to the pain body and that makes it even bigger.

But any kind of pain body, one could say, is a form of possession. And again, it's not spooky. It's just there's something there.

And Jesus was simply bringing intense presence in which pain bodies found it very hard to survive. So that's all driving out pain. We have a different word for it now.

Hell. Well, that's what the ego creates for itself. Many people already live in hell in this lifetime, self-created hell.

Human history is to a large extent self-created hell. The history of the 20th century, a lot of it could come out of Dante's Inferno. And that was very recent.

It's human-created. Ego-created. Identification with form.

Collective forms. Individual forms. Needing enemies.

Needing the separation. The conflict. Thriving on war.

On conflict. Deriving an enhanced identity through having enemies. Us.

We. Them. So those egoic structures create hell, whether it's hell here or hell in some disembodied form.

And any identification with form takes you into illusion and ultimately into hell and what one could call evil. It's identification with form. So you go away from the source into form identity.

And then there's the clash with other forms or the wanting to eliminate other forms, the form wanting to be bigger, more stronger in its sense of self. So really it all comes back to ego. Ego creates its own hell until it self-destructs.

That's the good thing. Ultimately, the hell it creates self-destructs. One creation on a collective level, on a collective scale, to see the self-destruction of ego, just to see how it plays itself out.

When you saw the rise of national socialism in Germany, the Second World War, on a collective level, a huge collective ego developed like an illness, very heavy, and then there's the collective heavy pain body cooperating with the heavy ego structures. As you know, countries have their own pain bodies. Some countries have much heavier collective pain bodies than others, countries where there has been a lot of strife and pain.

And so those countries have a heaviness that anybody who is sensitive can notice the moment you step off the plane. Russia, for example, also very heavy. Germany is very heavy.

So that heavy collective pain body awoke and the egoic structures developed of the collective ego, us, creating hell for themselves and others, finally succeeding in making everybody, North, South, East, and West, into an enemy. You remember I talked about the ego's need for enemies in one form or another. For personal ego, the enemy may be a situation I'm in.

I don't like this. This moment I don't like. When the next one comes, I don't like this one either.

So the need for enemies, and there you can think of a whole country in the grip of pain body and collective ego, needing to make every other country surrounding it into an enemy. And in that feeling, an enormously enhanced sense of self, total fiction, but enormously strong. Us against them.

We are right and they are all wrong. And then creating hell. And such hell that finally there comes an auto-destruction and the whole country went up in flames and almost nothing left of the cities.

Everything crumbles. The ego, that particular aspect of collective ego, self-destructed. So that's the, in that madness, there's fortunately something, a little time bomb concealed.

And that also works on a personal level. People who build up very strong egos associated with strong pain bodies, eventually create havoc in their own lives. And this self-destructs.

So it's wonderful, ultimately. So there's hell, and then there's the end of hell. We're coming to the end of hell.

It's been hell to a large extent for quite a long time. Temptation? Yes.

Yes, temptation is the ego not yet totally gone. The ego is still there and says, you can be very special. I'm paraphrasing the temptation that Jesus had into modern, the language that I use.

The ego saying, you can be very special. You can be the most special of all people. That is the great temptation of a spiritual teacher.

The ego coming back. It's already disappeared. Maybe a tiny bit left.

Can't even see it anymore. And suddenly, that specialness, that sense of me, I'm special, because there's such a presence and everybody's telling me I'm special, so I must be special. A return of form identity, a return of a me, a return of an image of who I am, a self image.

That is the temptation. Also beautifully expressed, I don't know whether in Buddhism there's any scripture like that or whether the director of that film just did it. There was a film called Little Buddha and it shows the life story of the Buddha, according to the legend.

And just before the enlightenment happens under the tree, first there come all these armies, they're symbols for attacks, ego attacks, arrows. And then they're all gone because he doesn't react. He doesn't react to the attacks by these vast armies, which are symbolic.

And he just allows. And then he sits and there's a moment of stillness. And then he looks into a pool of water that happens to be next to him.

And he sees reflected in it his own image, his own face. And as he looks, suddenly an arm reaches out of the pool, tries to pull him in. And he frees himself and then the image disappears.

And that, of course, is the symbol of that reflection, the reflective sense of me is the last attempt of the ego to regain power. Because ego is a self-image of me. And that was still there even at the last moment.

Me. And then it dissolved. So these are the temptations.

And so spiritual teachers have that also. The return, I would call it the return of specialness. And I've seen it a few times.

It's definitely there. The moment a statement comes that I am the one, but not you. Or at least you're not going to make it in this lifetime.

Okay, the mic is coming.

Thank you for being here. One of the most amazing experiences I've had of presence was watching wild animals in a game reserve. They were cheetahs and we happened to be very close to them.

They just had an incredible sense of presence which I'd never experienced before until I came here. There doesn't seem to be any ego, there didn't seem to be any pain body around at all.

[Speaker 3] (27:24 - 27:25)

I'd like to hear your views on that, please.

[Speaker 1] (27:26 - 35:34)

Thank you, thank you very much. And that's indeed true. I already talked about, mainly with reference to the vegetation, when I talked about nature today or yesterday, that nature becomes a teacher or teaching.

It becomes extremely helpful in entering that state of clarity that is presence. Now, animals, of course, an important aspect of that. They also live in alignment with now.

They have not yet fallen away from the source as much as humans have. They are closer to the source than humans still. In that sense, one could say that everything in nature is still closer to God than humans.

That's one way of putting it. But humans have gone out from the source a long way and they are lost, homeless, wandering about. Everything in nature is still at home in the now.

I used that expression this morning, to be at home in the now. Everything in nature is completely in that restful state of rootedness in being. It's rooted in being, in itself.

It is itself. It has integrity, which is an abstract word, but translated, really means one with itself. The split hasn't come in that is originated through self-reflective consciousness, an image forming of here I am.

That's me. That image formation that is fueled by thought, created by thought, fueled by thought, perpetuated by thought. And that with animals is not there yet.

They are pre-mind. Consciousness, yes, a beautiful expression of consciousness. So, simply to watch an animal can be a wonderful way of entering the state of thoughtless awareness.

Because by watching without labeling, without interpreting, not watching through accumulated knowledge that you may have about that animal, but watching, true watching, like true listening, is from a place of not knowing. True watching is not as, okay, that's what's calling it this, that, or that. It's in that state of awareness, clarity, you watch.

And there the cat, whatever it is, moves, stops, looks, moves on, stops, stops, lies down, eyes are closed, but it still knows what's going on. And the slightest movement and it goes. And just many artists have painted resting cats, that even the form is so perfect, how they curl up, or lie, however they lie, sometimes completely aligned with the form on which they lie.

Birds, just that spontaneous, that oneness. Watching, the secret lies in watching without interpreting in any way, or even wanting a reaction from the animal, which is what the mind wants. Unless the animal comes, you can invite the cat, or it is a cat, to come, but just be there.

If it wants to come, it'll come. If you know cats, you know that whatever you want them to do, they want to. So it can just be there.

And they may come, may not come, it doesn't matter. Any animal, particularly wild animals, even there's a wonderful dog living here, that's a teaching also, just watching a dog. The goodness that is in a dog, the unconditional acceptance, the readiness to be in joy any moment.

At the slightest excuse, the tail goes. Aliveness, joy, yes, life is good. Even dogs who live with people who are burdened by pain bodies and egoic, problem making minds, still, most of them, still manage to be sane.

It's amazing that the dogs remain sane, living in that environment. They live with a person who's, oh, it's so dreadful. And the dog is still, even that person looks at his dog and he goes, alive, life is good now.

So it's just beautiful. Any animal, watching it without labeling, without wanting anything from it. It's a beautiful meditation and presence arises with ease because mind, there's no mind there.

Now if you watch a human, not so easy to sustain presence because in most humans, there's a lot of mind. You're watching a busy mind. So you experience presence when you are watching that and then again here.

And once presence is established, then it doesn't matter anymore. You could watch an old truck and be present. Not really so elegant.

No. I will come to the written questions probably tomorrow. Everybody will receive an answer.

One or two people wanted to be anonymous and they will also receive an answer.

[Speaker 4] (35:41 - 36:25)

Oh, yeah. This question might be dumb, but I need to ask you. I have been in therapy many times and most of the therapists suggest you to get your self-esteem, to look at yourself in the mirror in the morning, look at yourself, kiss yourself, tell to yourself how beautiful and wonderful you are.

So, what do you think about mirrors? How should I approach it now that I cannot kiss myself any longer? Do you watch yourself in the mirror?

What do you think? What do you see?

Thank you. Good question. Of course, many egos are trapped in predominantly negative stories of me, that how dreadful I am and I'm no good and I can't.

And then there comes a point when you are just aware of that particular kind of conditioning. There is an arising presence when you become aware of how heavily negative your mind is conditioned. There is some presence.

And then, from there, there is a little bit of freedom where you could say, okay, I can let go of those thoughts and replace them with better thoughts, more positive thoughts. To some extent, that works. It still moves within the realm of image, so you have a better, a more comfortable egoic image after a while.

When you have had enough little notices on your bathroom mirrors to remind you that you are fine and you are good enough and so on, then after a while you live with an egoic sense of self that is a little bit easier to live with. But every egoic sense of self is trapped in the polarities of good and bad. You cannot have, as long as you live from a sense of self, continuous positivity, continuous celebration, happiness.

I'm happy all the time, continuously happy. I'm always happy, happy, happy. And that doesn't work.

If you repeat it to yourself a thousand times a day, I am happy, for a while you'd feel, oh, it feels good. But every statement you make has an unmanifested opposite. Unless unhappiness exists, you can't be happy.

Or if you make the statement, I'm wealthy, rich beyond measure, and you say it many times, it's possible that some money, maybe a lot will come, unless you sit, don't move out of your armchair, but if it's combined with action, it's possible that money, because these things, thought is powerful, it attracts, it may work. But there's also the opposite. If you make the statement, I am rich and wealthy, in the unmanifested, the unspoken statement, you're making a statement for poverty, because the two polarities, they need each other.

Unless there are poor people, you cannot be wealthy. For you to be rich requires a lot of people not to be rich, obviously. Otherwise the egoic sense of self is me, I'm rich, doesn't work.

Or if you are going to make it in the world, I am going to get there and I will make it, I'll make it. You can only make it if 10,000 other people don't make it. Otherwise making it has no meaning anymore.

So everything has an unmanifested opposite and in some way you will also have to experience the opposite. You cannot experience only on the level of mind, which is the level of manifestation, of phenomenal existence, you cannot only have one polarity. So if you affirm happiness and try to be happy every day, at some point you will be overtaken by unhappiness.

And if you affirm wealth and great wealth, at some point the stock market will crash and you experience the other extreme. So for a while it works, it's beautiful to experience that it works and then you go beyond the opposite to a place where it's no longer to do with happiness and unhappiness, but there's something that is beyond happiness and a deep sense of an abiding sense of peace. And it doesn't matter anymore whether on the surface there's a little wave of happiness or unhappiness.

There's a deep abiding, that's the goodness, I call that the goodness that has no opposite because it doesn't emanate from, it is not in the phenomenal realm. In the realm of phenomena you have the polarities. So not to be, for a while it's a person's path is to experience that yes, I can create certain things in this phenomenal world.

Even after you've gone beyond that you can continue to play with the phenomenal world because after all it is a play. If you want to make money, make some money, play with that. But it's not important to you anymore because your sense of self isn't in that.

You simply enjoy the play of form, not seeking a stronger sense of self, a me in that form. Then you can do anything. If you want a Rolls Royce, you have one, it'll make no difference and if you then lose it you'll be on a bicycle just as happy.

It's a play of form. The self isn't there that says I need that form and then is unhappy when it loses it. You lose your sense of self.

So you've moved through the stage of bathroom mirror. Laughter That's good. I'm glad you asked that question because it's many people have, would have similar question.

Thank you. Let's be still for a while. We talked about the importance of listening.

We talked about listening to nature, how important it is and you have been listening and you are listening and the deeper significance of that state of listening, that state of open attention and this surroundings here are ideal for listening. To make them even more ideal, I would suggest that this afternoon after your lunch is complete, finished, we spend the rest of the afternoon in silence. Except perhaps during the session here if there's anything to say during the session, that's fine.

Of course you don't have to do it, just a suggestion. And then listen even more. There's nothing else to do but listening to nature, the sounds of nature, more importantly, the underlying field of stillness, which ultimately is the awareness itself.

We also talked about and we practiced listening to silence. What that means is it is the arising of awareness. When we say listen to silence, an almost meaningless statement to the mind because the mind is noise, the mind is content, the mind is form, every thought is form.

We are moving beyond form to the formless, therefore it becomes meaningless to the mind. Whatever is beyond form doesn't make much sense or the mind may try to make the formless into some other form and then you create a mental idol, God, an entity as if God were an entity, a finite entity. So the significance of listening to the silence, listening all this afternoon, you'll be able to do and right now also, and then a wonderful opportunity, listening to your mind, if it's still there, not making a problem out of thought.

When you listen to the mind, it doesn't have the heaviness that it has when you identify with mind streams. All that's left when you listen to the mind is mental noise. You listen to the noise and underneath the noise there is the attention, the field of attention.

So one could say when you listen, you become aware of the listener which is the awareness, the I am, the one that's beyond this or that, beyond time. And then knowing at first hand what the power of now actually means, because that is the now. The now is the awareness, the field of awareness, of consciousness.

It's emptiness and fullness at once. And in the state of listening, the me entity, the mind mate, just isn't there. It may be dormant, it may not be completely dissolved, it may reassert itself the moment the listening is lost, the little me is back.

But when there's the listening, that's the state of being awake. Then you fall back into a kind of dream world which is to be identified with thought. And while these words happen, it's just on the surface.

These words are just on the surface, floating on the surface. What matters here is the state of listening, the state of attention, of thoughtless awareness. Whatever fills that field, whatever arises in that field, doesn't matter that much.

It's all fine. Today in the field of awareness there's a palm tree. Next week in the field of awareness arises the Empire State Building.

And it all, again, exists in the spaciousness, that spacious field. Or an old reaction arises in you, a no to what is, a complainer in the head, a waiting for the next moment, and then you listen to that, you're aware of that. So even that then just exists in the greater field of awareness, the spaciousness.

Let's sit here now and listen to a little piece that I brought that is designed for listening, a Japanese flute. The secret in listening to this is that the stillness out of which the sounds arise continuously is much more important than the sounds themselves. And the gaps in between the sounds are more important than the sounds.

The canvas, one could say, on which the sounds are painted is what matters. And so you are invited to listen to the canvas. Allow whatever is painted and what changes continuously to be there.

It's beautiful too. But continuously being aware of the underlying field of stillness. So this is a piece that was composed 700 years ago and has been used in Zen.

Listen. It requires alertness. According to the clock, it lasts for 15 minutes.

But that doesn't really mean anything. It takes you continuously into the timeless now. Feel as you listen.

Listen with the entire field of the body, not just with the ears. Your body is attentive and that's an important part of the state of listening. The attentiveness is throughout the body.

Every cell is, one could say, and I'm only, don't use it so much as a literal statement, a little pointer, only a little pointer. Every cell is in a state of alive alertness. The whole body is.

So you're listening with the entire body. If you can do it with this music, which is very helpful, you will also be able to do it when you listen to another person. That means you become the greatest therapist in the world, even if you have no label.

You bring that emanation of presence and transformation happens in that total acceptance of what is. So the entire body is alert and alive with presence in a state of listening attention.

[Speaker 3] (59:19 - 59:19)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (1:04:42 - 4:16:22)

¶¶ ¶¶ ¶¶ ¶¶ ¶¶ ¶¶ You will notice that music has no continuity in time. You couldn't, there's no tune to it that you could memorize. There's no past and future to it, no continuity from past into future.

You cannot remember the last moment and you don't know what's going to come next. It exists only in the now. The continuity in time is broken.

That's why we can, this is truly spiritual. It means no time to it. Nobody, after leaving here, is going to whistle that tune.

¶¶ Also when we, perhaps in a day or two, we may listen to another little piece. You may already have been doing that. Attention.

There's a very subtle point where the sound subsides into soundlessness, where the sound ends. The sound very softly ends and then dissolves into the silence. And that's a very, very subtle point.

It requires great alertness to see it. And one could say that's where the manifested merges back into the unmanifested. The sound is the manifested.

So listening, you can, this little practice can show you that it is possible to be rooted in the unmanifested, even while paying attention to the manifested world. Now, when you listen to a piece like that, the manifestation is reduced to just the sounds of the flute. So it's easy to see how that merges back and how it arises out of that stillness of the unmanifested.

And then in everyday life, you have not just one manifestation, which is the sound. You have hundreds and thousands of manifestations that arise within and without. And it's so easy to get lost in them, to lose yourself, to seek yourself in those things, whether they be thoughts that manifest, emotions that manifest, external events that manifest, and each one telling you, I matter.

Give me your full attention. Listen, I'm here. I am.

Wants to pull yourself into it. So then you, by seeking yourself in the manifested, in thought, what about me? By seeking yourself in the manifested or in external events that this matters so much and your whole attention flows out.

You can see when people discuss something, what are we going to do? It matters because they're lost in the manifested and no longer realize that it only matters in relative terms. In absolute terms, it doesn't.

But they have lost the absolute. We cannot lose it, but they don't know it. And it is as if you had lost it.

So when you seek yourself in any object, in any content, which is the normal state that everybody's doing, you seek yourself in what arises as object or in consciousness, a content in the head or content of your life situation. All these are objects that arise in the vastness of the, out of the vastness of the unmanifested. And then, that's, you could say, that is the world.

So there's self-seeking in manifestation. Where am I? I have to work something out in my head.

I need to know who I am. And then images form and concepts and you have to dwell on these in thought. All meaning you are lost in, you're seeking yourself in the manifested world of objects, external objects, mind objects.

And by seeking yourself in those, you lose yourself because there is no self in those things. The deep, that is the deep truth of the Buddha. The, what he called in Pali language, anatta, no self.

He said, wherever you go, whatever you do, there's no self in any of those things. You see, all conditions are anatta, no self. That's the sublime truth.

And to see, sometimes when people study Buddhism, it becomes more content in the head. But they talk about anatta, I believe in no self, more content in the head. To actually, to see the simplicity and the sublime truth of that, that you cannot find yourself in any manifested form, any content, be it external or thought content, which includes beliefs and so on.

By seeking yourself there, you lose yourself there continuously. That's the frustration of normal existence. So here, we listen to that piece and we see the world of the manifested, if you listen with attention, becomes reduced to simple sounds that arise and subside.

But that really is, everything else is like that. It's just for a little while, it's all the manifest is the simple sounds and the sound of the wind arises and subsides. And underneath, so to speak, no word is exactly correct.

And in between, there's the soundlessness, bare, pure consciousness, unconditioned, hasn't been born into a form yet, hasn't become content, prior to thought, there's that. And that is also, if you look closely, there is something in your life, although most of you have gone through tremendous changes in this lifetime, almost as if you have had, well, not everyone perhaps, but some of you, as if you had had already several incarnations in this lifetime. And yet, and perhaps the story has changed in the head of who you thought you were, and so has gone through certain transformations.

It may even be dissolving, hopefully, as you sit here for a whole week, the story begins to dissolve. And so you've gone through many changes, almost incarnations, but something remained underneath the story, an essential sense of beingness or presence, an I am, a sense of I am-ness underneath the story that is not this or that, just a sense of beingness. And that is what people are afraid of losing when they ask me, am I going to lose my individuality?

Am I going to lose this one thing that's so precious to me? I don't want to lose that. I'd rather not be here and rather suffer than lose that, than lose myself.

But the essence of individuality is that sense of I am-ness, which is beyond time, that is simply presence. No matter what happens on the surface of your life, the changing conditions, the changing content of your life, external and internal, if you look very deeply underneath it, there is I remains. And even if 10 years ago, perhaps you were a beggar and now you're a millionaire, underneath the changing content of your life, there is an I am-ness, a presence.

The essence of your being remains. Or the other way around, you were a millionaire 10 years ago and now you're a beggar. Underneath the changing story, there's an essential sense of self, but that is not the self that is mind-made.

It looks more like, this is why some traditions call it the absence of self, and it's perhaps closer to the truth than to say the self, but both are correct. They're different perspectives on the same. It's the absence of a manufactured sense of self, an artificial mind-made sense, an illusory temporary sense of, this is me, image-made.

It is beyond form, a sense of self not to do with form whatsoever. And really when people ask, I don't want to lose my individuality, what they don't want to lose is their essential being. And that's the only thing that's real that they can't lose.

Everything else you lose, but nothing really is lost. A temporary form dissolves. And this is why some people, even without ever having gone to any spiritual teaching, found that when suddenly all the forms in their lives collapsed, people who underwent disaster suddenly, dreadful disaster, everything collapsed, everything lost, all forms dissolved.

The whole me entity collapsed and suddenly a deep sense of presence or beingness, aliveness, peace. They have found their roots in the unmanifested, formless one life, what Jesus calls eternal life, which means timeless. Timeless doesn't mean it goes on and on.

It would be boring. Timeless. The timeless one life before it's born into something.

So when you identify with form, the deeper meaning of reincarnation is that every moment you identify with a new form, be it thought form, emotional form, external, I have acquired a new belief. Now the story of me and the entity, now I know who I am. Or for a while, an external form, a new relationship, I have acquired the person who is going to make me happy.

If anybody is listening to this tape at home, there's nothing wrong with the tape. So you are born into a new incarnation every time you identify with some new form. And it could just be a strain of thought and you're in it completely.

You reincarnate into that. Suddenly there's an angry thought stream. A new incarnation.

It's me. The anger asserts my identity as a self. This is why the self loves that.

Now I know who I am. And then that goes. And then you have to look for a new identity.

Okay, I'll buy a BMW. And for a little while, then you reincarnate. The ego incorporates it into its image of me for a little while.

Until after a few weeks, while you drive along, certain dissatisfaction arises again. That wasn't really it. Maybe I should try another make of car.

This is just a tiny example of that continuous seeking new sense of self, an added sense of self, a strengthened sense of self through some new identification with some new form. And all this happens. You are condemned to live like that for the rest of your life unless you know your roots in the unmanifested, formless one life.

Which is not a denial of the world of form. It's only now for the first time when you are rooted in the formless one life, which means you have access to the stillness within. Not only have access, you realize that is the essence of your being.

Then, instead of then going around and saying, I'm done with all form. I don't want to know anymore. I refuse to look at beauty and all those things because it's all temporary forms and they're all going to dissolve.

It's all dust. Some people have gone to that extreme in the search for the unmanifested. They have rejected the manifested, thinking that they will get there more quickly if they reject the manifested completely.

So, ascetic practices, extreme forms of asceticism, denial of all sensory pleasures. And so you become not interested. Whatever arises out there, you don't want to know.

Even beautiful flowers, not looking. It's dust. It will be dust again soon.

Of course, there's some truth in that. It will all be dust again soon. And yet, every form is an expression also of that manifested.

The sacredness and the holiness of the realm of the unmanifested also inhabits each form. Even the world of form is sacred. So, I don't suggest, I don't recommend that you deny the world of form.

But the more deeply you accept the world of form, whatever form arises now, the easier it is to find and to dwell in the unmanifested. So there. And then go and enjoy phenomenal existence and the beauty of it and the sacredness of it.

Even play with it, if you want to. Or leave it alone and let it happen. You might live very simply because you don't need elaborate forms anymore to strengthen your sense of self.

You might live in the greatest of simplicity and enjoy the beauty of the simple things around you. Or you might want to enjoy wealth and acquire a Rolls Royce or mansion. Simply, you enjoy the play of form.

Not to find yourself in it. Then those things are very unsatisfying. Very unsatisfying.

They're satisfying for a little moment. When there's no self-seeking in anything you do, the world of form is beautiful and you can play with form. And in your actions, the actions that arise when you're rooted in the unmanifested, you no longer create suffering through what you do.

You no longer create suffering through what you think. You can see how much suffering you create for yourself through thinking. How thinking creates unhappiness about who you are, me, what's going to happen, what has happened, what might happen, what if, what should, demand, shouldn't be, and so on.

And so, in your thoughts, even thoughts are no longer problematic when there's no self-seeking there. And then, what flows into your actions is not the neediness of seeking yourself through that and then hanging onto this or wanting to be rid of that. There's a freedom in relation to things and people around you.

You allow everything to be and when it leaves you, as it will, everything will leave you, because forms are impermanent, they come and go, then there's an acceptance because you already know that forms dissolve eventually. In one way or another, they dissolve. They leave you or they dissolve.

And that's fine. Death, even death is welcomed. And death is very beautiful because death is a form dissolves into the formless.

And the moment of death, not any kind of death, you will see the beauty of that and the sacredness of any loss in your life. This seems almost perverse, paradoxical, the total opposite of what the egoic sense of self believes, the sacredness of losing a form in whatever it may be. Because at that moment, and this is, do you remember the music we listened to where the sound, there's a little blurred edge to the sound where the sound merges into silence.

The sound goes into soundlessness. This is a death. Each time the sound dies, there's a very sacred moment because a form dissolves and in that moment, the formless shines through the hole left behind, so to speak, by the disappearing, the dissolving form.

Intuitively, deep down, perhaps every human knows that because every human have an instinctive respect for death. So in many European countries, the older traditional countries, when you see a dead body or funeral, everybody takes off their hat. They might have disliked that person intensely and yet when that person has just died, they become quite serious and go, they don't know why, they just do it.

Because they know the form has dissolved and that is why loss of any kind is so beautiful. Even a little loss like losing some money. If you can just, a moment of stillness, look at the emptiness left behind by the form instead of turning away from it and there's the unmanifested.

And originally, those humans who found that realm, originally they were no spiritual teachers. They were certain humans who experienced deep loss and somehow said yes to the emptiness left behind or they were so stunned by that loss that the old reactive mechanism wasn't operating and there was just a, ah! And even the mind couldn't continue anymore because it was stunned by the loss.

The whole machinery of mind came to a stop and suddenly they found such intense peace and aliveness arising. And the mind couldn't understand it. It said, what's that?

It doesn't make sense. Here there's death, I've lost all that and there's such deep peace. It's as if one can almost say every form hides God.

And this is why death reveals it again, reveals him, her, it. And so we welcome loss when it comes. And many of you have only begun to awaken through some loss.

So many of you have already, perhaps not fully understood how it works, but have already experienced significant loss one way or another. And that was the beginning of the awakening. Whereas before the loss, all the forms around you were intact for a while.

That was fine. But now the furniture was intact all around you and then something happened and suddenly a big gaping hole appeared in the wall. Beautiful.

So that is the sacredness of death, which is what loss is. And that's the sacredness of this moment also, because you're entering death here freely. You find death before it finds you, as it says in one of the ancient scriptures, you find death before it finds you.

What is dissolving here is not yet the physical form, that'll come a little bit later, but more importantly, the psychological form of me. And identification, it consists of identifications. So the greatest fear of the ego is loss.

The greatest fear of the ego is death. And the realm of the formless one life is what Buddhists sometimes call Amaravati, the deathless realm. Buddhists always express everything in negative terms.

They don't say what it is. They say what it is not. What it is reveals itself.

You don't need to say it, the Buddha said. So everything in Buddhism is negative. The deathless realm, the realm where there's no death.

Jesus used that the same in positive terms, eternal life. All this was already 2,600 years ago. If you had listened to the Buddha, he would have said the same things, and he did.

Slightly different words, different language. No self in any form. Anatta, every form is impermanent.

Anicca, impermanence of every form. No self in it, anatta. And identification with any form is dukkha, suffering.

That's it. Simple. No object is it.

No content is it. Or as it says in one of the ancient Upanishads, not that, I don't remember every word of it literally, but just, not that which the eye sees, but that whereby the eye can see. Know that alone to be Brahman, the eternal, and not what people here adore.

Not that which the ear hears, but that whereby the ear can hear. Know that to be Brahman, the eternal, and not what people here adore. Not that which the mind thinks, but that whereby the mind can think.

Know that alone to be the eternal, and not what people here adore. That is the ultimate truth. And let's remember to keep noble silence after lunch for the rest of the afternoon and to listen, just listen.

Thank you. Boom. When you look at something or someone without thought in stillness, who is looking?

Not the person anymore. Without thought, there isn't a person. Who is looking through those eyes?

It doesn't have to be looking. It could be anything. Listening, touching.

Who is looking? Can we have a label for it? Labels are dangerous.

I'll use one anyway. Consciousness is looking at its creation. God creates the world, it says, in the beginning of the Bible, and then he, she, it saw that it was good.

And that's what it's like when you look without thought. You're really looking at yourself in different forms. That I am-ness that I talked about this morning, that essential deepest sense of beingness that never leaves you, that is inseparable from now, that is the now, we call the now in its depth, is being itself, your essential self, your essential identity beyond form.

And then you can see the same I am-ness looking through the eyes of a bird, or you can see it in a flower. And you can even see it in so-called inanimate objects, because even a so-called inanimate object has beingness to it, it is. So it has beingness.

And any physicists would know that it is a field of vibrant energy. So what we perceive as an inanimate object isn't really inanimate. And even that, that has beingness.

And you recognize the beingness because there's stillness here, looking through the stillness. And this looking isn't necessary to recognize beingness. Beingness is beyond sense perceptions, but it can flow into that.

And then that sense of separation, me and the rest of the world, goes. Really, you are that bird. You are that tree.

And that human being, the self-recognition of being. The I am-ness. No matter how obscured it may be.

And in most humans, it's obscured by illusion, identification with form. And yet, in the stillness, you look, you see through the illusion in that other form and recognize yourself. And you could even look at a distant galaxy through a telescope.

And if you look through a telescope at the closest galaxy to ours, I don't know if those of you who are not familiar with astronomy may not be aware that a galaxy is an entire universe consisting of billions of suns, probably each with their planetary systems. Billions. Many much bigger than our sun.

And you look at that through a telescope and all you see is a little smudge of luminosity. But you know that you're looking at a whole universe. And even that, a sense of the essence of that is not separate from who you are.

You can only know that in the absence of interpretation. And what I'm now translating into language, you don't know through language. It's a deep knowing, a sensing, direct knowing.

And with that comes, that's love. When you know it as yourself, then everything you look upon or hear or feel was love. The recognition of oneness.

That's what love is. So basically what happens is what God is reported to have done just after creating the world happens when you look upon the universe in stillness. I did a good job there.

What we call evil or bad things is an ego perspective. On the one hand, it's an egoic view, an egoic interpretation of the form dissolving. It's death is perceived as bad because there's identification with form.

It's dreadful. When you only know yourself as form, death is dreadful. So that is regarded as dreadful.

So when forms die, that's regarded. Another aspect of bad or evil is suffering inflicted on yourself or other forms again due to the ignorance of being that separate form. The illusion of form creates the suffering.

So ultimately, the whole of suffering is part of that egoic illusion. But through it, humans awaken. And this is our silent afternoon, well, more or less, unless you forgot about it.

And those who wish to continue into the night are free to do so. Noble silence. And those who wish to remain in silence and continue simply in the state of listening to whatever arises, not even looking for stillness.

Looking for stillness isn't stillness. Simply allowing this moment to be and listen to what arises in the now. And watch thoughts, emotions, reactions.

So those who wish to remain until nighttime or until they go to bed can do so. And if anybody approaches you and you wish to remain in silence, you just go. And then they know that you're in silence.

And perhaps we could have one or two tables in the dining hall. We put a little notice on silent table. And then we put another notice on some other tables, noisy tables.

That makes sense. Do we need some air in here? Perhaps.

I'll address some of the written questions this afternoon. And I've received other letters that I hope to respond to with various things that may not require an answer here. So I hope to get back to everybody the next day or two.

This isn't a question really, just a reminder of something. Dear Eckhart, I have a request that is for Judaism to be mentioned in the next edition of the Power of Now. As you may know, Hilder, a Jewish philosopher, has said, if not now, when?

It's not only a then question. I appreciate your attention to this. Thank you very much.

Thank you very much. I wasn't aware that he had said that. And of course, it's a wonderful statement.

And it reminds me of what Ramana Maharshi called the essence of all religion contained in a statement in the Old Testament, which is, be still and know that I am God. Somebody read that or taught that to Ramana Maharshi, or I don't think he had read the Bible, and he immediately said, that's the essence of all religion, of all spirituality. Be still and know that I am God.

And that's in the Old Testament. A beautiful mantra followed, once it's been uttered, it's followed by that to which it points, the stillness. So once it's been uttered, allow it to take you into the stillness to which it's a pointer.

And that knowing of who you are and the essence of your being is beyond words. Another question, yes. Your marvelous book does not give any credits to J.

Krishnamurti, although at least to this reader, evidence of his influence seems to me quite clear. Could you please comment on this? Is there possibly an accidental editorial commission omission?

You give credit to David Bohm, Kay's frequent collaborator, and acknowledge Renny Frumkin in your acknowledgements. As you may have read in the introduction to the book or in an interview, when my ego, the egoic self-image and its storyline self-destructed, I had no idea what had happened. There was no understanding, there was simply peace.

So the subsequent years were spent in trying to understand the peace that passes all understanding. When I saw those lines in my endeavor to understand, although it wasn't terribly important, it would be nice to understand what this is all about. I'm at peace.

Yesterday I was in dreadful, and for many years in dreadful despair and conflict and anxiety and fear. And where does this, what is this? It's very strange.

I'd like to know. So at some point I read Jesus's words, the peace that passes all understanding and realized that he didn't understand it either. Otherwise he would have said, because it's beyond what the mind can grasp.

Nevertheless, I continued visiting some teachers, asking questions, reading. And some of the teachings or teachers I found spoke to me immediately and very deeply. There was an immediate recognition there, as if I was hearing myself and saying, oh yes, that's what it is.

And so one of them was Krishnamurti, another was Ramana Maharshi. And I remember having glanced at a book by Krishnamurti before it happened. Before it happened, my search was not spiritual, at least not consciously spiritual.

I was looking for some intellectual answer, philosophy and so on. And I had picked up a book by Krishnamurti and read a few pages, and after a while put it down and said, I don't know what he's talking about. It's like sand running through my fingers.

I read and, whoosh. And then afterwards I read again after this had happened and immediately I knew what he was talking about and the power of the teaching. So there was a strong recognition there, just as with Ramana Maharshi.

Not so much that I, they put new ideas into my head. It's rather seeing the essence, understanding the essence of all spirituality immediately. And Krishnamurti teaches in the negative tradition mainly like Justice Buddhism does.

He doesn't inspire with lovely statements. He always, he just points to what the truth is not. And in accordance with those negative traditions, just like Buddhism, once you have seen illusion clearly, then the truth stands revealed by itself.

So a negative teaching like Buddhism or Krishnamurti never puts the truth into words. 90% of Krishnamurti is like that, but occasionally he does say something positive. This is positive and negative and it's not in the everyday context.

And there were other teachings that were meaningful. Buddhism, a deep love for the teaching of the Buddha, Christ's teaching and the Christian mystics and always immediate recognition. And I love the truth, no matter in what form it comes and recognizing it shining through sometimes even heavy forms, culturally conditioned forms and yet the truth shines through.

I had originally written a chapter on various teachings and the essence contained in them, but it wasn't included in the book and it was decided to keep the book to a large extent free of too many references to other teachings because all the teachings are in there anyway and it speaks for itself. At some point, perhaps that chapter will be published somewhere else. In the meantime, and I believe in John Parker's book that is available here, I speak about Krishnamurti also in the interview.

I don't feel so much that there has been an influence by Krishnamurti as a continuation of a teaching stream, not just Krishnamurti, and I believe I talk about it in John Parker's book, that there's two streams of Ramana Maharshi which is a heart-centered stream and of Krishnamurti, which is a teaching based on recognizing the false kind of together into one. So a new stream comes, two streams come together into one. David Bohm, by the way, I didn't mention the person who wrote the introduction to my book mentioned him in the introduction.

The person you mentioned, Reni Frumkin, whom I met after she moved away from Los Angeles where she had a Krishnamurti center. Much later, I met her in a bookshop in Sausalito called the Bearded Giraffe. And then I stayed in her house in Sausalito for several months and wrote part of the book there.

That's why her name is mentioned in the introduction. And this brings me to another question that somebody asks. What other books do you recommend that are clear like yours and are a transmission?

Well, many spiritual books are written through... Many spiritual books have a screen of culture, a screen of cultural or accumulated over the years, cultural accumulations, concepts, images, beliefs. So when you read Christianity, you have to see the truth beyond the screen of the culture out of which the teaching came.

There are very few teachings that do not have the screen which sometimes obscures the truth which may be there shining, but unless you know it already deeply within yourself, you may not be able to see the truth shining through because the screen may be too heavy. The cultural screen, the screen of conditioning. So there are some wonderful works in the Christian tradition.

There are some wonderful works in the Hindu tradition and the Buddhist tradition. Relatively few that do not have the screen of a culture that has accumulated over a long period of time. Even Jesus had to use the terminology of Judaism out of which he came.

Nobody would have understood a word if he had used other words. So to communicate, he had to use that language. And so that applies to many.

So when I speak of books, then you need to take into account there are very few books that do not have the screen. The question is whether when you pick up that book, you will be able to see the truth shining through the words rather than getting caught up in the words which then becomes like a net and you're caught in this net of words. And the mind may even like it.

The mind says, oh great, I have new beliefs now. You haven't gone beyond the words. You remain on the level of words which are beliefs.

That's how religions develop without the depth of true spiritual realization. So the amazing, I'm very amazed that my book is sometimes is read by people who have studied a lifetime of spirituality and are extremely knowledgeable and they relate to it and see the truth. And others who haven't picked up a spiritual book in their lives the first time they pick up and it is meaningful to them.

How that is possible, I don't know. It just happened. And it's wonderful.

Krishnamurti of course also is free of cultural, to a large extent free of, he does not use an existing tradition to speak through. There's a very powerful book come out of India which has almost very little because it's a good translation, has very little cultural baggage because those certain concepts that are used are translated quite well in I Am That by Nisargadatta and I Am That. It's a book you don't read for information.

You just pick it up, read a couple of pages and you have enough for a few days or just half a page. It simply, it points continuously to the truth without, it's the most unadulterated book perhaps there is of spirituality. Then there are other books that have a little bit of screen and yet the truth shines through.

So if you're not adverse to this Christian tradition, some people have, they don't like it because of certain past happenings. If the Christian is not too much of a barrier to you or rather if you feel even drawn to that, then a person who uses, a teacher who uses Christian terminology but in a deeper sense than conventional church Christianity is Joel Goldsmith. And any of his books speak the truth, shining through the language of Christianity and of the Bible of the Old and New Testament.

Joel Goldsmith, any book. And then if you feel more drawn towards the Eastern or Hindu tradition, then of course Ramana Maharshi speaks very clearly with a minimum of cultural baggage, just enough he uses to be understood by his surrounding culture. But the truth shines through very clearly.

Krishnamurti, again, if you're only, if you haven't yet gone beyond mind, it's easy to get caught up in mind when you read Krishnamurti. He continuously points beyond. Once you've gone beyond mind, you can read and it goes more deeply and then it will be powerful and meaningful.

Most books by Krishnamurti were originally the spoken word and were then edited to become books. But my favorite book by Krishnamurti was actually written, a beautiful work called Krishnamurti's Notebook. And again, you can read just a page or two and it's a meditation.

For a long time, I still love it. The Course in Miracles, I used it for a while in teaching and again, there you have the medium of the Christian language looks quite old-fashioned to many people. It looks quite heavy, the terminology, the screen of words and yet it points to the truth continuously.

The Course in Miracles, again, only if you have no inner aversion to Christian language and the old-fashioned patriarchal language with masculine pronouns. If you have any other favorite books yourself that you believe other people might use, leave a note for me here and I'll look at it. It would be nice to know what books have been meaningful and powerful for you.

And of course, not to forget the source texts of the great traditions. The Tao Te Ching, the ancient Chinese work. The Bhagavad Gita, the Indian scripture.

The Upanishads from India. The New Testament and the Old Testament. Old Testament is a mixture of deep insights and cultural stuff.

So you have to see where the truth is. New Testament also, to some extent, is a mixture of spiritual truth and some cultural stuff mixed in with it. So you have to see where the pearls are and where the pebbles are.

But those are the eternal, particularly the Tao Te Ching. You read it again and again, but getting a good translation may not be easy. I've been feeling, I've felt drawn a few times to translating the Tao Te Ching.

Now this might seem strange because I don't know any Chinese. All I know is where it came from. And often when I read it, I know that's not quite it.

That's not really what he said. And at other times I say, oh yes, that's true. So we'll see.

Some Buddhist works, perhaps on Zen. There are some good books on Zen. Don't recall the titles at the moment.

A few weeks ago, I was standing on a mountain in China. And there was, carved in stone, there was some Chinese writing about this size, a Chinese symbol writing. And I asked my host, what does that mean?

And he said, oh, that means Buddha. And I said, oh, it's nice. It survived the Maoist upheavals, perhaps because it's on top of a mountain.

And then I remembered that I had asked him about various Chinese signs before. And many of the symbols, they're originally pictorial symbols. Long, long, long time ago, they were little pictures.

And then became more and more abstract. I had asked him about some others, and I had remembered then I had asked him about a sign, and he said, that's love. And then I asked, yeah, but it seems to be two symbols put together here.

And he said, that's right. The symbol on the left means female. The symbol on the right means heart.

And the two together means love. And the symbol for female originally was a pictorial with a woman with her legs crossed. You can still see that, crossed legs.

And so I remember that, and I said, but here too, there seem to be two. It seems to, the Buddha symbol also seems to consist of two. And he said, that's right.

The first one, which is a very simple symbol, goes like that. That means man, or human. And the next one means no.

And so there's the truth. I don't need to explain, because I've been talking about it for several days. Is it wrong to videotape you?

Whenever people have asked me if they can tape something, I've said yes. For a long time, the talks were not being taped on audio. And people just wanted to capture.

It's not really a need, but I honor that desire to want to capture that. So they brought little tape recorders and videos, and they asked me sometimes, and I said, yes, go ahead. And then after a while, my publisher noticed that there were all kinds of copies of copies of copies floating around and sometimes barely audible.

And she said, we need to do this properly because the form needs to honor the essence. The essence is of great value. So let's keep the form as good as we can so that the form honors the essence.

And that's also why the book was published in a nice edition hardback. It could have been published originally more cheaply. So that the form honors the essence.

My publisher said, don't you agree that the form should honor the essence? And I said, well, yes, that's absolutely true. I agree with that.

But I still can't promise you, I said, that when people ask me if they can record, that no will come out of my mouth. Yes. And then she said, well, that's all right.

Kim will say no for you. So poor Kim has to say no. But I honor your desire to capture it.

And I promise that soon there will be videos available with proper lighting and so on. And the audio tapes are now available. It's being recorded.

But I honor very much your desire to capture this. But it's already in you anyway. The essence is transmitted.

Even if you forgot every word of what's being said here during these days, even if you forgot every word, nothing would be lost. The essence would be there. And I wouldn't be surprised if you went home and somebody asked you, what did he talk about?

Well, he must have said a lot after all these days. What aspects of ourselves allows or invites the mind to be silent? Is it the soul?

What aspects of ourselves allow or invites the mind to be silent? What is it that draws us to silence? To stillness.

Well, stillness draws you to stillness. Stillness emerges. What is stillness?

The unmanifested, unconditioned consciousness. Ultimately, if you like the Istik language, God. Presence emerges.

Presence is stillness. As it emerges in its initial stages, sometimes a seeking begins, a dissatisfaction with the conditioned egoic entity, with your life. Presence cannot yet emerge.

And sometimes, we talked about this yesterday, presence builds up, builds up, and cannot yet emerge unobstructedly. And so it needs to create an opening. This is why in many of you, that's already happened.

If it hasn't happened, it may not need to happen anymore because you're here. But quite a few of you are here because something happened that cracked open the shell of egos.

The consciousness wanted to emerge, was being obstructed, and then it seemed perhaps it might have been something from within.

Furniture, the content, this is all that's me, my life. And suddenly, so what aspect of ourselves? I don't use the word soul, but essence, the essence of your being draws you to itself.

One could say it is a pull back to the source, the homeward journey. After going outward into differentiation, mind is differentiation, analysis, breaking the world up into little bits and pieces, greater and greater fragmentation and differentiation, a sign of this being the complexity of the world that we inhabit. I mean, I can't figure things out.

Very complex. So gone out from the source more and more until finally there's complete identification with form. The formless one source is not known anymore.

That is the state of poverty, of spiritual deprivation. That's the state described in the New Testament in Jesus' parables of the lost, the prodigal son, the lost son, who goes out from his father's house, demands his inheritance from his father, and then travels to a distant country, away, away, away, and spends all his wealth and becomes destitute and a beggar. Doesn't even know who he is anymore.

Just a beggar. And then comes a call. I don't know if that's actually in the New Testament, but this is an older parable, actually, that has existed in the Middle East for a long time.

And it says that a call comes from the father, which really means the source. You could say the mother, doesn't matter. A call comes, a reminder, and in the story, the father sends a messenger.

And the messenger says, don't you remember who you are, to this beggar sitting there? And no. And then, so perhaps the messenger in the story could be seen as a spiritual teacher or some spiritual teaching coming through in some other form.

And then there's the dawning of, oh. And this is when you listen to the truth and there's a readiness for being. There is a sudden recognition of, oh, yes.

Nobody needs to convince you. It's very different from mind stuff that says, you better believe me. You immediately see there's a pause.

The mind stops. There's a deep recognition that comes from a deeper level than mind. And it always says, oh, yes, that's true.

I know that. And nothing could be told you that is of true significance that you don't know. So it's whatever I've said so far, you have already known.

It is always a recognition of the truth because the truth is already known because you are one with the truth in your essence already. And that's the beauty of listening to a teaching that comes from the true place. And it's not only the words.

When the words are being spoken because they emanate from that true place of being, of oneness, the words are received and they carry the energy of that state of being or oneness. So there's more to the words than the informational value that they contain when there's spiritual discourse that comes from the true source. But normally with language, language is there to convey information.

But with spiritual discourse, it comes from a true place. The informational level is there, but it's not the most vital one. The most vital level is the energy frequency that each word carries, which is the energy frequency of the source of being.

Presence speaks, not a person. It comes out of that place. So it's new and fresh.

Even if it's been said many times before, it's new and fresh each time. It comes from that place. It carries the energy of that place.

And so the words are being received. Usually the words are being received by the mind. The mind then decodes the meaning from the sound, so retranslates it into meaning.

But with spiritual discourse, something additional happens. It goes into the mind. The mind decodes.

And then it goes on. The energy travels deeper than mind into the essence of the unconditioned consciousness itself. It's now beyond words.

It's simply being speaking to being. And there it's recognized. And this is where the power of a spiritual teaching lies.

And the same thing can happen when you read a book. And this seems strange that this is possible. You read a book that comes from that place, that was written from that place, not just through accumulated mind knowledge.

And immediately you know there is a power there and an inner recognition that isn't there when you read a book that only comes from analysis or accumulated knowledge. So that is the transformative power of spiritual discourse because that's the place it comes from. And that's the place it reaches in you.

It can happen sometimes that a spiritual teaching or discourse cannot get past the mind that is attempting to decode the sound of the words. So it gets stuck in the net of mind. The words are being spoken, goes into your ears, into the brain, into the mind.

The mind starts working on them, decoding the sounds. The meaning is there. But it's working so hard that the energy charge that is more important than the words cannot get past the screen of mind.

In that case, you would be sitting there, you could listen to the most powerful teaching and all you hear is the informational level of the words because your mind is of such density or is so hyperactive that it doesn't allow the more powerful frequency of being to go through it. So it gets caught in the net or the screen of mind. And then listening to a spiritual discourse becomes a very unsatisfying thing after a while.

The mind says, well, is that all? What else? What does it really mean?

So then it wouldn't be working. And occasionally that happens. For most of you or all of you here, if you're still here, who knows, one or two may have departed already.

And that might have been the case if it didn't get past the screen of mind. Why sit here and listen? I mean, you can read more interesting books than that on the level of information.

So that is, and then also once you, this has been activated in you, also you can save yourself a lot of time and money because there are many books that you don't need to read anymore. And you know, most of you probably are at that stage now. You can go into a bookshop, pick up a book, open it, read half a page or a page or less, maybe just a line.

And you'll know whether it has the dimension of being to it, that whether the power resides there. Somehow it got into the page. I don't understand how it happens.

And then you feel, yes, this comes from the source. Or you see, that's the mind speaking. It may still be interesting, even helpful.

It has its place, but the power, true power is lacking. The transformative power is lacking. It could give you interesting ideas, but the transformative power would not be there.

So that's good. You don't have to accumulate a vast amount of books now. You just go into a bookshop and sense, open a book, read.

And then you know whether you want to buy it or not, read it. It's beautiful how that works. It's wonderful.

And again, the same happens when you go to a talk. You might have, when I, after this transformation, I visited quite a few teachers. And quite often I went, it was announced, so-and-so is coming to speak.

And I would go and listen. A monk from here or there, Christian, Buddhist, whatever. Or a famous author from this and that, spirituality.

And often immediately after two minutes, one minute, you know, another mind. This is just the mind speaking. Interesting perhaps, but essence.

Where is the essence? Where is the being? And occasionally, yes, it's there.

And they might not even have spoken English very well. A monk coming from some distant country, only speaking broken English, and yet the essence is there. How do we set goals, work for social change, and stay in the present?

A brief answer would be not to look for salvation in the future. To do what you have to do. Let's deal with one aspect first.

Set goals for your life, perhaps. Now, when you're not present, when presence is not already here, many of the goals that you set will be egoic goals. And egoic goals promise you some kind of salvation in the future.

I need to achieve this or that in order to be someone, in order to know who I am, or so that others know who I am, or I get recognition or a sense of security through the position that I want to achieve, or whatever. The ego always compares itself to someone else, to others. So I want to rise up so that I can feel good about myself when I compare myself with others.

Self-esteem comes in here, pursued as a goal, so that I can feel better about myself. When you're in egoic endeavors, it's always an attempt to be better in some way than somebody else, or to make it. You can only make it as a goal to enhance your sense of self if others don't make it.

Because if everybody makes it, I talked about that yesterday, your ego has no food in it. If everybody were rich, let's say your egoic goal is to be rich. Let's say that you live in a country where every person is a millionaire.

Then being rich could no longer satisfy yourself, your sense of self. You would have to look for something else. So it would no longer really be a desirable egoic goal.

So the most vital thing, as far as this question is concerned, is the basis for all goals is your present state of consciousness. Some people are still trapped in distant goals that they had in the past, and they're still trying to achieve that. I know somebody who occasionally came to see me She's a wonderful teacher.

She is with children. She performs miracles with children. She goes and teaches at the most difficult schools.

And I've told her to write a book about how, through her work, children become transformed, children who have been hurt very much from very difficult backgrounds. But in her late teens, she had this idea that, I want to be famous, and I want to be a famous actress. And then in her early twenties, she went to some acting school, but then couldn't get a job as an actress, and so she became a teacher.

And a very wonderful teacher. And that's obviously where the mission, her life's purpose lies. It's there.

But what survived in her head was the image of me as a famous actress. So there was great unhappiness, because this isn't what I imagined for my life. I'm just a schoolteacher, the mind said.

I'm just a schoolteacher. That's all. I'll be insignificant.

What is all this? What are these beliefs? And then she phoned up an advertising agency, trying to do commercials, so get into the movies that way, while she was already doing wonderful teaching work.

And then she called me up and said, I've got an interview, they've selected me on the short list for an advertising spot for jeans. So she was getting close to achieving her goals. They were total illusion.

In her essential being, because she was going through transformation, otherwise she wouldn't have been coming to see me. She was already far beyond those goals that came from her unconscious past. But the mind pattern still operated.

And two days later she called me up and said, I didn't get it. I was in great pain. And finally we had a session, and there was a little bit of a breakthrough.

She saw the absurdity of that. So you can see how many goals, may even be goals from your unconscious past that are still operating in your head, that are telling you of what you need to achieve. So the basis for all goals, first of all, let's get the foundation right.

The foundation is this moment. Let's get this moment right. If this moment isn't right, no matter what goals you pursue, nothing will satisfy you.

What does it mean to get this moment right? It means to recognize the rightness of this moment. Not to do anything to get this moment right, but to recognize what is, is already right.

In other words, to become aligned with what is, instead of trying to run away to some distant goal in the future that's going to save me. So you begin, that is the foundation. Are you at home in the now?

That's the question. If you're not at home, you're not going to get home in the future, because that's not where it is. So no matter how many goals you pursue or how much you run towards the future, you won't get to home.

If you're not home, don't realize you're home already. So it's through the simple act of surrendering to what is, yes to now, completely aligned with the suchness, to use Buddha's expression, completely aligned with the suchness of now. Presence, present, not running away, completely here.

Rooted in being. And then see what happens. Something may come into your mind, arises from a deeper level, and then takes the form of an insight or an idea of what it is that you need to do.

This is what I need to do. And then action comes. But you don't do it to achieve some improved sense of self, because the sense of self is already, you've gone beyond the mind-made self in the vibrant aliveness of presence.

That's your identity. Then what operates is presence itself, no longer a little entity trying to make it. The intelligence that runs the universe then moves through.

It may move into your mind, and then the mind suddenly has a new insight. Hmm. And then action comes out of that insight and you do something.

You pick up the phone, whatever action is needed. Or maybe nothing comes, and that's fine too. I don't know what to do with my life, but it's fine as it is.

It's fine now. My life for quite a few years was very, very static. First I lived in London after the transformation.

I lived in Cambridge. I lived in London. And then I moved away from the big city and lived in the country, a very secluded existence.

Occasionally somebody would come to see me, and that went on. I had a little garden. I had occasionally a group, seven, eight, nine, 10 people once a week.

And it went, a year passed, another year, another year, another year. And sometimes the mind said, isn't there something more significant for you to do? I didn't know yet.

It was fine. I couldn't even say that I waited. It was just how it was.

And suddenly one morning, I woke up, and I knew I have to move to the west coast of North America. Why? And then I called somebody and said, I'm moving to the west coast.

What for? I don't know. But the certainty was complete.

There was no doubt. And I knew immediately I was going to do it. Just the doing that required a little bit of time to get rid of everything.

Explain to a few more people. I had to invent some excuse for my mother, who already thought I was mad anyway. And then I didn't know.

I had one superficial acquaintance in California and one acquaintance in Vancouver, both on the west coast. First thing that occurred to me when the realization of west coast came, California. I don't know why.

And this person I knew in Vancouver said, come visit me first in Vancouver and then you can go to California from there. So I booked a flight to Vancouver, arrived, quite liked it. I liked the energy field.

Stayed for more than a few days. I stayed for a few weeks, not knowing why I was there. Still sitting around, walking around.

Then went, took a bus to California. Stayed in an expensive hotel for one night, in a cheap hotel for more nights. And then I sat in a cheap hotel.

What am I doing here? The acquaintance I had, I visited her. She had a meditation group there and she said, somebody has arrived from England who needs somewhere to stay.

And the man said, he can stay at my place. I have a spare room. So I moved in there, still not knowing what I was doing.

And after a while, the mind came in a few times and said, why are you here? What are you doing? And one day, the impulse came to buy a notebook.

And then I got out of my suitcase some pile of papers that I had taken with me of little notes and writings accumulated over the years after I'd had my little groups. I'd often written things down that I had said. And I picked up a pen and a question came, which was similar to one of the questions that somebody had actually asked.

And then an answer came. And I knew after one page of writing that I was writing a book. Before all the writing over those years, I didn't know I wasn't writing a book.

I was just making notes. There wasn't the energy stream there. But suddenly, there was an enormous energy stream.

And I knew it's a book. And in the writing, the energy stream built up. And every day, I got up earlier and earlier to write.

Okay, so it was good. My days were full now. The energy stream was there.

It felt good. Then my visa ran out. I had to go back to England.

I arrived back in England, again with the writings I'd already done, sat at a desk, picked up the pen. Nothing happened. The next day, sat again, picked up the pen.

Nothing happened. And after the third or fourth day, I realized why I had to leave England, although I love England and have a deep affinity with the country. And yet, the book, the energy field there wasn't right for the book to be born.

The energy field on the West Coast was needed. I didn't know that. And then I went back to the West Coast, again Vancouver, California, Vancouver.

And no matter whether I was in Vancouver or California, the writing immediately flowed again. So when I went back after England, and it started again, then I knew beyond doubt why I had to come out. So I obeyed the impulse without knowing why.

So I had a goal, but it wasn't a very distant goal. I knew one step, and I obeyed the impulse, the realization, to take that one step. But I didn't know what would follow that one step.

I didn't demand that I should know what would follow that one step. What if I run out of money? Where am I going to stay?

What's the point? What innumerable questions the mind could have asked, because the mind wants certainty. The mind wants to control the future.

It hates uncertainty. It hates not knowing what's going on. So there comes that continuous surrender.

And with the surrender comes trust, which you cannot manufacture, not even through affirmations. No matter how many affirmations you use, you cannot manufacture trust. I'm looking at you when I talk.

You cannot manufacture. Trust comes through surrender to now, because surrender to now is the end of fear, because fear is the ego's impossible desire to control the future in some way. And it cannot.

It knows that it can't, and so there's great fear, because this future is so uncertain. Anything could happen. So what is trust other than absence of fear?

Trust. When there's no fear, there's trust. It can't be generated.

So that's all you ever need to know is the next step, and it's when you are present, you listen to what comes. And it comes. It's very different.

Sometimes people get confused when suddenly a little idea comes into their head, and then they believe, okay, I'm meant to do that. And the next day, the opposite idea comes into their head, and then there's suddenly great turmoil. Oh, maybe that wasn't right at all.

Maybe that's right. Maybe I should go there. Then you know it's just mind stuff.

When there is certainty beyond doubt, it comes from a deeper place. When there's conflicting thoughts going on, you're in confusion, that's mind stuff. And the way out of mind stuff is be here now.

Be here now. Just this. Be in the body.

Alert. Present. Recognize the rightness of this moment.

That's how you get this moment right. This is such a big question. I'll have to answer it immediately.

But not until we've had some stillness. Okay, now let's see what the question was. Yes.

Have you thought about what you want to do in the future? Best wishes? No.

Well, something like that. No. Well, I knew what places I'm going to visit in the next few months, but that's all.

So what's on my calendar that I know? But that's all I know about the future. It seems to just unfold.

But there are events that are planned ahead, a year in ahead and more. But that only scribbles on the calendar, so it's not really future. Everybody survived, I assume, the adventure tours.

A couple of people fell in the water, I hear, but survived. And everybody survived some mind attacks or pain body attacks or other forms of turbulence which happened or are still happening. That's what somebody was saying the other day, a week-long retreat is long enough for these things to arise.

And that's good. Also long enough for these things to subside, perhaps, or to be simply allowed in the spaciousness. You may remember we, on the first day, I believe, we talked about bringing spaciousness to whatever happens here.

So that means to bring a stillness even to drama, if drama should happen. There's the drama and there's the wind and there's space around it. By wind here, I meant there's the vastness and then there's the little human dramas happen in it.

When peace lasts for too long, the mind comes up and says, it's time for a bit more drama. Otherwise you'll forget who you are. You're beginning to dissolve without the drama.

Sometimes the drama is in that rest, simply played inside your mind with yourself, sitting alone in your tent. Should I have come here or shouldn't I, was it? Or what's going to happen next week?

Or something happened, somebody around you said something or did something. Old pain body stuff coming up. Pain body saying, I can't wait any longer now.

I'm coming up anyway. And maybe yesterday there were no sessions, perhaps a better opportunity for the pain body to come up. And then either you identified with it, became it, fueled it with thinking.

That's all right too. Or you brought a stillness or witnessing presence to it and simply allowed it to be there without it turning into me, a me, a self. So there's something faster than any content in your life.

The sea of consciousness, stillness. And interesting, you may have been able to observe it in yourself or others. There are quite a few people living relatively closely together here.

It's a temporary community. And that, of course, brings up reactions. And then you notice that not everybody around you is enlightened.

And that's a surprise. They all looked so spiritual when they arrived until you met them before breakfast, for example. Now the question is, is it possible to allow the reactions that happen around you, to allow them to be, or does that reaction produce a counter-reaction in you which says, whatever the reaction may be, you should be more conscious, you shouldn't be behaving like that, you should know better, you should be enlightened, in other words.

So when you react to something in someone, it's the, very often, the me wanting to gain strength through it, to defend itself. Maybe it felt hurt in some way, or diminished by something somebody said or did. And then the reaction comes.

Then the me needs to build itself up again. A typical thing is to observe it in discussions with people when you're talking and opinions are put forward. Mental positions, in other words.

And so there's one, you get entrenched in a mental position, which is what an opinion is, when your sense of self is invested in the opinion, which is mostly the case. So you're entrenched in a mental position and then you're sitting at a dinner table and somebody across is entrenched in another mental position, the opposite of yours. You express yours, and then he or she expresses their mental position.

And maybe in, and suddenly your mental position becomes shaky, which is your sense of self. Somebody dares questioning my mental position, but really me, it's an attack on me because I've identified with my mental position. That's already the mechanics of unconsciousness.

And then I need to defend myself. And then an emotion comes up with that. Let me tell you why you are wrong.

Really, at that moment, you've lost all interest in what's right or wrong. Unconsciously, your main interest is to repair or strengthen yourself, your sense of self, because it was identified with a mental position which has been questioned or in some way diminished. And that's one of the most deeply rooted forms of unconsciousness, the repair job on one's sense of self very quickly.

And it gets damaged very easily. Many situations are intrinsically, all situations are intrinsically simple because intrinsically there's only whatever is happening at this moment. But self comes in and then a simple situation becomes drama.

So you can watch when your sense of self feels diminished in some way. It's the artificially made sense of self, the mentally derived sense of self. Then either you can go into the unconscious repair job, which is the reaction to reestablish my sense of self, or, and this sounds the opposite of what the mind, the egoic mind will tell you is the right thing to do, and what's something that sounds almost perverse, but this is where you find true power, is not to go ahead with the repair job, to allow through some situation, just as an experiment, to allow the diminishment of that sense of me or self instead of building it up again through the reaction.

And it's the most simplest of situations it happens. An example, a few examples just to show what I'm talking about from recent days. Steve told me when he arrived here, he was taken to a room.

He unpacked his things and sat in meditation, and then the man who had taken him there came back and said, I'm sorry, Senor, I've taken you to the wrong room. You have to move to a tent. Potentially, it's a situation, it seems it's totally insignificant, but if that potentially is already a diminishment of me, you mean I have just unpacked and you are taking me?

Fortunately, Steve didn't do it. He allowed it to be. And said, okay, pack things again.

Very simple. It takes five minutes. Okay, where's the tent?

Go to the tent. But it could have been a little drama, your first drama. You just arrived at Pura Vida, and you already had, potentially, you could have had your first drama.

And not because of anything in the situation, but it was bound up with a sense of me, which is, how dare you do this to me? This is my place now. I've been here for five minutes.

And they're all intrinsically simple. And if you can, let me give you another fun example. And I'm giving simple examples because it operates on all levels.

On the most simple levels, the me gets damaged and does its repair job. Or on bigger levels. We may come to that.

And one of my talks, not here, somewhere else, I was told afterwards, there was one seat left in the front row, and a woman was walking towards that seat. And she was two steps away from the seat. And suddenly, from behind, a jacket came flying across.

And it landed on the seat. And a voice from behind triumphantly exclaimed, That seat is taken. And of course, a relatively simple situation.

Funny, perhaps. But again, potential for human drama. Potential for a fight over a chair.

And it could have taken a long... It could have taken quite a time to enact the drama. What do you mean, taken?

I was close. It's my chair. No, it's not.

My jacket is there. But you didn't put it there personally. It doesn't matter.

But it's not really about the chair. It's about a sense of self that feels diminished because I'm walking to it. I feel less now that I can't sit in there.

I am diminished in my sense of self in a small way. And that's how the reaction arises. And the reaction very often is out of proportion to the actual significance of the situation or the event.

Similar case in traffic. Somebody shouts at you and tells you, you're stupid, you should... where did you get your license?

And immediately, if somebody says, you are stupid or whatever they say, a repair job is immediately needed because it injures the sense of me. Perhaps you know, if you were very alert, you would know that simply this person is a driving pain body. And every minute he shouts at somebody, you are stupid.

So there's nothing personal in it. But there is an immediate instinctive reaction and the repair job that unconsciously has to be done on the me is to shout something back because that's the repair job. Because then, no, I'm stupid, you are the whatever.

And then he has to do a further repair job and that can even lead to physical violence as often reported in the papers when people drive. We are connected to the totality. So it's, this is a very deeply rooted, people have been doing spiritual work for 20 and 30 years, don't catch that in themselves when it happens.

So the secret, and it sounds almost anti-natural, unnatural, to allow, and you start to do it in simple situations. What feels like I'm less now because of this little event or big event, I feel less, I feel diminished in my sense of self. And instead of immediately building up a sense of self again through reactivity in one form or another to allow the diminishment.

That's another way of saying it's, there's a spaciousness instead of further content fighting that content. It could be a simple thing. You've put forward an opinion, somebody else put forward their opinion, you feel, oh, they may even be right.

And to then, to watch that mechanism of wanting to, the impulse to counter argue and simply watch that impulse. It doesn't have to become words. So in other words, bring the spaciousness to it.

And then perhaps the words might come, I don't know, maybe, because that may be the truth at that moment. Perhaps you feel a little bit uncertain about the opinion that you just expressed with such conviction. And then somebody presents a very convincing counter argument.

But whatever it may be, all that opinions is one area where this happens. Or it could be all kinds of events taking place where the me needs to reassert itself. And that's particularly useful in living with people because those situations arise frequently.

And we are here precisely to go beyond that limited sense of me that needs defense mechanisms, that needs to be on the defensive and really is on the defensive all the time. That's why A Course in Miracles beautifully puts it, whenever you become defensive about anything, it says, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. And the illusion is the illusory sense of self.

Because your true being doesn't need a defense mechanism. So at first it looks like weakness when you don't do the repair job. When you allow the diminishment of your sense of self.

Perhaps watch the impulse to repair it and let it pass. That takes you beyond that sense of self. And there's enormous strength underneath that.

But to that sense of self, you have adopted the narrow position of weakness. This is the same truth that in symbolic language, Jesus talked about when he says, turn the other cheek. It's not a literal statement.

It's the state of non-reactivity. So before you live in that state of non-reactivity, which is you've gone beyond the me needing its defense mechanisms and continuous repair jobs. For a while, perhaps you observe the deep seated impulse to repair your sense of self and let it pass.

And you haven't died. I have a half brother who is 20 years younger than me. And so when he grew up, although we weren't living in the same place, I would see him often or occasionally.

And I could see the ego growing when he was 15, 16. And I observed something, an ego characteristic, particularly strongly in him, which was the inability ever to admit that he didn't know something, which is also to bound up with a growing sense of me, that me, I know. We've been talking about knowing and not knowing.

Again, the need, the me needs to, I know. It's dreadful for the sense of me to say, I don't know. Of course, that's where we are going.

And so I observed whenever anybody asked something, he couldn't say, and if he knew nothing about it, he would invent the most absurd explanation just to give an answer to say, I know. And one day I suggested to him, I said, do you want to try a little experiment? When somebody asks you something and you're not really sure, try saying, I don't know, and see what happens.

And he looked at me and, what's he talking about? And I said, I'll remind you when it happens. I'll raise my finger.

And the situation came a day later and he was just about going into some fantasy explanation about something. And he said, okay, I don't know. And I waited a moment and then said, you're still alive?

You haven't died? Because to the ego, it's a little death to say, I don't know. Another beautiful illustration of that non-reactivity, a story I've told a few times, some of you may know it.

The Zen master who had quite a high reputation in Japan, lived in a town. One day was accused by a 16 year old girl who gave birth to a baby of being the father of her baby. She told her parents when they asked her, who is the father?

And finally she said, it's the Zen master next door. So the parents ran to the Zen master shouting and saying, she just told us that what you did, you are the father. And they told everybody in the town and they brought him the baby and said, we don't want this baby, it's yours.

You look after the baby. So when they first, they came to him and told him, you are the father, she just told us. And all he said, he listened and all he said was, is that so?

Yes, and here's the baby, you look after the baby. Oh, is that so? He lost his reputation.

They all, because he didn't defend himself and there was, you know what gossip is in the town. He did it, if he weren't the father, he wouldn't have accepted the baby. That's obvious, isn't it?

The people said, yeah, of course, he must be the father. So he must be a fraud all along and we've been going to him for years. Stories, stories, talk, talk.

And in the meantime, he looked after the baby. Every day he would feed the baby and nobody came to him for teaching anymore. It didn't matter because his sense of self wasn't in any external content.

It was not bound up with content, his position, his mental image of who he was or other people mental images of who he was. His sense of self was derived from the power of this moment, the aliveness, the simplicity of there is no problem. He has a beautiful little baby and I'm feeding a beautiful little baby.

Where's the problem? And so for a year, he had no more disciples but a little baby. And after a year, the mother grew a bit, became more mature and saw what she had done and she confessed to her parents that he was not the father, but the boy next door.

And so the parents came running to the Zen master again and said, oh, we're just terribly sorry. She just confessed to us that you are not the father. So we now realize that you're not the father and she said, oh, is that so?

Yes, can you forgive us? Can you forgive us? He didn't even know what they were talking about.

Forgive? What for? If there's something to forgive must mean there was a big resentment beforehand but there hadn't been any so there was nothing to forgive.

And so both when they accused him and when they took back that and realized the words used is that so, those words point to the spaciousness in which everything is allowed to happen. Rather than being caught in the event and the content, he was, he is the spaciousness. So the words is that so are just symbolic.

They point to the sowness, the isness, the suchness, which is accepted, which is when it is accepted, then you are the spaciousness rather than getting caught up in what happens in it. And then the parents said, okay, now can we have our baby back? Okay.

And he said, yes, here it is. And that baby had a good start in life. And again, there was no clinging to it.

Oh no, this is my baby. What do you mean have it back? I've been looking after this baby for one year.

I've had all the difficult times and now you want the baby? Okay. You can see the, in the, I have had all the difficult, I have done, I have been feeding it, I've been cleaning, I have been, and now you, I.

So that's good to witness in oneself. And when you, you will be amazed what strength there is when you relinquish the impulse to repair your sense of self. Even in small situations, in a little way, you become nobody through that.

You become as nothing. Now, sometimes life does something to demolish the sense of self in a bigger way. Even, let's say, and even a relatively minor illness begins to demolish once the sense of self importance of me.

The most self important little me becomes reduced to a little worm just by two days of acute diarrhea. And you have to crawl to the toilet every 20 minutes. And so something, it's hard to sustain illness, to sustain a me in a situation like that.

And that's only a minor thing. So for quite a few people, illness is a great teacher, potentially may not always be accepted as a teacher. There's the potential for the demolishing of one's sense of self importance of me.

What comes then is a humility, which simply means egolessness. Because there are certain illnesses which are prolonged, in which it's hard for the sense of self importance to survive an acute condition like that. Sometimes it does, in quite a few cases it does.

And the very potential for this situation to become a teaching or a teacher is transformed into its opposite. It can enhance the sense of me also when it is resisted continuously and you become bitter and angry about what life has done to you. Then that condition, which is potentially liberating becomes the opposite and you form an even more encapsulated and deeply entrenched me than before because you become bitter and angry about how miserable you and your life are.

And you become angry at the whole world and God or whatever. So the two are possible. Potentially it's the teacher or it could become the opposite and be turned into an even stronger sense of self, a predominantly miserable, very unhappy, deeply unhappy me.

With every illness, whatever kind, the potential is there for eroding the sense of self. And I have met some people who have grown through, grown rather, diminished rather than grown, grown in consciousness through an illness that became their main teacher. And sometimes I watch people without even talking to them and I see what already, the transformation that they have already undergone.

I saw last year somebody, I was sitting in a cafe somebody came, wanted to come through the door in a wheelchair and somebody opened the door and the man came, a relatively young man in a wheelchair, perhaps AIDS or whatever condition. And I looked into his eyes and they were bright and luminous. There was no unhappy me.

And that's all I needed to see, to know that it had worked. The future didn't really matter anymore. Is he going to survive?

He's made it already. The flowering of consciousness has already happened. Sometimes then healing of the physical also happens.

At other times it may not happen. Miracles do happen very often when that opening occurs, but they're not expected. They may happen.

It no longer matters. You don't need the miracle, but when you don't need it, it often happens. But it no longer matters.

Similar situation. How a severe illness can demolish the self, the sense of self. When I was at university, I had lunch always in the same hall and there would always be a man sitting at a table next by and they would wheel him in in a wheelchair.

He was always accompanied by four or five people and they wheeled him in and I observed him a few times and he had a very severe physical condition with gradual paralysis of all parts of the body except the mind. And he already even had no control over his head and his head was always slumped down. And he had to be fed by one of the people surrounding him and half the food would always fall out of his mouth so another person had to hold a serviette.

And everybody knew him. And when I first arrived, I asked, who is he? And they said, he's a professor of physics.

And then he wasn't that well known outside the circles of that university. So I observed him very often and thought how can this amazing life inflicting such almost unbearable illness on a person? It's so dreadful.

And he couldn't speak anymore. He could only produce croaking sounds which one person was able to interpret. Nobody else could.

And one day I opened, I was coming into the building and he was just coming in in his wheelchair and I opened the door for him and I looked into his eyes and he looked into mine and also there I saw the absence of suffering when I looked into his eyes and I was amazed. I said, he's not suffering. There was simply clarity.

Clear. And then I realized that he had surrendered. Perhaps not 100%, but there was already deep surrender.

And so I would see him every day and then for many years, I finally abandoned academic world completely. And he stayed. And many years later, he had become world famous.

And many years later, I saw his picture on the cover of Time or Newsweek magazine and it said, Master of the Universe. So his thinking became very creative. He did a lot of thinking, but he had, there was an absence of a sense of self.

So the thinking that he did was not self-seeking thinking. It was simply, there was lots of insights because there was surrender. So it was inspired.

So they now regard him as the world's greatest physicist. So you can, and at that time when I was inquiring about his condition, they said that was 20 years ago or so. He's been given two years to live.

So miracles do happen. Later, many years later, I also came across a little biography of his in which was quoted something from an interview he gave. Stephen Hawkins, his name.

He gave an interview and I remember the line he told when he talked about his life. He said, could anybody wish for more? So that's how, when it's anything that's accepted deeply, anything, any condition, and especially if it seems at first sight unacceptable, the more unacceptable and it's accepted, the deeper it takes you.

And what could be more unacceptable than that? So it is amazing, isn't it, that there's a connection between that to be inflicted by life with a dreadful illness, that there's a connection between that and the chair and the person throwing the jacket on a chair and saying, that's mine, that's taken, it's not yours. There are two ways.

There's one seemingly tiniest insignificant way and the other a huge one that life has of demolishing the sense of self. Or again, do you remember driving in the traffic? There's a similar mechanism at work.

So our job then is simply to allow the diminishment of me when it happens in its most insignificant forms, to allow it. If you cannot allow it directly, to observe the impulse not to allow it and let it pass through and then allow. Failing that, you can wake up after the event and see how you just completed your repair job and you triumphantly left the room before the other person could question further and you were right.

You left the room at the moment of establishing your rightness and said, okay, and you slammed the door and then suddenly you say, oh, there it was. The repair job is complete. So it may happen that that impulse is observed after the event and that's fine.

That is often the case that with unconscious patterns that the waking up happens after they've occurred because the impulse was still too powerful to wake up in the middle of it. You became it. And after it subsided, the waking up happens.

Oh, yeah, I did it again. That's all right. At least now you've woken up and you can see it.

There it was. Be watchful there that not a further layer of problem making comes in and then condemn yourself for having done it again. And that also strengthens your sense of me.

You see, again, I have failed. And if you have failed, that can also become a me. I have failed again.

You see, I can't do it. You can't do it. So with any unconscious mechanism, as more consciousness arises, often you will wake up after it's happened and look back on it.

And that's fine. And then you wake up just after it happened. First you wake up maybe 10 minutes or an hour after it happened.

And then you wake up, it's just happened and you say, oh, I did it again. All right. At least you are awake now.

It's enough. All you ever need is to be awake now. There's no need to be awake a minute ago.

And you may wake up in the middle of it. That's possible too. You just, the argument, the heated argument or the self-defense, words are pouring out of your mouth in a stream of mind.

And suddenly there's a witnessing presence. The true witnessing presence, of course, doesn't have a face. But if it had a face, there would be a slight smile on it.

If there's not a slight smile on it, it's already become mind again. That's all that the Buddha image symbolizes is that state of consciousness. And that's why this is the hint of a smile usually on the Buddha's face.

So you wake up in the middle of it. But it may be too late to stop it. The words continue to come out of your mouth because it's pre-programmed.

Nothing you can do about it. Let them come. But now you're no longer completely in them, this witnessing.

So they will lose, finally they exhaust themselves and they go, zoom, zoom, zoom. That's good. And then the next stage, you can actually observe the impulse before it becomes verbalized and translated into action, external action of some kind, whether it's through words or hitting somebody over the head in this case of more acute unconsciousness.

So you observe the impulse. So it's allowed to be and by observing it, you can feel it flushing through. And it's gone.

It passes through when it's observed. And then you are suddenly in no man's land where you're not defending yourself. You're not, you don't need it anymore.

And that's a new dimension. Wow. And it's characterized by a feeling of spaciousness and peace and aliveness.

And that's there because you have allowed the diminishment of me. Without resisting it. So you've gone beyond that limited self.

And the vast power of being, of consciousness, of presence, is there. It's a moment of self-realization, one could say. When the little me has been diminished and it's been accepted, not repaired, and then there's a moment of true realization.

It feels good. And in its extreme form, the image of Jesus on the cross points to that because it's simply an archetype for humanity, for every human's evolutionary path, ultimately. When you look at it at first, you say, how strange.

Why would anybody want to have that as a holy image? If you looked at it from one point of view, it looks absurd or perverse that there's this man being tortured on the cross and people pray to it. There is, however, a truth embedded in that which at the time people were not ready, they would not have been able to understand it, to listen to it in such a pure, unadulterated form in which the truth is being transmitted here.

So it was encapsulated into a mythical image which is really that state of total diminishment of self, a state that seemingly is a state of complete helplessness from the point of view of me, a state of complete, total surrender and becoming nobody, being, so that's the, it's contained, there's a wisdom contained in that image. It's the death of me, the death of the self, of becoming nobody. Who could be more insignificant than this human nailed on a cross becoming reduced to that?

And then symbolically, the cross also points to the transcendence and to incredible power. Now, that symbol may not work for you anymore. It doesn't, you don't need it as such because, but you know the truth directly, but it's a beautiful symbol and it's really, it's about every human, every human's evolutionary path.

You are that. So, it has also worked in some way for certain people who were living in that cultural environment. to simply say, I don't, I suffer with Christ, to say I suffer, it's not, I submit to this because I'm crucified together with Christ.

Anything that takes you to surrender works, it doesn't matter. And, you can also observe and interact living at close quarters with people. You may be able to observe the need for self-assertion simply through words coming out of your mouth and the energy field with which the words come out of your mouth.

Without the spaciousness, you're completely in the mind stream when you're discussing, it may not even be a discussion, it's just, without, without the underlying stillness or spaciousness, just completely in the stream of mind. You remember we talked about the standing back after a sentence, after you've uttered, made a statement, to come to an end of the mind stream, step back into stillness for a few seconds so that you don't get caught in the stream of mind. And sometimes you may catch yourself, it's like the river, yes, many of you were on the fast flowing river yesterday, stream, and once you're in it, how do you get out?

You're in this, the current is pulling you along and the mind is even more, the current is even stronger than the strongest river current and you're in it and suddenly you watch, wow, you watch mind, that's enough, you just watch, that means the spaciousness is coming in through the watching. This is such wonderful work, or work isn't the right word, of course, and that no man's land that you go into, when the diminishment of self is allowed, that's presence, that's the I am that is underneath, I am this, I am that, I am this, I am that, a deeper sense of I am-ness. But you can't grasp it, it's not, you can't hold it, it's not an object in consciousness, everything else is an object in consciousness, little me, that's the one thing that is no thing, the one thing that is not an object in consciousness, but consciousness itself, the one thing or no thing that matters.

Let's listen to a little song, if Kim has it. Yes. Try track three, if I remember correctly.

Okay.

[Speaker 2] (4:17:38 - 4:21:01)

In the heart of everything that I see Behind the eyes Beyond the skies Reflecting me It's not a call Yet before a horror phenomenon begins Oh, I never end I never really end Many differences Separate us on the surface yet But I cannot find A boundary In a conscious head When you ask me Where does awareness begin and does it end I have to say Always been Within the body Without the body I'm subject to Changing moods States of health Points of view Without means Before the deeds and the monuments of man Oh, I never end Many differences Separate us on the surface yet But I cannot find A boundary In a conscious head When you ask me Where does awareness begin and does it end I have to say Always been It's not a call Yet before a horror phenomenon begins Oh, I never end Never really Oh, I never end

[Speaker 1] (4:24:00 - 6:55:28)

We talked about this morning not to resist when one's sense of self feels diminished by some event or what somebody says to observe that feeling of becoming less perhaps observe the reaction against that feeling of now being less and it could be a simple thing as simple a thing as somebody shouting at you in the traffic saying you're stupid it's the simplest of situations but the same mechanics operate on all levels not to resist that feeling of now being less if that's not possible to observe the reaction against that it might arise so quickly that there's nothing you can do about it just observe that and then the reaction is designed to reinstall that lost self a small aspect of self that's been taken out grown smaller, diminished what I called earlier the repair job now something to add to this the egoic reaction against a diminished sense of self in some people it is not an outward reaction there are people who seemingly are timid and they don't react on the surface out of fear so it sometimes looks as if they had reached that stage where they don't need to react to build up that diminished sense of self whereas in fact the reaction is turned inward and there is an even tighter egoic contraction connected with fear the little me gets even bigger although it looks very small and meek if out of fear I do not react I feel diminished in my sense of self but because of fear there's no reaction and fear is the contraction it is a more something tightens within and what looks like or perhaps on the surface somebody who has transcended sense of self may not be the case but has a very strong egoic image of a fearful little me just as strong an ego as the big one just turned inward question may arise whether it's possible to go from that contracted egoic little me self whether a transition is possible immediately from there to allowing it may be possible if sufficient presence arises for that egoic self contraction fearful self contraction to be recognized by being recognized anything that you see and accept fully will change but to see and accept it fully that's the quickest way that virtually requires no time alternatively you can have a transitional period in which you express and openly do the repair jobs by shouting back or whatever it may be and observe that and then transcend that but any sufficient presence anything that is even the fearful self contraction it can be watched so there's never what I've been describing this morning there's no fear if fear is present that's of course not it that's still ego and the wonderful thing is how rapidly you transcend fear through you're driving a big bully in a truck shout something at you and I'm choosing the simplest of situations it operates on all levels all that's happening there's sounds coming out of his mouth there's sounds coming out of his mouth that's alright and then perhaps if the sounds are decoded by the mind then the mind says oh he's talking about me and what that means he's talking about me is the mental image of me he's like taking a hammer and chipping away at the mental image of me as the intelligent and clever one and he's calling me stupid so it's that inner alertness this is why it's so helpful to be sitting here because here the alertness rises the level of alertness of presence rises and that will help you when this alertness is both within and without and next time somebody shouts just and he might think you're deaf or something and he'll shout even louder that means more sounds coming out of his mouth I assume you're not forgetting to walk around in a state of listening attention around all this beauty that alert openness and to be aware of what arises the beauty that arises in it and aware of the alert openness itself underneath so to speak awareness being aware of itself that is the field of peace I've said it before just remind us if you are only aware of what arises and that is one level of being present is to be present completely then you might feel sorry in a few days time when the beauty all that beauty isn't there anymore and you just have buildings or freeways and there might be a sense of loss but not if you discover the essence of all existence as the underlying field of awareness itself which is just as beautiful and peaceful and still in the middle of a freeway in LA or wherever the same beauty unmanifested is there and here this beauty manifested and then even the freeway has its beauty let's look at some questions thank you so much for all your letters wonderful to read them here is a short big one is there free will do we have free will first there is the illusion of free will that everybody is in they are acting out their conditioning egoic conditioning pain body all the deep seated human conditioning including all the reactive patterns we've been talking about including the one we talked about this morning the defensiveness of one's sense of self all the goals associated with the ego need to be more fully itself to be bigger to be more secure to be somebody to become somebody to combat the egoic sense of self to combat its deep seated insecurity and fear and so that all those seemingly leads to many actions and decisions arising and they all think that's me acting that is what I want pursue this pursue that or afraid of this afraid of that going into relationships acting out deep seated egoic patterns in relationships and then one ends another one starts the same patterns being reenacted again pain bodies and obviously they all think I choose I choose the partner I choose and there is no choice there is only mechanicalness like a script one has memorized and forgotten that it's a script and you're forced to act it out and it's a human script there's not even anything personal in it it's a script of the conditioned human consciousness the conditioned human mind and obviously there's no free will there there's only the illusion of free will and then all that in all that suffering grows suffering there's more and more suffering generated by the illusion of free will and the actions arising out of the illusion of the egoic me and then suffering reaches a certain intensity and then there's a beginning of an awakening of what goes on inside me all the conditioning some presence arises through the suffering the beginning of an awakening and the first signs of a witness a witnessing consciousness appears being aware of your thought patterns being aware of pain body rather than being it knowing it watching it and so one could say this is the beginning of freedom coming in and then presence grows and all the conditioned me entity begins to dissolve transmuted not really dying nothing really dies the form of the me dissolves all the energy the life energy trapped in egoic forms and in the pain body becomes transmuted all transmuted into greater presence and then action is possible that is not conditioned it arises out of the unconditioned creativity is possible something new can come into being which before was not possible because you are condemned now something new can come into being that is not conditioned by past a new creation a new thought form can come in love, aliveness, joy arise and you emanate that action can take place that is not to do with your past and now is that free will free will ultimately presupposes that there is such a thing as an autonomous completely independent entity there but what operates there is no autonomous completely independent entity there you are connected with the totality you are simply an expression of the totality of consciousness expressing itself temporarily in that form so you are not really autonomous when you take away the illusion of autonomy then even there one could say it is the realm of freedom but it is not the freedom of the entity it is the freedom of the totality the totality is acting through you you are aligned with a vaster and deeper movement of consciousness in whatever decisions or realizations or causes of actions or whatever speech arises out of that comes out of the totality of being of consciousness so the only free will is the free will of consciousness itself as long as you have a form the form does not have free will neither in the state of unconsciousness nor in the state of realignment with the totality because now the totality moves through you compared to the previous state it is a state of freedom yes and a state of newness but even there to say there is free will would not be quite right because there is only the one acting through you so what is the ultimate answer yes and no let's surround every question and every answer with space spaciousness in other words always stepping back into stillness after hearing of your difficulty of finding a restaurant that was not noisy I decided to eat at a table that observed silence during mealtime eating took on a new dimension I actually tasted my food and used the physical sensation as a means of coming into the now much like any other sense like listening can do that's the first part I'll come to the second in a minute of course that's true any activity can become a vehicle for presence to flow into and eating is interesting at when you observe people eating quite a few people become quite unconscious when they start to eat because it's a primordial activity a very our ancestors eating started a long time ago and it's kind you revert back to a kind of primeval activity and I can often observe people even people who at other times are relatively conscious the moment they put something in their mouth their level of consciousness goes to a relatively low level and then when that's finished it rises again it's interesting to observe you can first see it in others and then with more alertness perhaps occasionally in yourself so particularly something like that that is often tends to be unconscious can be a good vehicle for presence so the very activity that usually would pull you into unconsciousness can then allow presence to flow into and that would be the same with becoming aware of your breathing which is usually unconscious which is a beautiful vehicle for presence to couple your alertness with the in and outgoing breath so the alertness follows the breath a very ancient meditation the alertness follows the breath so there is the basically you're reducing the manifested world to just the breath and bring attention to that and it subsides and it contains in microcosmic form the whole universe is there because it's the outflow and the in going breath and the outgoing breath the in going is birth maturation maturity and then finally it subsides and becomes the outgoing it's a form every time you breathe out it's a form of letting go it's a form of death it's the cycle comes to it's conclusion of life and there's a beautiful point at the end of each out breath that is very still when you haven't started breathing in yet so there's a great beauty in simply bringing presence to your breath and presence arises through that so bring it to your eating breathing is there of course all the time you're taking in food continuously on that level and it's a half way between voluntary and involuntary functions you couldn't stop your breathing completely you can hold it a little bit breathing eating also you probably you could stop but it's half involuntary similar all kinds of tantric practices to do with bringing presence into sexuality which otherwise would pull you because it's again like eating maybe even earlier even more primordial than eating is the pull towards sexuality and which usually means unconsciousness it's something takes over and you bringing presence into that beautiful meditation to what? to be alert bring the alertness to it so that it's no longer a desire movement reaching it's end needing to get to the final orgasm conclusion so to even it's starting a similar thing to have a sexual feeling arises and simply to watch it it's beautiful in itself it doesn't have to become a desire movement that means you bring presence into it so there isn't the so on all levels everything can become a vehicle but particularly those things that usually would be a pull into unconsciousness pain body also so food don't need to become the first one you become when you bring presence into eating there's a self consciousness sometimes around it there's an image of okay I'm eating now I'm chewing it's not presence yet it's the mind telling you what you're doing but you're maybe some presence is coming in a second but now the mind is telling you okay I'm chewing three four five six seven eight beginning perhaps of presence arising and then suddenly the mind becomes still and the eating is happening and now eating is usually a means to an end that's why it's so unconscious and it becomes that every thing you put into your mouth is sufficient an end in itself eating is no longer than a means to an end sex is no longer a means to an end it is an end and now is not reduced to that perhaps we could add another silent table tonight some more people maybe wanting I've also one request of being having total silence to last two dinners well let's see how it goes put perhaps one or two more silent tables and then those who had silent tables can practice the beautiful allowing the noise to be there and still have the silence second part of this I thought that it would be wonderful if there would be a restaurant where silence was honored by all patrons it would be an opportunity to not only eat in peace but for the mind to be peaceful as well and even temporarily transcended what do you think of this idea do you have any suggestions on a practical level might you know of anyone who would want to make a financial investment in such a venture why not could be very successful particularly in a big city in New York somewhere downtown it's a silent restaurant so leave your name with Kim and then they can put you in touch if anybody wants to make an investment further advice piece of advice is to get a good chef too but the two together could work oh yes and present waiters and waitresses it give you full attention be wonderful hint of a rainbow over there and There's a question here, which is quite helpful, useful. Many people will have a similar question.

Before the question, just some comments on your work. I find the content of your work reminding me of the work of the following men, Paul Brunton, Vernon Howard, Leonard Jacobson. I've read some Paul Brunton, Leonard Jacobson.

I haven't read Vernon Howard. I've read some Vernon Howard. Vernon Howard is, I like very much, very helpful.

There's a nice little book to add if you have a list of books. I don't know if it's still in print. I saw it some years ago.

Treasury of Positive Answers by Vernon Howard. Just little series of questions and answers. It contains the essence.

I've heard from devotees of the person usually that it is important to spend as much time in the physical presence of a teacher as possible. This would put people who are more limited in their physical or financial abilities at a spiritual disadvantage, it seems. Paul Brunton said, what is important is to be in the physical presence of the teacher at least once, and then it doesn't matter that much.

I could, assuming space, it doesn't matter that much, period. I could, assuming space is available, be at all your extended workshops or retreats, but would be wondering if it were necessary or if it were even being wasteful. But I would still want to be there if it's helpful.

Should one seek, should I seek to be with my spiritual teacher at every reasonable chance, or is there a point of diminishing returns? Good point. Where it is only marginally important or might even be counterproductive in that it serves to strengthen the earnest seeker identity.

In some ways, the question already contains its own answer. It's true that it can happen, that the seeker, me, the seeker, can become an identity, a nice, comfortable identity the ego likes, and it can, there's an accumulation of spiritual knowledge, perhaps acquired over the years, and I value that and I can discuss all discussions about it and look for new teachers, perhaps, or continue to see my teacher. I did mention the other day that once presence has began to arise, the process is not reversible.

In that sense, I don't know if it was Paul Brunton, whether he said it, yes, I believe, you only need to be with a teacher once because if the openness is there, then something happens at that one meeting if the openness is there. However, if you can be with a teacher more frequently, that would be helpful. Nowadays, we have the advantage of having tapes also, which has almost been the presence of the teacher.

We have books and videos. Well, I don't have videos yet, but there may be some soon. All these are energy fields.

Even a book that comes from source, that has arisen out of the state of presence, contains the energy field of the source. So all you need to open that and you're in the presence of the teacher, which is ultimately yourself. In the presence of presence, you open the book and presence arises.

You switch on a tape and you might have listened to the tape 10 times already. It's not the point. You just listen and presence arises.

So you have all those things and then occasionally you visit, you spend time with the teacher. Up to a point, it's very helpful. And then there comes a time when the teacher isn't needed anymore.

And that's beautiful too. And it requires wisdom to know when that point has been reached. It's good then to have some intervals in between seeing the teacher again.

And you might feel, okay, presence is already arising continuously. And you may already be becoming a teacher where as presence arises, you cannot not teach presence. So there is not the exclusive form of the teacher there, the exclusive embodiment of presence in that particular form.

Presence arises and already presence emanates, even though it might become obscured in you temporarily. You're already what Causing Miracles calls a teacher of God. The moment that arises, so the form, the physical form is not the exclusive domain of presence, but you may get a boost of presence when you go back to the teacher.

It's helpful. It strengthens. Presence from within is pulled.

Even more presence is pulled out of you, so to speak. It's not literal. Just...

And so to be watchful that an identity doesn't develop out of your teacher or your relationship with a teacher. And a point may come when you realize, or maybe the teacher will even tell you, I don't need to go anymore. Occasionally people have told me that and it's wonderful.

If it's an illusion, it's wonderful too. They'll know it soon enough. I don't need to see you anymore.

Somebody came, what was it? All the way from England to Vancouver and he came to me during the first session and said, I'm going home now. I don't need to see you anymore.

And she says, this is wonderful. I haven't heard from him, so it's good. So the most wonderful thing for a teacher is when they tell him or her, I don't need you anymore.

This is, it's working. And until that happens, use that wonderful opportunity to be with the teacher. In whatever form, the book, the tapes, even I was, some people have a photo of this form.

And at first I said, when they asked me for a photo, why do you want a photo of me? Doesn't make what for? And they said, because I just need to look for your photo and I feel presence arising.

Okay, if it works in that way, I reluctantly agreed. Then you can have a photo, as long as you know this is not the photo of a physical person. That would be an attachment to an outer form.

But if by looking at the photo, you enter the state of presence and you put the photo aside, presence is back. Then it works. So the photo would simply be the photo of a state of consciousness, so to speak.

And even one would say, how can it be that a photo is a piece of paper? Well, even a piece of paper is a field of vibrating energy on an atomic sense, up atomic level. It's an energy field, even a piece of paper.

So even a photo can be helpful as long as it doesn't become a form identity. That is, there's the form of an attachment to the form. Takes you beyond form.

And some beautiful, one or two beautiful photos of Ramana Maharshi work very well in that way. Also, so you can have photos of different teachers. So you don't have, because presence doesn't matter through what form it arises.

And perhaps somebody captures you in a moment of great presence, and then you can put your own photo there too. Why not? Yes.

And there's a photo, some photos of Nisargadatta, slightly not as well known as Krishnamurti or Ramana Maharshi of, again, embodying the intensity of presence. He looks like a Zen master with a fierceness. So if you respond to that, then you look into his eyes, and it puts you in a state of fierce alertness.

And, or Ramana Maharshi is the gentle aspect of presence. Love, gentleness, and yet also intensity. I also have one or two photos of Krishnamurti that is beautiful in their expression of presence.

So all these things are just forms that presence can flow through. It's not just the exclusive form of the teacher. And then everything teaches presence.

Nature teaches presence. So it's everywhere. See when, you will know when you no longer need to see the teacher in person.

You might still enjoy occasionally coming and just enjoy the field of presence. You don't need it anymore. You enjoy it.

It's beautiful. My first part of this letter is a personal request. So I'll get back to you on that.

I notice how many programmed phrases and words are in my vocabulary that don't fit anymore. How I want to express that don't fit anymore, how I want to express myself. Still, they come out of my mouth at times.

10 years ago, I eradicated must, should, and try from my vocabulary by observing the words as I spoke them. Is this possible with so many thousands of mismatching words and phrases, or can you give me some other ways to do this? Of course, it's a sign of presence arising when you become aware of mind patterns and let them come out as words out of your mouth.

And once they are out, you suddenly, immediately as you speak them, you see how limited they are. And they're actually expressing a state of consciousness that you have already gone beyond. Because language arose out of a particular state of consciousness.

So many language structures reflect the egoic state because that's how language and ego developed at the same time, self-reflective consciousness. And so often you become conscious that you say something and say it's not quite right, or it's not right at all, or that's, and words never seem to quite get there to the truth. To some extent, certain expressions will disappear from your vocabulary, that is true, like the shoulds, those mind, because as the mind patterns are recognized, then they dissolve, and then eventually also the expressions associated with the mind patterns no longer come out of your mouth.

Should, as pointed out here, because I should, you should, they should, must, and so on. All patterns to do with complaining in the head. So certain changes do take place in your speech.

And yet language is never totally adequate. Language has its limitations, it's old. Some wisdom is in there too, if you look to a certain origin of certain words, but the whole structure of language is ego-based.

That's why I often say, don't take anything I say too literally, because then you get caught up in the form. All language, especially in spiritual discourse, is only a pointer to the truth, it's not the truth. No statement contains the truth, it points.

The truth is beyond conceptualization and sounds that come out of your mouth. How could sounds that I make express the truth? They're only approximations, they're only pointers.

And religions come out of confusion of mistaking the form, the words, for the truth and attaching yourself to the words. Then instead of being pointers, the words pointing beyond themselves to the truth, the words become a wall, a barrier. That's how it is.

And there comes a belief system and ego identification with the belief system, not realized, it's mistaking form and essence. And then the form, the words obscure the truth. And that can happen even in religious, very often happens in religion, that the very words that originally were designed to point to the truth, to take you to the truth, to point the way, now have become an obstacle to the truth.

This is the case even with a simple thing, when they read a text of great power in a church and they have read it for hundreds of years and they read it, it takes away all their power. All that's left is the words. Look at the flowers of the field, how beautiful they are.

They spin not, they do not, they strive not to make, whatever it is. Whereas he didn't speak like that. There was vitality and aliveness.

It's one of the most powerful statements to look at the flowers. They lived totally in the now, they have no problem. They're not concerned with tomorrow and look how beautiful they are, how beautiful expressions of consciousness they are.

So words can become obstacles. Now, but more importantly even is that all words, not have expectations that you will never, you will always encounter the limitations of words, even if certain expressions in certain words become eliminated from your vocabulary, you're still, words will remain limited. And when words are being spoken, not even to try to capture the truth, be aware of the greater, the vaster field that is free of words, out of which the words come, into which the words return.

There we come back to the spacious field of presence, the stillness around the words. And even as you speak, you sense the underlying stillness. Then the words are no longer that important.

If human interaction and human relationships are confined to words, the exchange of words, which is the case in most relationships, the exchange of words, which is mind, the relationship is impoverished and soon you'll be in trouble and soon you'll find conflict. So always to be aware of the underlying field, stepping back, mindstreams are words uttered inside the head, always coming to the end quickly of a mindstream or if you speak to someone, back into no word so that you don't get caught up in the words. And everybody, the whole civilization is overwhelmed with words.

All relationships are words, words. It's essential in any close relationship, particularly to share silent space, not as necessarily as a formalized ritual, not naturally, organically, to be silent together, not to continuously need to interact on the level of words or mind. And if the dimension of stillness is lost in a relationship, there'll be trouble, conflict.

If the stillness is there, it can contain anything. Two related questions about antidepressants. Please talk about antidepressants.

I take half of the smallest dose of FXO, an antidepressant. I have done without because I have a belief it will keep me from awakening. However, I have greater clarity and seem to hold presence more consistently when I continue with this small amount.

A related question asks, do you think the huge increased consumption of antidepressants in recent years points to the ego's effort to suppress emerging consciousness? Of course, antidepressants are there because the pain gets too much, the pain of living, somehow an escape from the pain, dull the pain in some way. And eventually you have to face the pain and then realize that it's not as big as it seemed.

You've been running away from a monster. And if you really look at the monster, it's not such a big monster anymore. Facing it through presence, allowing that pain, whatever you want to call it, existential pain, the fear associated with it, the heaviness, allowing it to be there.

It may come in waves and then you watch the arising and subsiding of a wave of pain in whatever form. Antidepressants make it harder to be present. If you're on this very small dose, a time will come when you won't need that anymore and it may be very soon.

Some, it is often the pain body that manifests, as I described, the energy field of pain body, some energy field, some pain bodies have the energy field of heaviness, great heaviness to them. And they arise periodically. I had that.

My pain body was predominantly heavy, a weight I couldn't live with, a dull pain, continuous in the background. I might still be on antidepressants if I had taken antidepressants at the time. Somehow I must have allowed the pain to be there without knowing anything about allowing.

With presence growing and accelerating in you, face the pain that arises with that intense presence. And acceptance. And any state that arises, accept and watch it so that it doesn't turn into a self, an unhappy self.

If you accept and watch, any state arises is just that state now. That field, that energy field, that particular manifestation, that particular content arises. No self in it anymore.

The perpetuation of inner states is through them becoming a self, a me. Then they go on and on. You feed them.

You feed them. And you take time away, just what is now. So that whatever the emotional state is, the feeling state doesn't use your mind because if it uses your mind, you're back in time and you will be in past and future, which are both heavy.

And immediately the me arises out of that. So for that, you need the intensity of presence. Take a picture of an Isagadatta and look at that to get the quality of intensity.

Or the picture of a Zen, a painting of a Zen master, but better a photo of a master. And then see the uncompromising quality of presence. But it allows.

Uncompromising doesn't mean it doesn't allow. Uncompromisingly, it allows. It's uncompromising and allowing.

And anything that's faced will undergo change. We know that from dreams. We've all had dreams, running away from some monster or you're being pursued by some presence, some monster.

And when you finally face it in a dream, it's not that horrible. And often this is the myth. It becomes transformed actually into a benign figure, an ancient myth.

The famous, the dragon turns into something else or the frog turns into something, a prince. But you have to kiss the frog. Look.

Of course, you have to reduce very slowly if you are on entity presence, then careful and very alert and very carefully do it. Check within yourself, see if there's any waiting for the next question or this or that. Or whether there's such intensity of aliveness throughout your entire being that this moment is good enough as it is and more than good enough.

Is there a flight into thought as you sit there, which means into time, which means away from this, away from now, away from the aliveness, the intensity of this moment and the peace of this moment. What is the role of vision in creating a new world? Does vision arise out of presence?

Vision meaning you see something before it has manifested externally. The good thing is that you don't have to create a new world. It creates itself through presence.

So you don't have to do it. There is no, in that sense, it's truer to say there is no free will. You are no more than an opening and the totality, the one consciousness expresses itself through you.

Is that the relief? You don't have to create a new world, but it'll create itself perhaps through you. And through presence, you may suddenly see what's needed.

Insight and realization comes, it's not egoic. There's no struggling and no effort in it. You will always know when there's effort, then there's no alignment with presence.

There's some ego involvement there. I need to get somewhere. I need to create a better world.

And so there'll be struggle. Effort means needing to get to the future. That's effort.

It doesn't mean that there may not be intense energy behind what you do, but it's not the energy of effort. Effort means you're being pulled towards future. But when something, when action arises out of presence, there may be great intensity and passion, you could say, but not the passion that needs you to reach the future.

The doing itself, it's the doing that arises is sufficient unto itself and there's joy, aliveness, and passion in the doing. It doesn't need the goal. Of course, in time, there's time in the phenomenal world, the doing will result in certain forms arising, new forms arise externally.

You don't need any of those for your salvation. You're not looking to the future for salvation. That means there's no effort anymore, but perhaps great intensity and great passion and great aliveness.

That's how the new world creates itself. So you may pursue a goal, but the arriving is not all that important. Not a goal that is going to free you, not a goal that is going to enhance your sense of self or your sense of importance.

Not in that sense. A good sign is when anything that arises out of presence, it means this moment is not a means to an end. The doing is fulfilled and fulfilling in itself, every moment.

You're no longer reducing the now to a means to an end, which is the old consciousness. And then very often you create, because you have a vision of heaven, and in pursuing your vision of heaven, you're creating hell. That's often happened.

There have been many visions of heaven and utopia. And in pursuing that, we need to get there, there. This is the ideal image.

Once we get there, we'll be fine. We'll be free. We will be whatever we will be.

In the meantime, we need to adopt certain means towards getting there. Okay. We need to eliminate all those who don't believe in this goal to start with.

The madness continues. And this works on the smallest levels to observe any kind of doing in your life, movement from here to there, walking from here to there. Is it a means to an end, or is there a sense of completeness in the doing?

And you will notice the qualitative difference is tremendous between any action that's a means to a future end and an action that is not a means, but there's a sense of completeness to it. And yet there may be great energy there. We talked about eating.

Why many people lose consciousness when they eat is it's a means to an end. I need to get this food in through the body. There's no quality, no presence.

Even making a cup of tea or a cup of coffee, is that a means to an end? The tiniest things using them to see if you can be present with what is. It's never, the illusion in the old consciousness is the next moment is more important than this one.

Always, always the next moment is more important than this one. It does not mean that you have to slow down a lot, presence arising. We talked about that film I saw where those beings, everything they do is very slow.

And sometimes when presence arises, at first people try to do everything very carefully. And then there's a little bit of self-consciousness still there. Okay, I'm trying to be present.

And then you see, that's not quite it either. They're simple, reaching for glass. The glass is traveling to your mouth.

It looks like just a normal, just a normal action. And yet it's not a means to an end. And then a sense of presence pervades the entire energy field around you.

So any action that becomes a vehicle for presence, it's a vehicle for presence. And I think that's the beauty of the tea ceremony. As you know, they developed the tea ceremony in Japan originally so that basically means every movement is sufficient unto itself.

You're not moving towards the end result. You're just with what is. And that is the beauty.

It is possible that later it becomes a ritual and no longer works, there's certain deadness after a while that comes into a ritual and they may be performing the ritual, every movement is correct, but the presence is no longer there, that is possible too. But you will know that anybody with the slightest presence can tell the difference between somebody performing something like the tea ceremony or Tai Chi that requires intense presence. And you will know, I haven't learned Tai Chi, but I can watch Tai Chi and I know whether they're simply going through the movements and it may look fine on the surface, but the field of presence isn't there.

And somebody else going through the same movements and they see it emanates presence. And so that's the beauty of Tai Chi is that no movement is a means, you're not, when the arm moves from here, they're probably masters of Tai Chi here, so what am I talking about? But all I know is presence.

The hand moves from here to here and usually in your mind, you're already there. So the intervening movement or time period is a means to an end because the movement will have completed itself when it reaches there. So you're already mentally there and the hand is lagging behind.

So there's no presence, there's the projection of future that you're trying to get to. And then there's the possibility of moving in a way that at any stage of the movement, there's no movement into the future, there's continuous, you're not trying to get anywhere, just, and there's, that's the quality of presence flowing into it. And you could perform the same movement outwardly correctly, but you would have a mental projection there and the master would be able to tell or anybody, even if they know nothing about Tai Chi, would be able to tell that it doesn't, the emanation of presence isn't there.

But I, my feeling is that, I don't know anything about it, but my feeling is that presence, Tai Chi originated as spontaneous movement, presence expressing itself through a human being, in spontaneous, very slow kind of dance. And no movement was planned before. Nothing is, there's no, it moves with total nowness.

And simply one way in which presence can express itself, it can flow into. And so there was this, perhaps it was an old woman or an old man, or who knows, a young woman or a young man, suddenly moving and the few people around them saw, this is beautiful. What's he doing?

What's she doing? It was totally spontaneous. And then they said, this is so beautiful, we need to learn this.

And then gradually they started to see, okay, now he's lifting his right leg and then he holds it up for five seconds and then it goes down. So you can, you learn it by watching the spontaneity. Of course, now it becomes something learned, but even that can take you into presence.

It's not how it arose originally, my feeling is. And they, so they observed and then it became a technique, so to speak. But even the technique can work.

Although originally it came the other way around. Presence came and then it resulted in the movement. Now you perform the movement and the movement results in presence, if it works as it's meant to.

So we don't need to create a new world, that's good. Don't need to worry about that. Maybe I'll have one more question.

Thank you for choosing to share, choosing it in quotation marks. Thank you, it's good. Thank you for choosing to share your realization.

As the hole in the flute, is it ever possible for the true spiritual teacher to avoid encapsulation and institutionalization by the adoring and well-meaning devotees who may be inclined to mistake the teacher's form for the musician itself? Very good. To avoid encapsulation and institutionalization.

Well, I don't know. Institutionalization is not anything that I can see happening here. There's very little structure, which has its drawbacks also, that emails don't get answered for several months or more.

But there's no institution. Things would work more efficiently if there were some institution, but that in itself can become heavy and self-serving. Encapsulation, the numbers of people increase, then the teacher is faced with the limitations of form.

Every teacher will be faced with the limitations of form as the numbers increase, and that can't be helped. I can't answer my phone calls anymore. I would be spending 20 hours a day on the telephone.

So to some extent, there is an encapsulation already happening. It doesn't affect the power of the teaching. It just means to have personal contact with a teacher is more rare, but for the teaching to work, it's not even necessary to have contact on a personal level.

The teaching works, that's the main question. Is it working? Is presence emanating?

That's what the teacher is there for. And you will always discover that certain things in the form that are not perfect, that leave something to be desired, that could be otherwise because there are many ways of doing things. Why doesn't he do it that way?

He could be doing this or that. A greater danger for teachers is something else, and that is to believe that they are special. That's a greater danger for teachers because many people cannot quite see that it's the whole, that's which comes, it's the hole in the flute.

The teacher is the hole in the flute, as it said in that beautiful poem. I quote it, the teacher is not even the flute, just the hole in the flute. So it's mistaking the form of the teacher for the presence that comes through the hole.

And then there may be projections of specialness. This person is very special, but the person is not special. It's through the absence of the person that the whole is there.

If there were not an absence of the person, there wouldn't be the whole. And so therefore, the person isn't special, it's the absence of the person that's special. But many teachers are bombarded with projections of specialness, that the form is special, and after a few years, they come to believe it.

This can more likely happen to teachers who live only surrounded by disciples or devotees in an ashram who don't move any longer in the ordinary world. And so all they ever meet is disciples of, which can be beautiful too, but it's almost, who could withstand this continuous bombardment of specialness? I still do my own shopping at Safeway and other, well, preferably other stores, but occasionally Safeway.

So the greatest danger, institutionalization, of course, is a danger because sometimes institutions become so heavy that they no longer serve as vehicles. But the greatest danger for any teacher is specialness, which is always some form of ego returning. Send me a letter when you see it happening to warn me.

I love hugging people, and anybody who wants hugs, I hope that we will be able to have a hugging session tomorrow. I used to hug people continuously, but with increasing numbers, like the last talk in Vancouver, we had something like 700 people. It was physically impossible after a four-hour session to spend two or three hours hugging everybody.

So these are the limitations of form. I love seeing everybody, being with everybody individually, it's wonderful. But then the teaching is growing, which is also wonderful.

But so then one limits the other in form. Thank you for the flute. I'll start practicing.

It's got holes. That's me. That's you.

Bells are easier to play than flutes. Start with the bell of attention. See, the bell calls you back into the now, if you had left it.

In imagination only, of course, you can't leave it. Make sure you're in the body so that you don't wait for anything. So you feel the alertness pervading your entire energy field and its presence.

The turbulence has passed. The external turbulence that we had during the night and part of the day, that was beautiful too, except for those people whose tent collapsed. And you survived that.

Other turbulences perhaps have passed also. Pain bodies, mental turbulence, mind attacks, discontent, not wanting to be here. Confusion, doubt, trying to figure something out.

Confusion is trying to figure something out. And the moment you stop trying to figure it out, there's no more confusion. Some years ago, I gave little seminars called Freedom from Time.

And a man came, I may have mentioned the story, who thought that it was about time management. And he wanted to organize his time better. He was a doctor.

He was a doctor, but he got something completely different. And during the break, he came up to me and said how amazed he was. He hadn't come for this.

He had never heard of anything like this. And amazingly, he was open. And he was glad that it wasn't about time management.

In the same way, perhaps you came here because you thought it was a seminar or workshop or retreat about personal growth. Whereas in fact, it's about personal shrinkage. Yes.

So we've been through this weight loss program. And everybody has lost some weight. Some people have lost quite a bit of weight.

Of course, not physical, I'm not concerned with. The weight of the person, the weight of the me, the heaviness of me and my problems, my fears, my desires, my story, my future, my past, me, me. And something else has emerged or is emerging and will continue to emerge.

And that is I. I amness, a deeper sense of presence or beingness. And your identity now is derived from that.

That is who you are, as the song puts it, who you really are, nothing in past or future. That remains as a framework of your external existence, of course. But no more than that, the scaffolding, the framework, that's how you have a certain situation, a certain life situation.

No longer deriving one's sense of self from one's life situation, from one's story. That's losing weight. What remains is the silent part of the teaching, alive stillness, awareness, just this.

And that's the end of all effort and trying. Not the end of action or activity, but the end of effortful action. That brings me to one of the questions that have been asked.

Everywhere I go, I see parts of nature I could not see before, because my eyes can only see one part at a time. But I know there's an oneness and that it is not really divided in different pieces. Is this the same for the past, the now and the future?

And do I divide them because of my poor view, mind into different parts? And if everything already exists, what difference does it make whatever I do? I'm grateful to be here with you.

Thank you. Now, you may have noticed what this is about, not about doing or not doing what we are to do. But access the level of being.

Once you have accessed the level of being or presence, such complex questions don't arise anymore. Because you could spend a long time trying to work out whether anything you do is going to make any difference. It's almost like a koan in Zen, the questions that cannot be answered through discursive thought or thought.

So you torture your mind for days or weeks. And this could be one. If all is one, which is true, the division between past, present and future is a mind-made one, that there is no such thing.

In fact, both past and future are part of now, which is true. Because only the power of now gives them aliveness, past and future. So it's an artificial division.

There's only now that includes the past and the future. And then the mind says, well, then everything already has happened and exists and it's totally timeless. And then nothing I do would make any difference.

Or perhaps it would. And after a long time of thinking, the mind would come to a stop. And then suddenly you find yourself doing something.

Doing arises out of being, out of the state of being. You're no longer questioning whether it makes any difference because you're simply a channel for action that arises. So the beauty about the state of presence is that many very difficult questions don't arise anymore.

Where do I fit into the universe? What is my place in the universe? What is my life purpose?

Even that doesn't arise anymore because the moment presence is accessed, your life purpose is revealed. Not necessarily in form yet, but your life purpose is accessing the level of being, is to become the flowering of consciousness. Whatever form that then takes is secondary or whatever action you take is secondary.

We are not concerned here with what to do, but about being, how to be, rather than what to do. The doing then flows out of the being. Your life purpose is the flowering of consciousness.

It's so to speak, the shell of ego breaks or dissolves depending on your circumstances. In some cases, the shell breaks. It's an almost violent act.

In some cases, it breaks violently from within. In other cases, it breaks violently, so to speak, from without, something cracks the shell of ego. Or in other cases, there is a dissolving of the shell of ego with not so much violence in it.

And that is usually the beauty of a spiritual teaching. Those who don't have access to a spiritual teaching, I didn't, it was all around, but I didn't even know it was there. Well, not all around, perhaps, but it was there.

Those who have no access, usually it is a more violent breaking of the shell. And even some who have access to spiritual teaching, and yet there's a deep-seated egoic sense of self that is not going to give way, even after 20 years of meditation practice. There too, it's possible that something violent will happen to break the shell of me.

And then, I'm using a kind of metaphor, but this is how it is. And then something emerges that has always been there. Out of suffering grows presence, like a flower growing out of the mud.

I believe perhaps the lotus flowers grow in the mud. Really, perhaps they do, I don't know, but some flowers do, they do, yes. And perhaps this is why it's used as a symbol in Buddhism, the lotus flower growing out of the mud.

That's, for everyone here, it's a dissolving, it's not violent, but the crack may already have been administered to the shell, but from now on, it opens more gently. It just may need a little bit of encouragement, a little bit of nourishment, and for that, you have access to books, certain books that contain spiritual power, you have access to tapes, and other things, and teachers, until you don't need them anymore. Everything passes quickly.

We have been here for several days. This is the last day. It is always amazing how fleeting phenomenal existence is.

Not long ago, you walked in here for the first time, and it's gone in a few days. You find yourself in totally different surroundings. Everything fleeting in the phenomenal realm.

If there were not something that is not fleeting, that is not subject to time, you wouldn't even know that everything is fleeting. It's only because there is an essence in you that is not subject to that, that you can know it. The very knowing that everything is fleeting is that which is not fleeting, and that's the essence of your being.

That's the beauty. That is why many years ago, I read it, the sonnets of Shakespeare, most of them are about how quickly beauty and youth fade away. That's all they talk about.

And there is a spiritual quality to them. They don't talk about anything as such spiritual, but every poem is written from the place of the knower that knows that everything is fleeting. So there's a deep sense of peace pervading these poems, which is underneath the words, and the reader doesn't know why, because when you look at the words, they seem to say that, well, you should be crying because youth fades like a rose fades in a couple of days, youth fades just almost as quickly, the beauty.

Everything is consumed by time, so it seems. Isn't that something we should be crying about? And yet, when you read these poems, there's a deep sense of peace because they put you into the position of the knower, or the knowing, which is the timeless presence, the timeless consciousness that watches the phenomenal realm subject to time, nothing lasts.

It grows, it fades, it's gone. So there's something deeply peaceful about the observation of the passing, ephemeral, impermanent nature of all existence. It's not depressing or sad, that's the strange thing.

When you know, because then simply the watching of impermanence, the knowing, the watching of a cycle of growth and decay is beautiful because there you are the knower, the knowing, that which is not subject to birth and death, not content, every content comes and goes. So here, our meetings, our gatherings here, there's the external content. Every day you walked through the beautiful surroundings.

You sat here, there's the room, the view, the voice, the other people you meet here, certain experiences you may have had here in meeting, all that's wonderful, it all passes. In a few years, you may have photo album to look at. That was the retreat in Costa Rica, that was nice.

That his name was so-and-so, and that such-and-such. And it's gone, not much left of that. Even next week, not much left, some memory traces.

On that level, it's a sad story because you have to get back into your ordinary existence. Here you are taken out of that, and although in some ways you sometimes wished you were back in your ordinary existence, especially those people who had to line up for the bathroom, but... Yet there's always something spiritual about traveling because you leave the old structures behind and then you have new stuff, but even that is passing.

Now, it's to allow the passing to happen of all phenomenal existence. Otherwise, you compose country music or something like that, which is all about, it's nice. It says, I'm so sad she left me, it's all gone.

We had such a good thing together. And now it's all gone. That's the level of, you're not the watcher.

You're identified with the phenomenal realm completely and the story of the phenomenal realm. So you are the storyteller. And as the storyteller of the phenomenal realm, every story really has a very sad ending.

A temporary, it may have a temporary happy pseudo ending, but when you really get to the end, they all die. Whatever story you tell in the end, they were buried and they died. So on the level of story, life is not satisfying even if temporarily the story has the appearance of satisfaction.

Isn't it great here? Sometimes experience can temporarily be very fulfilling. I'm having a great time.

I'm having fun. We're all having fun. Let's really get into the experience and there's nothing wrong with that.

And then it passes quickly or it goes on and on and it's no longer fun. The same thing goes on and on, but it's not fun anymore. So you have to look for something else.

When I was learning English a long time ago, somebody said to me, have fun. What's that? And they couldn't explain.

Funny, I understood already, but fun is not funny. Some languages don't have fun. Now there's the pursuit of fun.

I'm not saying this wrong, but then you find you will continuously go through the cycles of, oh yeah, and then dissatisfaction. Where's the next cycle of fun? And then in the pursuit of fun, the dissatisfaction then grows after several years of fun seeking, the dissatisfaction grows more and more because really it means I'm seeking satisfaction through experiences and events and things that happen, the phenomenal realm.

I'm seeking some satisfaction through this, connected with the ego that seeks to feel bigger through it. So really all this is the seeking after experiences or wanting to accumulate experiences. And for a while it works, and you have a bigger and bigger bag of experiences.

And after a while that becomes meaningless because everyone recedes into the past and then the mind tries to hold on or make it incorporated into who I am somehow, but it never really holds together. So on that level, country music level, storytelling, it's fine. It's so I have the blues or whatever it is.

And that's because that's the essence of country. And it's nice because that is when you're attached to the experience phenomenal realm, you always end up with the blues. So, and then you can be the, instead of being the storyteller, you are the knower and you watch the arising and the subsiding of a form, a phenomenal form, an experience, and there's a beauty in that.

The beauty is not that because everything passes in itself, that's not a beauty. The beauty is that you are the knower and there lies the peace that is there when you become fully aware of the impermanent nature of the phenomenal realm. When you know it fully, there's the deepest peace in that knowing.

And you no longer demand then that the phenomenal realm should satisfy you because it never will. And you no longer demand that the phenomenal realm should give you your sense of self. You can try for years and years and lifetimes.

It's frustrating because the phenomenal realm doesn't work on that level. So not demanding satisfaction through events, situations, places, people. I demand that you satisfy me.

I demand that this place should satisfy me or this experience should. It should because I paid money for it or whatever. So it should.

And no place will. No place ultimately can. A temporary good feeling, yes.

And then, oh, there was something not right about it. There was something missing. And the same with persons.

Temporarily it seems, yes, he or she is going to make me happy for the rest of my life. Doesn't work. He won't, she won't.

No matter how many contracts you sign. No place, no situation, no circumstances, no person can satisfy you. So the demand, human existence is so frustrating because a person demands something from the phenomenal realm that it cannot deliver.

Please satisfy me. Tell me who I am. Because everything is gone, gone.

And then some people, you live with a collection of memories in your back of me and my story. And to talk about it as much as possible to keep it going. And so when you look at life on that level only, it's a sad story, very sad.

It's depressing. What a miserable existence, because you are condemned to decay, to die. No matter what effort you make, in the end, it will all come to nothing.

And some philosophers have seen that and they've constructed a wild view out of that and said, it's all completely pointless. And as I believe I even quoted it in the book, some passages in the Old Testament. That I've seen everything that is done under the sun and behold, all is a striving after, all is vanity and a striving after wind.

Vanity there I believe means empty, pointless, meaningless. And then instead of being the storyteller and involved completely identified with the story, you become the knower and you watch and you realize how fleeting everything is, every experience ever. And you continue to watch the arising and subsiding.

As they say in Buddhism, whatever arises passes away and you become the knower of that. Whole solar systems, galaxies, everything comes into being. The galaxies live a little longer than humans, a few billion years longer, and then they dissolve.

And there's that knowing, is consciousness itself, the knower, the watcher. And when you continue to watch, deep peace arises in the face of the fleeting nature of the phenomenal realm and you no longer demand that the phenomenal realm should satisfy you. No, the satisfaction is that peace, that knows, that watches, that allows the fleeting nature of the world to be there.

And that is the, that's the state of peace, complete inner peace, your home. It is also, I've just given you a different perspective on what before I called the now, because that's inseparable. The now is the one thing that is not subject to birth and death.

And it's you, it's the knower or the knowing. Nothing could be more satisfying than being that. That is satisfaction itself.

And then you continue to be involved in experiences. You meet people, you do things, you even have fun perhaps, but you no longer demand that a situation or person or place should satisfy you. It's allowed in its passing and imperfect nature, it's allowed to be.

And the miracle is that then every situation, every event, every person satisfies you because the demand isn't there anymore. He, the situation, the person, the place is allowed to be as it is. And it's fine, it's more than fine as it is.

You also don't demand any law that it should last because it doesn't. You see, nothing lasts and that also becomes beautiful. So the essence of our being together here lies not in this as an experience to add to your store of experiences.

Then you will feel nostalgic in a few weeks and say, that was nice, but now it's gone. Or the mind projects more future and say, okay, let's book another one. I'm not saying you shouldn't book another one.

But the essence is not the experience of this. The essence is the timeless presence underneath the experience. And that's what you go away with from here.

So you can't lose that. And then you watch the next scenery around you in a couple of days, everything has changed around you. And you watch that, that it's all changed.

And you know that also is going to change. And you begin to enjoy that everything is fleeting even. It's beautiful.

So you may still have fun, but you're not seeking fun anymore. Having fun really means it's nice to enjoy an experience for what it is, knowing it'll pass, but it's beautiful. So you no longer depend on place also, neither circumstances nor place, because otherwise you will say this place is more desirable than the one I'm going to go back to.

And then you already feel the future as impending, almost an impending threat, or you're kind of doomed. You can't get away. You have to move into the future, to this place that's not as good as this one.

And because you're still demanding that a place should fulfill you. It can't, if you came to live here, it wouldn't fulfill you. There would be certain things.

Maybe I should move back to New York. So all this is, whatever I talk about is really always the same, but just a different perspective on it. It's all one.

It's all that transformation of consciousness. That's all it is. That's all I ever talk about.

But sometimes you look at it from here, sometimes from here or here or there. And occasionally it looks as if you were talking about something different, whatever you want to call it. You know it beyond label now, the one central point.

In some Buddhist countries, the Buddhist monks take the extreme measure of periodically visiting graveyards or watching decaying, going to the morgue where corpses are. And they sit there and watch. That's an extreme form of this practice.

You don't need to do that. To some extent, if you visit certain countries where people, old people, sick people, dying people are not hidden from view as they are in the West, you get a much more direct and obvious sense of the fleeting nature of all existence. But living in the Western world where the dying and the old, they're all shut away in buildings.

The illusion can be sustained longer that all is well out there in the phenomenal realm. All is well, but only if you know that which is beyond the phenomenal realm. If you go to some countries, you see that decay all around you, dying people, old people.

That's closer to the truth than the way it looks in the West. So there's always, when a phenomenon subsides, you're coming to the death of an experience. So here we have the impending death of your Pura Vida experience.

It's moving towards its end, death, and it's beautiful. So the rest of today, you watch how this day comes to an end. And you are the watcher.

The sun sets, and you're not so much getting into the story, you just, you watch how it... And tomorrow morning, you watch some new form arising. You may find yourself moving into a plane, and then you sit there, it takes off, and you watch.

With that alertness, that allows this moment to be, and then to pass. But always, it's always, the essence of it remains as the field, the knower, or the knowing, the awareness, whatever label works for you. And then even experiences and places that before were judged as undesirable, you can move into and enjoy.

Often they change if you enjoy them. And you don't live in past and future anymore. You don't need it, not as mental projections.

For practical matters, it's fine, past and future are fine, but not as mental projections of me. Jesus talked about the same things in slightly different words. The whole phenomenal realm he described as where moth and rust consume, and thieves break in and steal.

In other words, the whole world that is subject to decay and impermanence, where moth and rust consume, the form dissolves. Moth, what they do is they eat clothing. Well, I don't know if they still do with synthetic fibers, but they used to.

And rust, of course, dissolves the hardest of substances, metal. So again, the form, it dissolves form. Moth and rust consume.

The form becomes consumed. He just uses that as an image. And where thieves break in and steal, the loss of whatever kind, like somebody, life, a person, a situation, takes something away from you.

That's the whole phenomenal realm. And if that's where your heart is, I believe he said, then you'll be unhappy, frustrated, miserable, looking for fun, having fun for brief moments, and then being miserable again. And so he said, be only concerned with one thing, the kingdom of heaven, which is now here.

Or sometimes he called it eternal life, eternal life here. Not the life of form. He also calls it abundant life.

Again, it's a reference to the fullness of life that is beyond form. If you could be, if you ever do, or you have done already, sit with a dying person. And death is not a dreadful disaster.

Sometimes people, very often people react to death as if they had never heard that it existed. It's not, somebody, it's not possible. He died.

Nobody ever told me that people die. There's so much repression of the fact of impermanence of form, that when death actually happens in a person's life, it can be a dreadful shock. And so a lot of, in our civilization, death is just as the present moment is continuously denied.

Death is also denied. Don't talk about it. Don't mention, never mentioned the possibility of death.

And there are couples, old couples living together. They've never talked about death. Just, oh no.

And the most beautiful thing would be before your own death comes, which is beautiful, to sit with a dying person and allow the form to pass away and bring that space, that spaciousness, that allowing, and the deep knowing that comes with that, you bring that to that situation. And if you, this should ever, you should ever be in that situation, and many of you will. You may remember this moment, but also not as a memory.

It will certainly be there as in its full aliveness. You are the knower of the passing nature of all form. And as the body begins to dissolve, that which is beyond form shines through, so to speak, is known as the knowing that is deeper than any form.

So the most sacred thing really is death. When a form dissolves and leaves a hole, just as the hole in the flute, the form was just the illusion that you're not a hole. And then the form goes, and it leaves a hole, and the formless shines through.

So that's why it's sacred. God is present more than when a form is dissolving at that point of transition, God is present. The one life shines through that hole left by the form.

But the beauty here is that we discover, even while we are still in this form, we discover our essential nature as the hole, the opening, and not the solid form. So I may have mentioned already instinctively, deep down, perhaps all humans know that there is something sacred when death happens. But just as they deny death, they deny the sacred in our civilization.

When was the last time that you heard something sacred on television talking about, well, maybe an evangelist shouting, but not the sacred. So in many ancient, in many traditional cultures, when somebody, there's suddenly somebody dies, and they all, they take off their hat, they make the sign of the cross, and they talk in hushed tones, he's dying, he's dying. Why?

Because they feel, maybe yesterday they hated this person, but now he's gone. And there's some knowing that, they don't know why they do that, that when a form dissolves, there's the sacredness which is life, which emanates from the formless one life is present. So, and that applies not just to the body dissolving.

I'm talking about this now, because being the last day, something, this also is a form, a structure, a temporary structure, it's coming to an end, and it's beautiful. All ends are so beautiful, because every end is a little death, and every death is the one eternal life shining through the dissolving form. So we've already embraced death here fully in all its various manifestations.

So the actual death should really not hold any fear for you anymore. When it comes, it'll just be the flowering. The flowering is happening to you already, because you're dying as you sit here, and then a deepening.

One of the beautiful things about last days of retreat is we exchange sacred hugs here. Only those who want it, it's not necessary. And as we hug, there's a moment of no thought, just silent presence.

Not to anymore, because only thought creates the duality. So we'll exchange hugs for a while, and then I'll hug some more people and be hugged by more people in our last session later on. I had to stop hugging people when the groups became so big, the talks with 500, 600, 700 people.

And it's so wonderful to hug everyone, but it became too much after the talks, four hours of talk and then three hours to four hours of hugging. But here it's still possible. Perhaps we could play the sacred Sanskrit, that beautiful song that Patrick Barnard sings in Sanskrit.

Song of the Universal Light. So I have to stand up for this.

[Speaker 2] (6:55:36 - 6:56:55)

I have to stand up for this.

[Speaker 1] (6:56:55 - 7:29:21)

This afternoon, I came to answer lots of questions, but it never happened. Maybe I answered one, if that. But what was said was more important than any answer could have been.

And as it always is, it was right for that moment. So I already sense, as perhaps you do, there's a completeness, completion already about our gathering. And how long we'll be here tonight, I don't know.

Last time I said somewhere, I guess this will be a short meeting, 10 or 15 minutes. And last time I said that, it lasted two and a half hours. I do know there are more questions than can be answered within this time span.

That doesn't matter so much. You may find one of your unanswered questions may suddenly appear in another book. By then, the question probably will have dissolved for you and you won't be interested anymore.

As you know, the essence about us being together is not answering questions, although that happens too. It's not to satisfy the mind, although to a limited extent it happens. To a large extent, the mind remains unsatisfied, of course, here.

Occasionally it gets little bits and pieces. But it's, as I mentioned at the beginning, to the mind, thinking, accumulation of knowledge, to the mind, this is not a satisfying event. And that's fine.

What a beautiful moment. All the people who've been coming here are coming up for hugs and some more people who will be coming up for hugs later, I'm sure. When you come up for hugs, there's no, I don't have any thought in my head about you.

There's only a kind of knowing. If the knowing were translated into words, but it becomes, of course, inadequate if it's translated into words, but I'm going to translate it anyway. The knowing is, each time I look at you into a person's eyes, ah, there I am.

But that knowing doesn't come as words. So there you are, thinly disguised as somebody else. God in disguise.

Everybody here is thinly disguised. Some forms, some human forms are more heavily disguised, but they're all the same, no matter how heavy the disguise. We may have another turbulent night externally, and it's another opportunity of being the still presence that watches the turbulence.

It'll pass, like everything else, but it's beautiful. I may look at a few questions right now that may not require a lengthy explanation, although you never know. I understand that I don't have free will when my ego is in charge, nor when totality is expressing itself through me.

When I notice that I'm operating egoically, do I then have a choice to continue to let my ego dictate or to choose being in the present instead? I think I have free will in that moment. That's a good observation.

I often put it in that way. I say you can choose to be present. So from one perspective or one level, it appears that at that moment, you have a choice.

You can choose presence rather than mental noise. You can choose to step out of the mental noise, and that is a helpful perspective on it. Ultimately, even that's not entirely true.

Because if presence were not arising at that moment, you wouldn't have a choice. The very fact that you have a choice means there's enough presence. And that comes.

Presence chooses you rather than you choosing presence, one could say. It's still something much vaster than the seemingly autonomous entity. What seems like an autonomous entity is connected to something much vaster.

And something out of the vastness rises at that moment. And from the perspective of the entity, it looks as if at that moment, the entity had a choice. And it's a helpful perspective.

It's quite helpful to see it as I have a choice now. That's how it appears. This is more helpful than to say, there's nothing you can do.

Go and watch TV with a can of beer because there's nothing you can do anyway. And eventually you will get unhappy enough and something will happen. But this was very helpful, this question, the observation of at that moment, because at that moment, something comes in that is not conditioned.

The unconditioned arises. That is the vastness itself far greater than what looks like the entity, but the entity is not separate from that. It is an expression.

So that then expresses itself. And at first, it looks as it becomes like a choice. That's its first sign.

It appears as if you had a choice at that moment. That's good, good enough. You could ask many questions related to that.

Did you have a choice in coming here? Yes, no. There's something much faster at work that is arising through these forms.

The question about being in the body, having attention in the inner energy field of the body, which is an ancient Buddhist technique practiced, there's a meditation called Vipassana, whereby you put attention into the body systematically. And it's a meditation technique. Some claim that it was originally taught by the Buddha.

And that's, of course, you're present. As soon as you enter the body with your attention, you're present. But the question is, why do you prefer to teach a technique-less, to teach in a technique-less style?

As techniques go, Vipassana is wonderful. It's a wonderful meditation. For some reason, I don't teach techniques.

It seems that the power of the teaching or the power of presence is so strong as to not need the intermediary of a technique. That is perhaps the reason. So it's a direct pointing.

Just as Zen originally arose, totally no technique. And it was defined originally, Zen is direct pointing to the essence. Usually translated as heart, but direct pointing to the essence.

There's always the last step. Eventually, the technique is transcended, no matter how wonderful the technique is. And a technique, the drawback with usually a technique is that it gives you time to become good at it, to get better at it.

And steps, many stages or steps, many techniques have that. So that's the drawback. Even if the technique is designed to take you into the timeless, it might give you time to get there.

Many paradoxes appear when we talk about timeless and time. But that's how it is. A technique doesn't seem to happen here.

There's simply the power of presence. If privately you find a technique helpful, that's fine. Vipassana, whatever.

Some people practice the course in miracles. 365 lessons, one lesson per day. All designed to take you to the realization that there's no time.

That there's only the holy instant, as it's called in the book, only now. And if you could do one lesson, or even half a lesson fully and totally, you would be there. Even lesson one.

Of course, then you wouldn't need the lesson anymore. And the remaining 364 lessons. Being pure consciousness is so natural and simple, a state, at least I can see that.

Yet, since it is so very abstract too, how can you keep people from straining, mood-making, dividing the mind, creating expectations and beliefs, et cetera, while practicing the simple methods or portals that you offer? This first very important statement in the question, being pure consciousness is so natural and simple a state. It is natural and simple, a state of great simplicity, sometimes called in India, the natural state, your natural state.

And then the question says, yet it is so very abstract. No, it's not abstract. It's simple.

What's abstract is what follows. Dividing the mind, creating expectations, beliefs, mind streams, all that is a waste of abstraction. All of thought is abstraction.

Nevertheless, the question is valid. How do you keep people from straining? Well, I don't try to do that.

So the question is perhaps how do I keep myself from, and even that I wouldn't try to do. Simply watch, when we've been pointing to this, watch the movement of thought as it arises without being it, without being completely identified with it, be present. Do you have a choice?

We come back to the other question. Do you have a choice? Yes and no.

I would say yes, it's more helpful. I wouldn't say this to everybody because many people in this world, there's not yet, presence has not yet emerged to the point where one could say that they have a choice. And to many humans, it still applies what Jesus said.

They know not what they do. They know not what simply means something is operating through them and it's mechanical. They don't, they know not what they do.

They are not conscious. They don't know, forgive them, he said, of course. Somebody points out the psychotherapist that for people who suffer from certain biological illnesses it can be dangerous to go off antidepressants.

So great care needs to be exercised. Thank you, that may be important to mention. Some presence can arise also even when there's medication.

So whatever your situation is now, here you are, presence is arising no matter what. So here we are just alert, still allowing presence to arise and presence is here. And I seem to be saying this at the end of each retreat now and that is you're not really going anywhere from here.

It just appears that you are. You never really go anywhere. The core, the field of now remains.

And around it, the scenery changes. There's the vastness of being and around it the pictures change continuously. So all you have to do is enjoy the scenery and enjoy the changes, the changing scenery.

So all this we already talked about that you can actually enjoy the fact that everything passes. There's a beauty in the coming and going of form. But only if you are the knower of the field that's underneath forms.

Then there's a beauty. There's a beauty in your own body getting old and you can enjoy that. There's a beauty even in loss of whatever kind.

You can enjoy that. So maybe the final message is that you don't have to do anything. In a way, the opposite of doing is what's required, allowing.

The new state of consciousness wants to arise. Presence wants to arise. It's allowing that vaster movement to express itself through you.

So there isn't anything really you have to do. How do you allow that new consciousness, that vaster movement to express itself through you? How can you be that hole in the flute?

What do you have to do to be a hole? Well, Jesus used a strange expression. He says, deny thyself.

People don't understand this. It's being misinterpreted. In other words, be selfless.

Be free of the illusion of the separate little me. Then you realize your essential nature is that hole, your no thingness. And then you're just an instrument of God, you could say.

Just it's expressive. God expresses itself through that hole. God, he, she, it plays.

So beautiful to be nobody, and yet everything. I'll ring the bell three times, reminding you of alertness, of the wakefulness. You want to read a poem?

Okay, after the bells. Would you like to read your poem? The microphone is coming.

Yes?

[Speaker 3] (7:29:33 - 7:31:02)

Actually, this isn't, the poem I'll read now wasn't the one I was originally intending to read. I just wrote this one now, after the meeting. I was up in the brand of the dining hall.

It was so beautiful looking at the valley and the twinkling lights. I called it Pura Vida

Twilight. Below us the valley in twinkling light.

Above us the heavens preparing for night. And here on the sun deck enveloped in peace, soft candle lights play in the tropical breeze. The rainbows have vanished, the wind's gone to sleep.

There's a hush in the air now, a whisper as deep as the shadow of evening that lies on the hills. And rich as a heart's breath that love has made still. This week was a week out of time, and it seems not quite right that it ends like a vanishing dream.

A hundred hearts beating as one, one last time. Then it's back to the cities, pollution and crime. But this hush, but this hush in the heavens has a message for this, for hearts that are open in silence and bliss.

I'm afraid that's when you came in, and the message is each one of us.

[Speaker 1] (7:31:02 - 7:31:04)

It's perfect as it is.

[Speaker 3] (7:31:05 - 7:31:08)

Good, thank you. Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (7:31:12 - 7:32:29)

I trusted that it would be perfect, and it was. It could have been horrible, but it was perfect. Thank you.

Thank you. Yeah, could we listen to the sacred song again? So we'll just sit for a little while and listen to the beginning of the sacred song.

Patrick Bernard is chanting, singing in Sanskrit. And then at some point I'll get up and like to hug more people. Particularly those with whom I haven't exchanged sacred hugs yet.

Eckhart Tolle Stillness is the heart of happiness

[Speaker 1] (0:02 - 1:21:22)

Welcome, some of you have only just arrived here, perhaps from the busy city and a busy life. And perhaps we can just make sure, you can make sure that you are completely here, present, attentive not only to the words, which are not all that important, but also to the stillness in the room. Attentive to the stillness in the room means just to notice that there is stillness here, apart from the words.

If all you're interested in here is the words, then this evening would work for you only on a conceptual level. And you have so much of that already in this civilization, information, facts, to the thinking mind, stillness is uninteresting, but you love it. And you may have to be able to just step out of the thinking mind for a moment in order to realize that you love the stillness.

And that that stillness is more than this word implies. Every word that we use to describe that, which is beyond words, reduces the reality of that. And yet we have to use words, but we don't have to be confined to using words.

And that's why it's so important, as you sit here, to be aware at the same time as you listen to the words, that there's also always the field of silence here in the room. Yes. Is that true?

Is there silence? Yes. You have to check for yourself.

Don't believe me that there's silence in the mind. Yeah, okay, there's silence. So what's next, says the thinking mind.

Because the interesting thing is, you cannot even notice that there is silence when you're immersed in a stream of thinking. Or to put it in a more extreme but true way, thought cannot even be aware of silence. Cannot notice it, because thought is inner noise.

And through inner noise, you cannot notice silence. And so, as most people are identified with a continuous stream of inner noise, they are never aware that in them, there's a deeper dimension within, underneath the continuous flux of thinking and the emotions that go with it, that in each human being, there's a much deeper dimension of consciousness. And we could use different pointers to say what it is.

One pointer is to say it is the realm of stillness, not dead, vibrantly alive stillness. And since this is a conference about the heart of happiness, that is the heart of happiness that every human carries inside. And it is also peace, inner peace.

It is only out of that dimension that external peace can finally emerge in the world, only if a sufficiently large number of humans get in touch with that dimension within them. If that does not happen on the planet soon, it's a good sign, the fact that we are sitting here, that it is happening. If it does not happen soon on a larger scale, I know it is happening.

It's just a question of whether it's happening fast enough to stop the madness, self-destructive madness that the collective human mind to a large extent has become. So we are not self-indulgent here. It's not a selfish endeavor.

It is vital, not only on a personal level for yourself to become free of unhappiness, and it's only in the deeper dimension of yourself that you can become free of unhappiness. It's also vital for the planet, for humanity. Silence is still there in the room.

What happens when you notice it? It's very subtle. There's a moment in which stillness arises in you.

It is alert, an alert, aware presence. Let's try it out. Check for yourself if the silence is still there.

Yes, for that moment, you are not thinking. It may only have been a second or two. It may have been longer.

The moment you checked for yourself whether the silence in the room was still there, something arose in you that was consciousness, freed from thought. And that's the dimension that a few humans have access to who are very creative, only in their little field of creativity, not usually yet in the rest of their lives. That is the reason also that anybody who achieves mastery in any field has access to, usually only within the realm of that little field in which they have mastery.

The moment they stop throwing the ball or whatever they have chief mastery in, they go back usually into the same relative madness of normal human consciousness or unconsciousness. So allowing that which is already in you to emerge, that dimension, because it is already in everyone. And if you can be conscious throughout this evening of both dimensions as you listen, then you're listening in a state of stillness.

You hear the words, but there is that in you that receives the words, understands the word without needing to analyze or memorize or compare to something else that you already know, simply let them be there. So that in you is deeper than the person, the personal personalized sense of self, me, me and my story. It is deeper than your life circumstances that you have to think about.

You have to remember them to remember that you have many problems. When you do not remember and so revive them through thought, if you do not remember that you have many problems, and perhaps you might've thought you were the only one here in this room, you may be surprised that I don't believe there's anybody here who does not have to some extent, a problematic life situation. That is normal.

Now, most people's attention, consciousness, conscious attention is continuously absorbed by their problematic life situation. That's what they, that occupies them. The moment they wake up, open your eyes in the morning.

For a moment, there is a clear space of stillness. You see the sky, you hear a bird. It feels good to be alive.

You may even feel the energy field in your inner body, the aliveness that is inside the body, the indwelling energy field. And this lasts maybe a minute. Then the memory comes, ah, my problems.

And then you remember what's going to happen today. And a heaviness descends upon you. It's like a cloud, a clear sky, and within one minute, enormous clouds come rolling in.

And then for the rest of the day, that is what absorbs your attention. Your face then loses that ease, that lightness, and is usually then tense, and the eyes become a little bit lifeless because you're only peripherally aware of your surroundings any longer because all your attention is in what you have to think about. What's the next thing I have to do?

Okay, oh, there's so much. Put so much on my mind today. Next, next.

So when you look at people, that's how they go through life. What are they looking for? The next thing to tackle, the next thing that's going to come.

They're not aware of what is here now. They're projecting to the next thing, and they are either hoping that the next thing will make their life a little bit better or fearing that the next thing will make their life a little bit or much worse because the future is uncertain. It gives you hope, and it gives you fear.

And between these two, normal human existence fluctuates, is torn. So you lose that. You lose something that for a moment you had.

No, did you lose it, or did it just get covered up? You cannot lose it. That's the good news.

Even if you've been immersed in mental turmoil for the past 30 years, you haven't lost it because it is indestructible. It is as indestructible as the silence in this room. That is one analogy we could use.

And it is as indestructible, to use another analogy, as the space in this room. No matter what we do here, we can make the most awful amount of noise. In the end, we will have to stop, and the silence will be back as if nothing had ever happened.

We can create the most incredible amount of chaos in this room, scream and shout and so on. Eventually, it will come to an end, and it will not have affected the space at all. It may have left, yes, it may have left an energy field of heaviness, but that also will dissipate.

That cannot affect the space. So there is something in you, one could say, that is the equivalent of, to use analogies in the external world, that is the equivalent of silence, or one could say the equivalent of space, a dimension of consciousness in you, in each human being. If you don't find that, if you're unaware of that, then it is as if it didn't exist for you.

It then is as if you were a beggar, sitting by the side of the road, here in, here out, getting a few cents from passersby, not knowing, I gave that analogy at the beginning of the Power of Now, that you've been sitting on a box filled with gold, because you never looked, or you can change a more modern analogy, not knowing that you have a secret bank account in Switzerland with $100 million in it. You don't know it, and you don't know the number, and if somebody tells you, you say, I don't believe you. There is something in you that is very different, and yet not ultimately separate from, ordinary, everyday consciousness.

Now, ordinary, everyday human consciousness is becoming more and more dysfunctional. If you want to find out if that is true, read a book on modern history. I always recommend the 20th century, if you want to learn about the dysfunction of the human mind, and if you read it as if you had never seen it before, you say, how is this possible?

How can they create hell on this planet that is potentially, and to some extent, still is a paradise, a jewel floating in space? How is it that humans can have killed 100 million other humans within 100 years? 100, more than 100 million, 10 million alone in the First World War, that was only the beginning.

And that's the dysfunction on the collective level. You can go back in history, it's the same dysfunction, but you don't see it as clearly, and perhaps it's getting worse. There are certain indications that it is getting worse.

It is certainly becoming magnified through science and technology, which intrinsically is neither good nor bad, but more often than not, science and technology are used in the service of the human dysfunction. It requires great intelligence to build, to split the atom, and great stupidity and insanity to build stockpiles and stockpiles of nuclear weapons. It requires great intelligence to figure out how to build chemical and biological weapons, and great stupidity to make them, and so on.

You have always the dual nature of the human mind, intelligent, and at the same time, incredibly stupid. And that's the collective level. And then in people's personal lives, you see so much dysfunction in the form of conflict, unhappiness, in many cases, deep unhappiness, which, underneath the surface very often in the Western world, there is a relatively polished surface to life.

People have learned to smile, but there's no inner smile. All the sick, the dying, the mad, the old people, most of them are shut away. Let's not look at that aspect of human existence.

Are we stepping out of that dysfunction now? Is a shift in consciousness possible for humanity? Yes, that's what the great teachers have always said.

That's what they pointed to. Jesus, the Buddha, the Hindu teachings, the teachings of liberation, the teachings of enlightenment, the teachings of salvation, of awakening. Thousands of years ago, the great ones already saw the dysfunction, when it wasn't even as clear yet as it is now, as obvious as staring you in the face every night you switch on the TV.

And yet they saw it already. And they saw also that there is a way beyond, a shift is possible, but they were misunderstood. Most humans were not ready yet for that.

They were misinterpreted. But they all point to the same thing. Buddha calls it freedom from suffering.

Jesus calls it salvation or the kingdom of heaven that is within, not over there, not in some other time, some other place, but here and now. Hindu teachings call it liberation, enlightenment. Yes, they were the early pioneers, the precursors.

It did not happen on a large scale because it wasn't necessary yet for it to happen on a large scale. The planet could survive very well even with the human dysfunction. But now things have changed.

A shift in consciousness has become a necessity. That's why we are here. It goes far beyond the personal and yet it also affects you on a personal level.

It frees you from the dysfunction of the human mind. Contacting that dimension within yourself. That's why we are here.

On the level of the dysfunction, yes, you can temporarily rearrange things in your life, but no ultimate transformation is there to be found. The wonderful news is that dimension in you has never gone away. And it is now emerging, pushing forward from within many, many human beings.

It wants to emerge. And that is already happening to many of you. So what does that mean?

There is something in you that is the equivalent of space. If you look out at night into the sky, I don't know if it's clear tonight. I think it is.

You will see, once your eyes get used to the darkness, thousands of suns, the stars, most of which are suns. You can see the, you look into the vastness of space, which is awe-inspiring. The infinite space that is there of which you only see a tiny, tiny fraction.

Infinite vastness. Billions of suns, not only that, billions of worlds of galaxies, each galaxy containing billions of suns. Unimaginable vastness.

And if you look there, if you want to find out about the nature of the world and become like a little child without a lot of complicated conceptualization, then you look and you see, well, there are two things that I can see. I can see things and I can see space. There are two dimensions, things and things in space, space in which these things exist.

So the world consists of things and space. Now, what is that inside you? Things inside you is whatever thoughts occur inside you.

The stream of thinking is objects that arise in your consciousness. Emotions are also energy fields that arise temporary for energetic formations that arise in your inner space. Other things that arise, sense perceptions, light, hearing, gets translated into images.

So there are objects that occupy your consciousness, objects, and most people, most people's lives are confined to that, the objects in their field of consciousness. All the thoughts that go through their head day in, day out, that's what they identified with. That's me.

Their sense of self is in every thought. Hmm, oh, so worried about what's going to happen. I really don't know.

I mean, what if he does that? But on the other hand, that shouldn't have happened. Some writers are good.

They write that in some modern literature. You have the stream of thinking on paper and you can see how mad it is. And pointless.

Thinking can be very beautiful when it's actually applied to a useful purpose, powerful, wonderful. But 90% or more of one's thought processes are repetitive, old records. Not even CDs, they're older.

Old, scratchy records that have been playing in many cases from generation to generation the same patterns I inherited from parents to their children. There are people here who are immersed in the same kinds of thoughts, maybe in a different language from their ancestors, but the same thoughts and behavior patterns that are created by those thoughts that their ancestors had 200 years ago in France, in Italy, in England, wherever, in Africa, wherever they lived. So we are stuck with that conditioned mind one thing after another comes up.

And now when we say identified, people are, they have their sense of self lodged in the stream of thinking and the emotions that go with the thinking. Oh, anger flows, they're totally in it or the sadness or so dreadful. Oh, my life, what's it all come to?

They tell themselves stories in the head and the story in the head becomes the identity. The story is partly involuntary because you've been given that by your surroundings, your parents, your upbringing, they told you stories about who you are. So partly you believe that and you add your own part of the story to that.

And so after a while you live with an identity that is the story of me. And that's what you think about, that is your life situation. And it is problematic.

That identity, that sense of self is always a problematic one. It's in its very nature to be problematic. It is also in its very nature to feel insecure and insubstantial.

It is also in its nature almost always to feel not enough. If you look deeply, what that means is, and most human beings have that, what that means is I am not enough yet. I haven't quite arrived at the completion of my sense of self.

And so the worst thing that could happen to you is for somebody to tell you that you do not have a future anymore. For example, a doctor, that happens. And that is dreadful for the identity that is derived from mind structures.

The mind made story-based sense of self because almost every story-based sense of self feels I need more time to be fully and completely myself. And they believe that if I can add certain things to my sense of self, then eventually I will reach a point where I feel I will feel complete, fully me, fully myself. So with that comes the incredible psychological need for more in people's lives.

Now, I'm not saying that it is not a wonderful thing to acquire a new object that is beautiful and that you can look at and handle or use. Yes, beautiful. That it is not a wonderful thing to explore life, to take some trips, to explore other countries, to have experiences, to meet people, to have relationships.

They're all wonderful things. It is part of living in this world of form, phenomenal reality. And so you're meant to explore and to play with the world of form, to exploit.

But that's not how most humans live. They don't play with it. They don't have a playful curiosity about the world of form.

They have an obsession with the world of form, an extreme attachment to the world of form because they are seeking themselves in the world of form. They are looking for more of me. So where it's a nice thing, if you buy a nice car, why not?

But maybe are you looking for yourself in that? Are you seeking to add the mind object car, not just car, my car, to the accumulation of mind objects that's already there in you to add to, which for a while, not for very long, makes yourself, seems to complete your identity. I have added a big car, a big mind object to the accumulation of objects that I have already.

That's me, my knowledge, my status in society, what people have told me, am I important or not important? Sometimes I think I'm important and sometimes I'm not, not quite sure. My reputation, maybe I have something on my wall, diplomas, maybe I don't.

Maybe I have other mind objects that don't look very good, but I'm hanging on to them anyway. I've been a victim of certain people or groups of people or one person who did that to me, and that can become a mind object that occupies an important part of your sense of self in the absence of something better that works very well too. Me, the victim, oh yes, it's all what the people have done to me, it's dreadful.

And I'm not saying that they didn't do things to you, but is that good to be used to give you a sense of self? What kind of a sense of self is that? It is an object in consciousness that you have put there and that you revive every day by thinking about it.

And whoever is ready to listen to it, you tell them about it, either about how bad things are for you, which are also thoughts. And some people have that as their sense of identity mainly and others will tell others at parties how great things are, what they've just bought, the important things they've just done, me. What do you do for a living?

Well, and then the story comes. A story-based identity, this is the realm of object consciousness. This is the realm of thought.

And this is what gives people their sense of self. And it is not substantial. There's always the feeling I am not complete and there's a looking out then for more.

Now in this civilization, the Western world, one dimension where that operates very strongly is the obsessive accumulation of objects, external objects to identify with, because I think it's an unconscious compulsion to acquire more things because there's some feeling of not enough yet. Okay, let's go to the shopping mall. Ah, ah, that, and I'll have two of those and three of that.

And then you come home with the bags and then you take it out. And for a while you can add that to the, oh, that's my new dress, my new shoes, my new suit, my new whatever it is. And then you hang it.

Sometimes you don't even wear it. And then that's, it's a temporary satisfaction. And then, okay, what else can I fill myself up with?

How else can I complete my always deficient sense of self? Okay, let's see. I need to meet somebody interesting.

You go out looking for, or now I need to master something. There's nothing wrong with that. I need to learn something so that I feel important and I can show them that I'm good at something.

You master something and then you can, you're better than others at it after a while. You can compare yourself to others. I'm better than, or I know more than.

Knowledge can add that, big mind objects. Or they have an image in their mind of their external appearance, which becomes a big mind object. If it happens to be good, then people will use that readily and have an image of me as better looking than most.

And so you can carry that around or in the realm of a mind made sense of self, my appearance. And now if you're not good looking, then you have to look for something else. Knowledge, that was for a few years the case with me.

I wasn't good looking, but for a few years I was reading books and studying and absorbing information. And after a while that I felt knowledgeable. And then in the academic world, you show off then with your, you see how much you know, but there's always a sense of unease because invariably you run into somebody who knows more than you.

So you walk into a room and there's unease and then you make a casual remark to show how profound your knowledge is. And then somebody else says, you're completely wrong. This theory was proven to be a fallacy three years ago.

Now, what happens when somebody does that to you and you had identified with a mind object, you said it, but it was in the service, your sense of identity was in there. It was invested with a sense of self and somebody now denies that this is untrue. Three years ago, they proved without any doubt, somebody is removing something from your sense of self.

That's why people have such enormous reactions when they are trying to be right. And how dreadful it is, how it feels like dying when somebody shows you that you are wrong, the enormous emotional violence that comes with that. And even academics sometimes start, even physical violence I have experienced there.

Why? In the service of being right. Why do they need to be right?

Because their sense of self is invested in a mental position. They don't know who they are beyond that. That's, on a collective level, people fight wars about being right.

Our religion, we are right, you are wrong. Identifying with mental positions as us, our position. We need you to be wrong because if you were not there being wrong, we would no longer know who we are.

We only define our identity through that which opposes the other. We need the other. This is built into the mind-made sense of self, the need for enemies, the need for conflict, because otherwise, the mind-made sense of self will become fluid without its boundaries.

It would lose its boundaries that it needs around the me. Now, the me can either be a predominantly personal sense of self, or it can be, as it is in some cultures, and for some people, a predominantly collective sense of self. Now, the personal sense of self of me is already mad and dysfunctional, but even more mad and dysfunctional is the collective sense of us.

That has created so much havoc and suffering on the planet. Us against them. And so they are fighting in the service of an identity.

And they need their enemies. They need the other. How does it work on a personal level?

On a personal level, when you don't know yourself beyond mind, you need to be in conflict with something or someone to uphold your sense of self. You need your problems. You need your enemies.

Whether the enemy is a person or a situation. Prolonged peace would be threatening to that sense of self. And this is, collectively, you can see it while they talk about peace, but there is no peace.

They talk about the peace process, the road to peace, the roadmap to peace. Where are they not going? There's no peace.

They're just words about peace because they are not ready yet for peace. They don't want the... So humans live in conflict in their own lives.

The egoic sense of self needs enemies. Situations, people, and so on, to be in conflict with. And all that is unconscious.

What is the greatest enemy of the egoic sense of self? The arch enemy of the egoic sense of self? The present moment.

That's why, for most people... Now, this is... That's why, for most people, the present moment is felt to be an obstacle to overcome.

They live as if the present moment were an obstacle almost continuously that they need to overcome. Now, since the present moment is all there ever is, since there is nothing ever that is not the present moment, never has been, and never will be, you can see how dysfunctional it is when you make life, which is inseparable from the present moment, into your enemy. And so there is a continuously denial of now.

If people live, we can see in people's faces how they deny the now because they're looking to the next now, not this one, the only one there is. The next one is a mind object no more because the future only exists as a mental formation. Nobody's ever met it.

Nobody's ever experienced the future. It is a thought form. Past and future are thought forms.

Yes, in this realm, they seem to exist. They seem to be very real. They even seem to consume your body.

If you get older and older, eventually your body shrinks like an apple that's a few weeks old. And then finally it goes. Yes, and yet there's a strange paradox.

Life is always this moment. Your entire life unfolds in that space of now, that space of now. Now here we have the portal into the transformed consciousness, the space of now.

What most people believe is that their lives consist of thousands and thousands of moments, even every day, so many different moments, another moment and another moment because they believe that the form that this moment takes is the present moment. But it isn't. It's only the form that appears in the space of now.

It's always now. It's always the same now. No matter what form comes, the space of now is always the same.

It's always this moment. No matter what happens to you, one thing is certain. No matter what will ever happen to you, one thing is certain.

It will happen in the now. Now this sounds almost weird to the mind. Yeah, well, of course.

The mind doesn't know what to do with it. It almost stops the mind. Ah, so that must be true then.

It must be good. There's only this moment ever. All that people are aware of is the form that this moment takes.

They are not aware of the space of this moment. All they are aware of is the forms in their consciousness. They are not aware of the space that enables all the mental forms to be there.

And what they do is their egoic identity, the story-based sense of self says, this moment is not enough, not good enough. It's not fulfilling me. I need more.

Because of the need and the search for more, there's a desperate focus on future. Future is okay for making little practical plans, but there's a desperate psychonautical need for future because the sense of identity believes that only the future will give you the more that you need to be fully yourself. And people who have acquired more and more realize at some point that they still don't feel fulfilled.

No matter how many mental objects they accumulate, external objects that become mental objects, no matter how much they accumulate, always there's this feeling, not enough yet. And so you find many wealthy people desperately searching for more experiences that they want to buy. Let's try this new drug, or more and more relationships, or more and more journeys, travel here and there, try this, nothing is ultimately fulfilling, only a little bit of, and then finally they may realize it's not to be found on that level.

It's not to be found on that. I cannot find myself there. I cannot find myself through adding more to who I think I am.

I can play with form, it's beautiful, explore this, learn a new language, but if I'm using it to find myself, it will never satisfy me, it won't do the job. And what people are desperately longing for is to have a deep feeling of rootedness, of identity, of being truly who you are, of being a sense of deep, deep safety, security, and aliveness. That's what they ultimately want, to feel your being as a continuous state.

And nothing in the world of objects, thought objects, can do that for you. Nothing, no matter how much more you add, can do that for you. In other words, no future, no matter how much more future you have, can do that for you to help you find who you truly are.

The only access point to that is now, because you already are fully yourself on the deepest level. Only on the level of form could you add more. It does not complete who you are.

And people learn that lesson sometimes who have accumulated much on the level of form and lose everything. They suddenly lose every one of the accumulated forms, relationships, possessions, status, jobs, reputation, money, all forms that I identified with as me, there's a moment of dreadful fear and panic, and then it has sometimes happened to some of them that suddenly there was enormous peace and clarity. For the first time in their life, they experienced the sense of inner space.

And they experienced it because the accumulation of objects in their mind crumbled. That is the grace that is hiding behind death and any kind of deep loss. Because there's always a potential when some objects leave you, that that which you are underneath the level of objects can then emerge.

But it can also emerge when your attention moves into the present moment and you realize first that this is all there ever is. And secondly, you realize the insanity of denying, resisting, running away from the present moment, whatever form it takes. Which is what the ego, the egoic self tends to do.

Once you see the insanity of not welcoming the present moment, you're able to say, let's see what happens if I say yes to the form that this moment takes. It changes always. But this moment, the form that it takes, whatever happens right now, the form that it takes right now, am I able to align myself internally with the form that this moment takes because I realize that what is already is.

And it is absurd to argue with the isness of this moment because you cannot change what is. Then you can take action. Once you have aligned yourself with the isness and say, yes, that's how it is.

I'm stuck in the mud here up to my neck. That's what is. Or you can resist that moment.

If you resist that moment, you will react. You will start thrashing out and you will sink deeper into the mud. And if you align yourself with now, suddenly a power comes into your life that comes from the space consciousness that is underneath the conditioned human mind.

Action arises suddenly that is just right to deal with whatever challenge you're facing at this moment. So a power and an intelligence far greater than the reactive human mind comes into your life when you align your life with now, which is the form that this moment takes instead of habitually running away from it, denying it. Then the focal point of your life becomes always this moment.

On the periphery of your life, of course, there is past and future. You know at five o'clock, I have to be at such and such a place. But this is not occupying your consciousness totally.

What is occupying your conscious attention is what you need to face at this moment. And if you're traveling from A to your appointment, five o'clock appointment somewhere else, where are you as you are traveling towards the five o'clock appointment? Where are you between four and five while you travel?

Mentally rehearsing what you're going to say, thinking the problems that might arise at five o'clock when you meet that person, fantasizing about what will happen when you meet them, or being somewhere else, you're missing your life. Now, very often, the form that this moment takes does not look very interesting superficially to the mind. I'm sitting on a plane going somewhere.

I've got another four hours before we arrive. So you're thinking, usually your attention would be absorbed by your life situation. All the problems, things that have happened, that are going to happen, might happen, should have happened but didn't, stories.

You're missing the enormous power that is there concealed underneath the stream of thinking in you. What could it be like if you were in touch with the present moment at that time? You would be sitting there.

Occasionally, you would look out of the window. You could see the shimmering light, the clouds, down below, perhaps mountains, the enormous clarity of the sky. There would be a sense of wonder because there isn't a thought.

I've seen this so many times already. I'm not looking out of the window anymore. I've seen it so many times.

No, you haven't. This is, it's fresh and new. You're denying life by saying, okay, that's an old, I've been on a plane, it's 500 times.

It's nothing new. It's just, look. Can you feel that you are still alive?

Can you feel the enormous aliveness that dwells in your body, in every cell, that's vibrant with life? Feel that as you sit there. See, look, watch the people.

Can you be aware as you sit there, as sense perceptions happen, can you be aware of the now as the inner field of aware presence in which all those beautiful sense perceptions happen? Can you be aware of that field of spacious, vibrantly alive stillness in which you're seeing, hearing, feeling? That's who you are.

Life itself, not some heavy little person with a problematic life situation that exists, yes, on its own little level, but more vitally, who are you underneath that absurd life situation? Everybody's life situation is complicated, but also absurd. In a few years, as I say in the Stillness Speaks, it will be the dash between your date of birth and your date of death on your gravestone.

That will be what's left of your life situation and all the problems. So yes, you give it its due. Of course, you deal with things, the things of this world, but if they absorb your life, they suck the life out of you, the world of objects, the world of things, of mind objects and of physical objects, the world says, this matters, this is absolutely important.

Nothing is absolutely important. It's absolutely important that you know who you are. Then the rest will flow more easily, more powerfully.

So get to, so you're sitting on this plane or you're sitting right here, of course, it's the same. You're sitting right here. Are you sitting here with a heavy little me, identified with every thought that goes through the head?

I don't understand what he's talking about. And I don't want to understand what he's talking about. Don't listen to this.

It could be dangerous. It could be dangerous. Okay, think about your problems, the things that are really important or that you have to tackle when you get back home.

Yeah, I really, I shouldn't have come here because all the stuff that I haven't, that I left behind or, oh, oh, oh. Do you carry that around as who you are? Or is there something far greater, far deeper?

So do you derive your sense of self from object consciousness or from the vast spaciousness, the vast field of spacious awareness that makes it all possible for even an object, for even a thought to be there? The unconditioned dimension of consciousness that is in you waiting to be discovered. Yourself, ultimately, it is finding something that you've been looking for in the wrong places all your life.

You've been looking for it through more. And you don't need more. You can then play with more, yes, playful, but you don't need more of anything to find yourself.

Some people find themselves in the last 10 seconds of their lives before the accident kills them. Wow, no fear left, nothing left, just an enormous sense of alive peace and serenity. And a few of them survive.

And then they said, I don't know what happened. I could see the accident was coming, but suddenly all fear left me and it became, there was an incredible sense of peace and aliveness. And I knew all is well.

I knew there was nothing to fear anymore suddenly. On that level of your being, fear disappears because fear is to do with identifying with form, the form of me, not realizing that is not, that is who you appear as that form temporarily, yes. But you are life underneath the temporary appearance of a person.

More fundamentally, you are life itself in one of its manifold expressions and a beautiful expression, as beautiful, if not more beautiful, than the incredibly beautiful flowers and whatever else, whatever other form life takes. And the human is an incredible form. It's a form that hasn't flowered yet, but is about to flower because when a human realizes their true nature, who they are underneath the forms they had identified with as themselves, that is awakening, that is freedom, freedom from a personalized limited sense of self.

And then your life on a personal level continues. Your life situation continues, but miraculously something from that dimension flows into also the life of the formal life that you still lead. And because you are connected at that level with the totality of life.

So when you connect with that within yourself, the intelligence of the universe becomes helpful. The one intelligence, the one consciousness that underlies the entire world of manifestation, the billions of forms that, as it's called in the Tao Te Ching, the ancient Chinese book of wisdom, it's called the 10,000 things to describe the world of form. Of course, it's not 10,000 things.

It's not even 10 billion things. It's more than that. That's the world of, and that world of form unfolds much more harmoniously, playfully, and is fulfilling because you're not looking for something in the world of form that it cannot give you.

You're no longer demanding that any situation, any possession, any place, or any person, or any condition should fulfill you or make you happy. Please make me happy. Big house, make me happy.

Holiday, make me happy. Husband, wife, make me happy. Read the Lonely Hearts columns, looking for man or woman to make me happy.

What a dreadful, nobody could live up to that. Nothing in the world of form can live up to that. Because the happiness is already there.

You just haven't a true happiness which is deeper. I would not even perhaps use the word because happiness is usually used for superficial things. Oh, I'm so happy I've got this new thing here.

I'm so happy I found, I'm in love. I'm getting married tomorrow. And so the thing that makes you happy today, the very same thing very often makes you unhappy tomorrow.

Think of your ex-wife or husband. When I do not resist the form that this moment takes, and I welcome it because I realize that I cannot argue with the isness of this moment. It is, it is, what can you do?

There it is. And so I allow this moment to be as it is internally. By doing that, this act of welcoming, of saying yes, of allowing, puts you in touch with the dimension of inner space.

And you sometimes perceive it as if there were suddenly space around the event that before you would have reacted against. You say, well, there it is. The thing is broken down.

That's what is. Okay, we can take action now. But right in the meantime, this is what is.

Before you would have reacted and you said, they should have done something about it. How can they allow this to happen? This shouldn't happen.

I mean, I paid money for this and now it's breaking, it's broken down. I'm going to sue you. Sue them.

They can see that reactivity comes from a place of complaining and the egoic sense of self loves that. It complains about something that is. I'm not saying do something about it.

That's not complaining. The inner complaining about something that is is part of the resistance to what is. Identify in yourself the complainer.

And that is a very important part of the reactivity of the egoic sense of self. What is it complaining about? The present moment.

What's happening right now shouldn't be happening, but it is. Now, the complaining is so satisfying to the false sense of self because it strengthens it. When you can complain about something, you're saying I'm right and the situation is wrong.

Such, the weather is really miserable today. It's just awful. I'm right, the weather is wrong.

On all levels, any complaining puts you in an imagined position of superiority to the event or to something that's madness, but normal. By the way, normal equals very often, more often than not, mad. Read human history if you doubt it.

So to complain strengthens the false sense of self to allow it. It strengthens so if you complain and react, your own form identity, the me, gets strengthened. The story gets strengthened.

The complaint is incorporated in the story and then you pick up the phone and say, you can't imagine what happened just to me. I'll tell you about it. Oh no, and then you get some feedback.

Oh, you're right, you really should be unhappy about this. So it strengthens the illusion of who you are, but it feels satisfying to the illusion, the illusory me for a moment feels great. I'm really getting into this.

Now, when you allow what is, it doesn't strengthen your form. It puts you in touch with that which has no form in you. It makes you aware of space, inner space.

So here's an event, the thing is broken down and instead of saying, oh, well, there it is. Okay. Suddenly, the same event has a totally different quality to it in your experience.

That means you suddenly experience life completely differently. The same event happens and you say, well, there it is. And suddenly, now I'm speaking metaphorically, it is as if there was suddenly some space around the event.

It no longer occupies your attention totally. There's a spaciousness around the event when you allow it. The allowing is very spacious and that spaciousness is consciousness itself, stillness, inner stillness.

And from there, you can look at a challenging situation in that alert stillness. You're looking and there's a moment of just no thought, simply aware attention, which is your deeper, non-conceptual, unconditioned intelligence comes into action. And you look and then action arises.

Or a thought comes out of that, from where all creativity comes, that level, a thought comes and you suddenly know what you have to do about it. Oh, that's, and you do it. Or an action comes immediately, you do the right thing.

So there's enormous power in facing the present moment, no matter what form it takes, completely and fully, allowing it, facing it, looking, listening, seeing. And there's always more, far more than you need to deal with the situation. The power is there the moment you need it.

But if you project yourself into imaginary problems, how can you deal with that? It can only wear you down. And you get drawn into more and more illusory identity.

So the shift in consciousness happens with a simple act of aligning yourself with what is now, with the present moment. And making that your spiritual practice, the ultimate spiritual practice. And while you're here, see how you are relating to the present moment.

What is your relationship with the present moment? You're denying it, resisting it, or welcoming it. Since it's life itself, you might as well welcome it.

It is more skillful, more intelligent, more wise to welcome what is, and then experience how quickly, if the present moment is challenging, how quickly help comes from within you, but also sometimes from without, as a helpful event, as a sudden thing that happens. How could that suddenly, just the right thing? Because this is the alignment with the totality.

At this deeper level, you are one with one consciousness. You are that. Yes, it's, life can be easy.

That we're not, it doesn't mean challenges will not come anymore. Challenges come. But you can become more alert through every challenge rather than becoming more unconscious through every challenge.

Oh, and you watch. But don't wait for challenges. Use that power that is there every moment, even the beautiful moments.

Here you are in nature. You can see trees, flowers, leaves. Yes, they are dying, but in their deaths, they are beautiful.

Nature, incredible beauty everywhere. Do you truly see it? And when you see it, what happens when you look at a tree and the leaves are dark red or yellow and red?

Are you able to look in complete awareness, complete presence? Be so present that you don't need to interpret what you're seeing. Just look, oh.

Are you able to allow that moment to be as it is without needing to add anything to it?

Just that. Right?

And can you then be aware of the sense perception, which is beautiful, but something that is even more beautiful and deeper? And that's yourself. Who are you?

The awareness, the conscious awareness through which that sense perception happens. And that you cannot grasp. It cannot become an object in your consciousness because it is formless consciousness, not a mind object.

So stillness arises from within more and more as you go through life. And there's enormous power and intelligence in that stillness. It's primordial intelligence.

The human mind is secondary intelligence, very limited, but good for certain things. No good for many other things. For relationships, it's not very good to relate with other humans.

But if you can bring stillness into your relationships, even superficial ones, you can just look. Allow that moment in which that human being appears in front of you to be there fully. Welcome that moment when it takes the form of another human being.

Oh. And there's, again, you're looking, and there's stillness as you look, just looking, alert, attention. Then the compulsive labeling arises less and less in your life.

And if it should still arise, the mind saying something about someone, you recognize it as, yeah, just a thought, not really the truth, because every thought is only one of many possible perspectives about any situation. There's no ultimate truth there, but it's a thought. So you don't have to believe in every thought that comes into your head.

You recognize it as a thought, and it comes and goes, and then the sense of separation between you and the other human being, and also the sense of separation between you and nature that arises because you inhabit a conceptualized reality in the head, labels, judging, interpreting, judging, thinking about, yeah, I wonder what he does, what, I wonder how I can use him. Me. That conceptualized identity, conceptualized reality, and conceptualized identity operate less and less.

That is the shift in consciousness from inhabiting a reality that is made up of thought and concepts to actually touching a deeper reality in yourself. And so when you do that, when the barriers are not there, there's love in the true sense of the word, because whatever you look upon without the conceptual barriers in openness, Jesus said, we must become like little children if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven. What does he mean?

We have to go back to complete ignorance? No, all he means is he just gives you that as an image to see how does a little child look at the world, a one-year-old who hasn't learned concepts yet. Complete openness, you can sense the consciousness that flows through, is still, and then comes conceptualization.

Dad, what's that called? The first concept and another word on top of that and another word, and then a little later, the human mistakes the concept for the reality. That's a tree.

Oh, now I know what it is. You don't know what it is at all. You only had to put a label to the mystery.

On top of the mystery, you stick a label, tree. It's the depths is already obscure to you of what is there and the aliveness of what's there. And then you do it to yourself.

John Smith from such and such a state, college, family background, religion, a few beliefs, mix them all together in a pot. That's me. Find the stillness that's already there, just waiting.

Perceive the world through that as much as possible. Use this place here where there's nature. It's easier to do it when there's natural things, not man-made.

Walk around in wonder. But when you perceive a tree, you don't regress to the stage of a child. There's a deep knowing.

You have gone beyond concepts. The child hasn't arrived at concepts yet. Very great difference.

You have then transcended the conditioned human mind. Alertness is vital. That's an essential part of that.

The alertness, being awake to the wonder of life, which is outside and even greater wonder inside you. Because inside you, you are consciousness itself. Temporarily as this physical form and psychological form, but underneath it, you are that which is the essence of every life form.

And then you look upon every life form in a sense of recognition. You see that essence of who you are in every form of life. That is called also compassion.

That is also called love. They're ultimately the same thing. Loving care flows then into your interactions and your actions.

You're stepping out of thousands of years of collective human conditioning, a dreadful burden. The good news is we do not need thousands of years to step out of it. Cause and Miracle says, it has taken time to misguide you so completely, but it takes no time at all to be who you are.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Talk Retreat Dimension Of Stillness in Human Relationships

[Speaker 1] (1:33 - 1:29:59)

Welcome, I'm inviting you to be here fully, to inhabit this moment completely, to make yourself at home in this moment, the now, or whatever is, the now, and it's so normal not to be at home in the now, but to look for your home somewhere else. And that deeply conditioned mind pattern, collective, if it is operating in you at this moment, you will already feel restless or impatient and a little voice in the head saying, come on, get on with it. This need to get on with it is the need to move away from now to future, looking for your home, for yourself.

A little hint that may make it easier to be here fully is to feel a certain connectedness with the inner energy field of the body as you sit here. Simply to, it's not complicated, simply to sense that the body is alive, to sense an underlying, this underlying field of aliveness. So some of your attention is there.

It's subtle, but in a very subtle way, yes. Of course the body is alive, every cell is alive. Every cell is intelligent, more intelligent than the human mind.

So just to sense that, so to inhabit the now, one aspect of being fully present, a very rare state so far on this planet. One aspect of that is to also to inhabit the body, to be in it, to have some attention in it. So you're rooted, not totally in the head, not totally in your stream of thoughts, but with some attention in that aliveness that is here.

And then it's easier to sit here and listen to a speaker who is not saying very much, who is giving nothing to believe in or even arousing your emotions. Then it's easier to be here with yourself. So we are here to experience the possibility of living in a different state of consciousness from the normal state, which is not to be here.

To be identified with the stream of thought, which is always about past and future. And as you sit here, sensing, even as you listen, that yes, there is an aliveness throughout my body. And you feel that, and there's enough attention left to listen.

So you're entering a state of alert presence. And in that state you're aware of the words, and in themselves the words so far have not been very important. Because they point to something, that's all.

In themselves they are nothing. So you can be here and allow a state of alert presence to arise, in which you are able to allow this moment, the now, to be. So I'm inviting you to enter that state of consciousness together.

Which from the point of view of the thinking mind, and from the point of view of that sense of self, that is derived from continuous activity, the conceptualized me in the head, with its story, its name, its accumulation of experiences. From the point of view of that mind made self, this state of consciousness is not significant. It cannot be recognized by thought as significant.

Thought is interested in the next thing, not this. Thought is saying, okay, you've been talking about the now for ten minutes now, what's next? I want to move on to the next thing.

I've come here to be filled up, to be given something, to add something to the content of my mind, that I can take home. And it's not coming. Because nothing needs to be added to you.

And to see that, ultimately, to be yourself fully, nothing needs to be added. That's an amazing revelation. Because everybody's looking to add something to me, to improve me through adding, to make me more complete, the self.

I want to be bigger, more important, more spiritual, more wealthy, more secure, powerful. And if you can't have that, it'll be happy to say, I'm miserable and I want to be even more miserable. A mind made sense of self, a story, happy, unhappy, more unhappy than happy.

And from the point of view of that, this state of consciousness that we are allowing to arise is not significant. Presence, how does that solve my problems? How does that add more to me?

And yet it solves all your problems. So as we sit here, to continue to feel that inner connectedness with the body, and occasionally detect a little voice in the head that's complaining, not enough. I'm not being fed.

Give me something to grasp. And of course, usually this is what happens in this building, an institution of learning or education, where you're being fed information. And you're being told many things, taught many things, except what really matters.

So even if you notice restlessness arising, notice it, watch that, allow that also to be. Allow this moment to be. You might as well, because this moment is always as it is.

There is a suchness to now, the only place there ever is, or that maybe not everybody in this room may know that there's only now. You can remember the past, but only the now. And what you remember once was the now, otherwise it couldn't have happened.

There would be nothing to remember. So it's the power, the light of now that gives life to the past, and the future, a mental projection. Some project it now, one day this is going to happen, tomorrow.

When it comes, it's not the future anymore, it's the now. And you can only project a future now. You can only think of a future now.

When it comes, it comes as the now. So this is an important realization, because we are moving into the now, and it's good to see how vital that is, because it is life itself. And humans live as if the now were totally not only insignificant, they live trying to get away from it, always, except for rare moments and, ah, I have arrived.

But you never arrive for very long, and then you realize you haven't arrived. I've made it. Oh no, I haven't made it.

So, present moment awareness is why we are here. Not to acquire new ideas. To allow that state that one could call awareness, now awareness, which is a new state of consciousness for human beings, allow that to arise.

And something in you loves it and responds to it. And something else in you would rather be somewhere else, and is saying, this isn't getting me anywhere. And one or two or more of you may leave, because you're not being given content for the mind.

And so you can go from here maybe to a lecture at a higher place of learning, and you will get all that. Lecture on Buddhist philosophy. So much to learn, and yet the essence is so amazingly simple.

So as we sit here, we settle into now. And if something within doesn't feel settled in the now, you notice that. Maybe a little knot in the chest, a little heaviness here, you notice that.

Allow that. An openness, you bring an openness to now, instead of arguing with now or trying to run away from it. So present moment awareness arises, which is a state of great intelligence.

All creativity comes out of that. That state is known by anyone who has achieved mastery in any field. In that field of mastery, he or she is able to access that state of consciousness, where you are no longer dependent on the accumulated knowledge, although that may come into play, you are not dependent on the accumulated knowledge of the mind, where newness can come in.

A new creation, a new insight, realization, fresh, new, alive. That cannot be created by the human mind. The human mind can be a tool in giving that form, but it cannot be derived from the human mind, which is a kind of a computer.

It stores information, it analyzes information, it distinguishes between this and that. As that it works quite well. But creative comes from a deeper place of where the one intelligence that expresses itself in form as the universe, where that resides in each human being, that one intelligence that is far greater than the conditioned little intelligence of the mind.

It encompasses it, but it's far greater. And that is accessible to every human being as that state of consciousness, of presence. And anybody who has achieved mastery in any field is familiar with that state, even if they don't know it.

They may not be able to talk about it, but they sit and an alertness arises. They're not trying to get away from this moment, oh I need to get there. There's total attention to the field of now.

And then the creative impulse comes, or the creative insight happens. And then perhaps at that stage the mind gives it expressions, perhaps through words, or some movement happens, the artist, or even to the scientist, the problem he's been thinking about for hundreds of hours, suddenly he or she enters the state of aware presence in which thought, mind activity subsides. But you don't lose consciousness at all.

There's full awakened consciousness, unconditioned, it has nothing to do with your past. It can arise at any point in your life. Sometimes it arises accidentally, when people are faced with death, or a very dangerous situation that the mind could not cope with, and then the mind steps aside.

And that intelligence takes over while that critical situation lasts. And then people admire you and say, you did such a great thing, and you realize you didn't do anything, it happened. I didn't do anything, I just did it, I don't know.

You are a hero. Well, no, I didn't do anything. So that human beings here and there have tasted that, but it has never arisen on the planet as a new state of consciousness, not collectively, it's happened to a few individuals here and there, and in many cases only in the isolated field of their activity, those who created great things.

And then, as a way of habitual state of consciousness for a few so-called masters who dwell in that new state, but it is the destiny of all humans to become masters, to be masters, to embody that transformed consciousness. That's why we're here. So that needs to be seen, how important it is for you to allow that state to arise.

And it wants to arise. The intelligence wants to move through this form and flower through this form. Humanity on the whole has not yet flowered.

A few flowers here and there, Buddha, Jesus, many of them misunderstood, and a few that we don't know about. And a few partial flowers, great artists, for example. Partial flowers because they were not yet able to live in that state, but they had access to it in their field of endeavor.

And now, because we're arriving at a very critical stage on this planet, this state needs to arise in humans as the next evolutionary step for mankind. We can't get out of our problems on the same level of consciousness that created the problems, neither on a personal level nor on a collective level. Accumulating more information, more facts, memorize more facts, is that going to solve humanity's problems?

Analysis? It's still the same state of consciousness in which you identified with a mind-made image that is never fulfilled for long, and it needs more. It needs its enemies because it defines its sense of me through others, and it feels stronger in its illusory sense of self.

Me, my story, my name, my history. Humans don't know themselves beyond that, and that covers up that which is unconditioned in each human being, the unconditioned consciousness, because they're totally identified with the conditioned, derive their sense of self from that. And so why we are here is to allow that unconditioned to arise, and this gathering here is part of the transformation of human consciousness.

I'm not giving you some new idea that says it's all going to change at some future point. It's changing already. Otherwise you wouldn't be here if that change were not operating through you, you wouldn't be here.

Except one or two who got dragged here against their will. You must come to this and listen. I don't want to listen to this.

But sometimes even those who got dragged to a gathering suddenly listen. Oh, they recognize something as if they had known it. But this does not, let's not mislead ourselves and make this into a new interesting idea to believe in.

And that idea would be, consciousness is changing. I believe that now. It's not enough.

You've only strengthened your sense of self by identifying with a new belief, and perhaps feeling a little bit more important now, because it's changing through me. And you will know that this is the case when somebody that you meet after this gathering, maybe your partner, your parents or a friend, and you say something about it and they say, no, that's not happiness, it's just nonsense. And you get defensive.

Oh, what are you defending? Yourself. A mental position.

It's become a mental position. And mental positions need to be defended when you identify with a mental position. You derive your sense of self from that mental position.

You need to defend yourself. I'm right. No, you're wrong.

With a lot of emotional violence sometimes. So we're not making it into some new mind stuff. It's easy to happen.

This is how religions arise. At the core of it, there is a deep truth. And then the mind comes in and makes it into something to believe in, and to argue with, and make others wrong, and make yourself right.

Oh, great. Killing others to show that you are right. In that delusion, to make somebody else wrong can be a war on a collective level.

Religious war. Nationalistic war. What on a personal level is the making someone wrong, the need to be right?

Identifying with thought. Completely. That is coming to an end.

And what arises is a state of consciousness that one cannot really talk about because all the words are created by the mind. It's a miracle that one talks about it. The words, however, are not it.

They are only pointers. And if you're trying to understand what I'm pointing to, you won't. It can only be known directly.

How? Allow this moment to be as it is. Align yourself with now.

This is how we started, and this is the central core of our gathering, is to align yourself internally with now. It does not mean that you now become lethargic and no action will ever happen again. The opposite is true.

It is a state that is both deeply at rest and, if needed, dynamic. That state of alignment with now will respond immediately to whatever challenge presents itself in your life at this moment. Action will arise out of that state, out of that intelligence that is in that state.

Far more effective action than action that comes out of the state of denial of now and needs to arrive at some future point to make myself bigger, to get somewhere, to achieve anger, restlessness, not enough. I have to make it. So to become familiar with that incredible state of unconditioned presence, which is the state that...

Nothing else is the whole teaching in Zen, and some of you have read books about Zen or even practiced Zen, and it's usually regarded as very enigmatic teaching. You can't quite figure out what they're talking about. People spend years studying, trying to figure out what are they actually saying?

And there's some deep, some obscure sense that there's something important here, but I continue to miss it. And there are even monks in Zen monasteries who miss it. And it's so simple, it's all embodied, it's all expressed in the beautiful gesture of the Zen master, who would only ever give one answer to the question, what is Zen?

And his answer was wordless. It was this. And more people got it through this Zen master than other Zen masters who gave verbal explanations or would hit you with a stick, that's another method.

And if they didn't get it when he did that, and he looked very fierce, the way Zen masters look, it shocks you into awakening. But those who didn't get it, they said, did you hear my question? It didn't work.

To become familiar, and I haven't very often gone into it as I'm doing this evening, you must be ready for it, otherwise it wouldn't be happening, what arises in humans, in you, now, is something amazing. It is both simple and profound and amazing and an amazing evolutionary leap. And what is that?

It is the state of, and now not loss of consciousness, instead an enormous intensification of consciousness, compared to which the state of thought is a dreamlike state, as particularly the state of being identified with thought continuously, with that stream of mental noise, which is still the normal state, is a dreamlike state compared to the state of being free of thought. Not that thought will never again arise, but you become familiar with that state in which there is a simple, clear space of alert presence. And the mind is not labelling what is.

The allowing is so deep that it is not necessary to interpret this moment. A greater intelligence than the little conditioned intelligence that is labelling or interpreting this moment now comes into operation. But from the point of view of the mind, the labelling intelligence, the analytical information-gathering mind, from the point of view of that, the state of no thought looks as if you didn't know anything anymore, and it's frightened of that state.

And the amazing thing is, in many of you, because that state, it is an evolutionary universal impulse, that state wants to arise through humans now, and in many of you it is already arising at all kinds of moments, but it's often not recognised for what it is, because the mind cannot recognise it, it can't do anything, there's nothing there for the mind. The mind is object consciousness, it is consciousness with content. You are conscious, the mind is always identified with some content, thought forms, some form.

And when you walk through the city, you can see how the mind is either commenting on what you see, even that is rare, because most of the time the mind is totally elsewhere, and you just have just enough awareness not to bump into people, you're just peripherally aware of your surroundings, just enough, but otherwise you're thinking about something much more important than this moment. And of course it's some form of next moment, so much more important, what you need to get there as quickly as possible, that's normal. And it's so easy to overlook that this state is already arising in you, but it's immediately obscured again by mental noise.

So one thing that you can do is to watch the arising of the state that is free of thought, it is a state of simple, clear, alert presence. It is alert, but relaxed at the same time. And that is the essence of who you are, is that field of aware presence.

That can only be now, it is inseparable from now. That is actually the essence of now, of what now means. There is a now that is associated with objects that arise in the now, that's mind, thoughts, sense perceptions, people, situations, events, they arise, objects in consciousness arise.

Most humans only know themselves as an object in consciousness, they only know themselves as a story that they are telling themselves, my past. Who are you? The name, which is a sequence of sounds, not much more.

I am John Smith. Oh, okay, now I know. And then there is a role that is in consciousness that you identify with.

Society has given you maybe two or three roles. So you ask, who are you? You get the name as an answer, then you get I'm a mother of three, I'm an accountant, I'm a divorcee, I'm unemployed, I'm a professor of such and such, or whatever it may be, or I'm somebody who has been treated unfairly by life all his life, let me tell you about it.

And so, that's all people know. Mind objects, they derive their sense of identity from mind objects, thoughts, an accumulation of certain thoughts and images in the mind, and it becomes a me. Now, the reason why people cannot stop thinking, it seems that they can't, but they can as the new consciousness is arising, but it's compulsive still to a large extent.

Thought is compulsive. Everybody, almost everybody, the stream of thinking, they don't, I must think, think, think, think, think, all day long, you must think about something, even when there's nothing to think about, you must think, think. And psychologists examine that, even psychologists who are not aware of that there's a new consciousness arising, or if you told them that they would say, come to me for treatment, but even psychologists, they have examined the nature of thought and what kinds of thoughts go through people's heads, and they've come to the conclusion in several studies that ninety-eight percent of, or ninety-nine percent of thought activity is totally repetitive. The same thoughts go through your head again and again.

But the mind is telling you this is terribly important. I need to take responsibility for my life, these are big problems that I'm thinking about. And you have no time for presence, your problems are too important for that.

And you can see the absence when you look into people's eyes sometimes, you can see there's nobody there. They are not here, they are in some, it's they're not really looking, the look is inwards, all their consciousness is absorbed by thought, and that's where their attention is. It can't go out, it goes back in.

There's no emanation, there's no energy coming out of them, it's like a thick veil has descended. And when you look, you can clearly see that they are somewhere totally different, a mind projection. Future probably, unless they're so old that there's little future left, in which case they live in the past.

And the strange thing is, you're fooling yourself that your thinking serves a useful purpose, that it's actually there to figure out how to solve your problems. But it's actually creating far more problems than solving. The amazing thing is, useless thinking is the place where problems are being created.

There is no problem here, now. Now I can hear one or two minds saying, surely the world is full of problems and dreadful things are happening at this very moment, are you telling me that that's all an illusion? No.

Of course dreadful things are happening at this moment, and that's because it is an externalization of the normal human state of consciousness, which is very dysfunctional now, especially in its final stage. That's very dysfunctional. So enormous problems, yes, but are we solving them?

The peace process, another peace process, and more bombs, and more peace process, and more bombs. It's only from a different state of consciousness that these things can be solved. Now let's look at your own life, which seems that your identity is partly, consists of problems.

The sense of who you feel you are, an essential ingredient in that sense of me, my life situation, my past, my possible future, if there is one, because you can never be sure, my past, my future, that I hope there is a future because I need to complete my story and make it work. It's not really working yet. Not yet.

But any day now, this is actually going to work. That's a strange thing that it doesn't really work in anybody, not for very long, and then again it's, oh, because the story cannot give you a satisfying sense of self. It is only content in the head.

So it's never satisfying for long, you never complete yourself in it, and even if the world thinks you have, when you look into these people who seem to have made it, and even scientists, you realize that even they often think, no, I haven't really solved the ultimate problem yet. Even Einstein, who was a deeply, very much in touch with his inner being, more than most other scientists, hadn't arrived at, hadn't worked out the entire secret of the universe, whatever it was, the unified field theory, or whatever it was called, he couldn't work that out. But to the world, he was the greatest of scientists, and he was, because he had access to that.

And yet, on the level of his story, it didn't seem to have worked out either, because he couldn't figure out the ultimate secret of the universe. So the story cannot work structurally. In the very structure of that sense of self is contained the element of unsatisfactoriness, of not working, not satisfying you, not completing you.

So it's great to see that, oh, that means your life situation is no longer all-absorbing. It does not absorb your entire attention any more. It's a desperate search to make it, to arrive, to attain, and that goes.

And then you realize there's something far more vital than your life situation. Not that you don't honour it as your situation unfolds in time. You have a role in relation to society, temporary roles, you honour that, without seeking yourself in it, you play the role of mother for a while.

Without being totally identified with the role, then you become a stifling mother. But if you can play, you can honour your role beautifully, without being absorbed in it and deriving your sense of identity from it and thinking that's who I am, because the role comes to an end. The chairman of the big corporation retires, and then he sits there, and the phone doesn't ring any more, and nobody tells him who he is any more.

And he had never inquired more deeply before. It's sometimes a little late when you reach old age, and you have never inquired more deeply into who you are beyond objects in consciousness. So here arises that which in ancient traditions is sometimes called the self, not the little self, the Atman, the one universal intelligence that is the essence of your identity.

It arises as simple, thoughtless awareness. One could say stillness, that's only a small aspect of it. It is an inner field of stillness, and yet it is so alert.

And when you find for the first time there are moments when you can look upon something, perhaps some in nature, perhaps it is a tree, a flower, you perceive it, and it is not being labelled by the mind. That is the arising of thoughtless awareness. There is a knowing in that, but it is very different from what the thinking mind calls knowing.

And you haven't lost the labels. If a label should be needed, it's there. But it's no longer absorbing all your attention, the conceptualised world of labels.

So, so far humans have lived not only in a conceptualised sense of self in the head, but the moment you live in a conceptualised sense of self in the head, you inhabit a conceptualised reality. In other words, whatever you come into contact with is immediately made into mental concepts, it is immediately judged, interpreted and labelled according to the conditioning of the conceptualised mind, and the self that is in here, the me. So people go through life, every situation they immediately interpret it, judge it, classify it, comment on it internally, often complain about it, dislike it, say so.

And this is called intelligence. And at school, the children who are very quick to label things, they are called the good pupils. The best pupils are the ones who can immediately come up with an answer and can retain information and spit it out quickly.

The best student in class, the hand goes up always, immediately, I have the answer. And then you have others who are slower, and the teacher asks the question, and those are the children in whom this new consciousness often is already arising. And there is not an immediate label there, because the question is actually quite deep, and so it falls into that depth, and the pupil or the student just looks.

And then the teacher says, okay, you don't know, obviously. And it's often, even Einstein was not very good at school, there was too much depth, he couldn't immediately produce good results in exams. So that's the amazing thing, which to the mind looks not important, how is that going to solve my problems?

You look at a flower, you look at a tree, you look at the sky, or anything, and the perception arises in a field of alert stillness. It doesn't matter how long, it's a timeless moment, the now. And maybe after three seconds of clock time, the mind may come in and say, this is a beautiful flower.

But for three seconds, four seconds, five seconds, maybe much more, the sense perception happened within a field of still and alert presence. And maybe even the mind may come in after that and say, oh, I just perceived the flower in complete stillness, which is mental noise, of course. But it is after that, the mind may come in different ways and claim and say something, or it may be very uneasy, the mind may suddenly come up with a huge amount of noise because it's frightened of that state of stillness, because it thinks it's out of control now.

I am not controlling the universe anymore. If I don't interpret and judge every moment, how do I figure out what this thing is all about, this moment? And the amazing thing is, more often than not, you don't need to figure out what this is all about, you just need to look.

In the same way that the artist looks at a canvas in the state of that intense presence, you look at a situation, and not attempting to figure it out. That is habitual, of course. So the ability arises, at first you see it when you're in little perceptions, and it's not being labeled.

There's a spaciousness suddenly that is there. And what that means is, the world around you that before was a conceptualized reality, because you imposed mental labels on everything immediately, which deadened the world around you, people don't realize how dead the universe that they inhabit has become through immediate and compulsive mental labeling. All you relate to then is the labels.

You mistake the labels for what's there. On a simple level, you mistake, if that's a lily, I'm not sure, the label lily, you think you know what it is. What is this?

Oh, it's a lily. Hmm. That's the end of it.

But there is such, the mystery that is there, the incredible beauty and depth that is there, is gone completely because you've labeled it. But if you allow the perception to arise in the field of stillness, it suddenly comes to life. It has a depth to it, and a beauty, and even a sacredness, which before, you're completely unaware of.

And the entire universe you realize is an alive organism that humans have deadened. Well, to themselves, as far as they are concerned, the world is a dead place. So when you begin to allow perceptions to arise without compulsive labeling, the world comes alive again.

There's a depth to everything and a mystery. You don't fall into the delusion that when you have a little sound about something, then you know what it is. Lily.

Or even worse with human beings, when you have a little set of judgments about a human being, then you think you know who that human being is. And the depth, aliveness, and sacredness that is there in every human being is gone totally. It's not there for you.

All you know is that, oh, he is a such and such, she is a such and such, and this is what she did and said, and this is how she always is. And if you've gone, all you know is you've said a little bit about the conditioning of that person and a lot about your own conditioning. That's all.

It was partly a projection of your own conditioning and partly perhaps a seeing of the conditioning of that person, if you're lucky. And so you reduce human beings to absurd caricatures by imposing a set of labels and think that's... People even do it to their partners.

They don't see the partner anymore, just the opinion now, the labels that they have, that's how she is. And that's... Human relations are so problematic, conflict-ridden, because there are no human relations.

There are conditioned mind entities relating to each other, but the being of the human being is obscured by the labeling. The being isn't there, just minds interacting. So at first you walk...

Nature can be a great help as you enter that state of aware presence. You walk through nature or you sit somewhere and simply watch for a while. Now this is very much like a one-year-old baby would watch the world, a baby that hasn't accumulated the labels yet in the mind.

There's a small stage when the baby's aware of surroundings, but has not yet accumulated the necessary labels to interpret the surroundings. So it hasn't even started to ask, what's this, what's this, what's this yet, because that's the mind. It simply looks.

And some babies, you can see it very clearly, there's enormous consciousness light shining through their eyes. Enormous love and joy looking through their eyes at you. And you know they're not saying anything in their heads about you.

They have no opinion about you. There's true communication, true communion as they look. And some humans can sense that, so they feel drawn to that baby and they don't want to leave.

They might make funny noises or something, but the baby doesn't really need that. But they feel drawn to the baby because there's almost a self-recognition there. And that is the destiny of humans, to re-enter that state.

But when they re-enter that state, it will have an added knowing to it, because they have moved through the stage of mind and thought. Humanity as a whole has moved through that evolutionary cycle that is identification with thought. A long, long, long cycle for humanity.

And it's been tough. It's been tough on humans, particularly in the later stages. In the later stages of any evolutionary cycle, that cycle, that state that is in that cycle displays increasing dysfunction.

So it's been tough for humans and even more tough for the planet. As humans are moving into greater and greater dysfunction because the cycle of identification with thought is coming to an end and a thought-based self is coming to an end, the planet is suffering greatly from human madness, because we really need to call it now madness. Nothing wrong, it's not saying that it shouldn't be happening.

It is right for humans to be mad at this moment. But we need to see it also as madness that is also right. The caterpillar becomes a butterfly.

In the final stage of the caterpillar's life, the caterpillar becomes dysfunctional as a caterpillar. It doesn't work anymore. Humans now have become dysfunctional on the planet.

It's not working anymore. We are destroying ourselves and the planet. Yes, this is the end of the evolutionary cycle.

That's why it's mad. Not that it shouldn't be happening. This is within the totality.

It could not be otherwise. But part of this is to see that it is mad, not condemning it as bad and shouldn't be happening, but to see it. And the seeing is already the beginning of liberation.

Because that which sees the conditioned and its dysfunction is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness. And so increasingly there's the ability to witness your own mind. And then there's the ability to dwell in the gaps.

One thought comes to an end, no other thought has started. There's a gap of still presence. And in that gap there's great intelligence at work.

This could be a very passive state, you're sitting on a park bench, simply looking in amazement at the beauty of all these forms all around you. And then it exists as a dynamic state which arises whenever you are confronted with a challenge. And life tends to do that.

It doesn't leave you alone for too long. And up comes another challenge, some situation. And instead of being drawn back into the old reaction, the conditioned reaction, the old resistance pattern, instead of that you meet the challenge through alert presence, stillness, allow it to be.

And there's a flow, one could say, a current of awareness flows through this form into the situation that is the challenge. And this is an amazing thing, the arising of this ability to simply look, to simply give attention. So what then flows through you, one could say, all words are limited, so take that into consideration, they're only approximations.

One could say what flows through you is, or what arises, a field of attention. And that is the expression of unconditioned intelligence. And any situation that you face fully in that way, because the old reaction never faces a situation fully, it denies it, runs away from it, it never faces this moment fully, which is the only place where a challenge can arise.

And in that way it is faced immediately and intelligent action, if action should be needed, arises. Or no action may arise and the intelligence that you are now aligned with, the one intelligence, acts upon the situation from some external point. In other words, here's the challenge, attention flows, you allow the prerequisite for the current of awareness to flow into a situation, the prerequisite for that is that you allow this moment to be, because you have given up arguing with what is.

You have seen that is already is. Whatever is, is. Not that it cannot be changed, but at this moment it is as it is.

Not only that, it also could not be otherwise. If it is, it couldn't be otherwise. Because the tiniest we separate events and say this is a separate event, this is a separate situation, nothing is separate, every event happens within the totality of the entire cosmos, it is a web of interconnectedness with which every seemingly separate event is connected.

Whatever happens is totally connected with everything else. So how could it not, it couldn't be otherwise for that reason. So it is madness to argue internally with the suchness of now.

And that is, of course, to argue internally with the suchness of now is the normal human state of dysfunction. And they think this is how they are going to change the world. But the opposite is true.

This is how the world remains the same in its dysfunction. So the shift now is, you see the futility of arguing with the suchness of now, no matter what form it takes. And then you allow the suchness of now to be as it is, which is not a state of passivity, but dynamic.

You allow it. Now, certain situations, it is enough to allow the situation. Other situations require action, intelligent action.

And the one intelligence that is greater than the human mind, the unconditioned, operates. And it may operate as an external event that suddenly changes the situation, a coincidence, a factor that comes in that meets the needs of this moment just right. And perhaps you did nothing.

In some cases you just sit there and watch. In some cases no immediate action is possible. There are situations, the challenge is there, but there's not yet anything I can do.

So it's simply allowed and you continue the outflow of awareness that simply is there. And then when action becomes possible or necessary, it happens either through you or through an external factor or the situation changes by itself. And this is amazing realization that in this way, problems do not arise anymore in your life.

Because problems is to mentally dwell on challenges that either are not even here, that might arise, or challenges that at this time you cannot do anything about. And then you play around with thought in circles, round and round and round about these situations. And that's a problem.

Now you have a problem. And in its madness, the mind-based self likes that. It doesn't say that openly, but it can increase its sense of self, you can enhance, it can enhance its sense of self because now it has serious problems.

So I must be important. This is the underlying assumption. And I like, therefore I like to think about how important my problems are.

And so you get totally absorbed by your life situation, by the story in the head, and this is the state that I described as the state of absence. You're gone. Dream world in the head.

Thinking you're taking responsibility for your life by worrying and lying awake at night thinking about what the future holds for you, and what the future might do to you, or what the future might withhold from you. And it's a, so that's, oh my God, this is how humans live. This is the normal way to live.

And of course, by the way, normal these days means insane. And so the root of dysfunction is in oneself. Where else could you really find it?

And the transformation of the world is in yourself. Out of that transformed consciousness comes a transformed world. Because we know one good thing that has come out of physics, apart from the atom bomb and chemical warfare, or whatever they do, hydrogen bomb, a good thing that has come out of it is they have seen the interconnectedness between the observing consciousness and that which is being observed.

A change in perspective changes what you're observing. And that was an amazing realization that came out of modern physics that has enormous repercussions. And you can see how the world, what we experience as the world in reality, now I'm talking about especially the so-called man-made world, human-made world.

What we really experience, what you experience when you switch on your TV, or in your interact, the world, whatever you experience as the world is basically your state of consciousness. So, and it's collective, it's not a personal, nobody to blame for anything. It's a collective human condition.

We have created this world. It is not entirely mad. There are redeeming features to it.

If it were entirely mad, it would already have self-destructed. It got very close in the latter, in the last century, it already got very close several times to self-destruction in its madness. And it is still close.

We are not free yet from the possibility of self-destruction, although the new state is arising. The only question is, is it arising fast enough? Is it arising on a wide enough scale to compensate for the increasing madness of the old egoic consciousness and what it's doing to the planet and to human beings, to themselves, what they are doing to themselves?

The fact that we are here is a good sign. This is the arising of the new. I don't make any predictions, because I don't know whether humanity is going to make it.

Ultimately, of course, it doesn't matter. The universe is infinitely abundant in the life forms that it manifests. The one intelligence manifesting as so many life forms.

And many life forms, after a while, the one consciousness says, okay, that's enough. I'm withdrawing from there. And it's gone.

And then it flows into something else, and maybe it flowers through this form. I know that it wants to flower through the human form. And there's no predicting what the world will look like once human consciousness has flowered collectively.

There's no point in even speculating, be it enough to say that you wouldn't even recognize the planet. It would look like some strange, perhaps heavenly realm. And if you went there with an ego, you would feel very uncomfortable.

Oh, I need to get back to the old earth. So that, it is a great challenge and a great adventure and a great opportunity in life at this time. Not that you are separate from the consciousness, you are an expression of the one consciousness.

The question is, is that one consciousness now going to move through you? Is the cosmic evolutionary impulse finding a sufficiently clear space here, so that it can move in and move through, and then emanate through this form. Some people will create wonderful things.

Others will simply emanate the state of joy, peace, aliveness, and love, and walk through the world, emanating that state, and be a blessing to whoever they meet. That's quite enough, isn't it? And others may create great things.

Others will say, I don't need to create anything. It's simply to embody that state. That's the flowering, as I mentioned before somewhere, maybe in the book, I can't remember.

The planet, there was plant life on the planet for millions of years, they say, before there ever was a flower. After millions of years of plant life, I'm told, one day the first flower must have opened. And when a plant becomes a flower, it's an analogy, as I'm using it here, for a new level of, a new dimension of being, of consciousness.

But what is happening to humans is much vaster than even that. But it's a beautiful analogy. And then it took thousands of years before another flower came, probably, and then two or three.

And then suddenly a profusion of flowers all over the planet, and this is very similar. We've had early flowers in humanity. The great teachers of humanity, one can look upon them as early flowerings of human consciousness.

The possibilities that are inherent in the human form for the first time express themselves fully through those great teachers, sages, only some of whom we know about. Some were relatively unknown. So there were rare flowers here and there.

And then a time comes when we are ready for the flowering on a much larger scale. And it cannot not be now, otherwise it's the end. So it must be now.

This is the time. It goes far beyond anything personal in your life. On a personal level, it's very pleasant because it frees you from inhabiting an absurdly complex world of problem-making.

That's great. So on a personal level, it takes the weight of you, the weight of the self, the mind-made self, that already the Buddha, the early flower that he was, recognized a profound insight too early, probably for much too early for his time, to see the illusion of self that was the primordial insight of the Buddha. My God, he saw that.

And so that's where it flowered. As one Buddhist monk who was asked to explain the meaning of Buddhism simply said, the meaning of Buddhism is this, no self, no problem. Finished.

Oh, yes, but I'd like to learn some philosophy. Can you teach me? I have plenty of time.

Please give me time, says the self. I want to complete myself in time. So the burden of self, of that delusion, you don't walk around with that heaviness anymore, because you become a heaviness on the planet, and whatever you walk on you crush.

A heavy self walking, millions of heavy selves walking on the planet, crushing life. And they don't even know it. Life?

What's life? It's just a little something, says the mind. This is timber.

It's worth six million dollars, I would say, so okay, we can cut that in no time. And it's gone. The forest that was there for a hundred thousand years, a field of sacredness, but the mind can't see it because the mind labelled it.

And that's nobody's fault. It's the human dysfunction. So the heaviness of self, the heaviness of self leaves you.

Free of that delusion, that entity that was so hard to live with, the me, that I had such a problematic relationship with. And now, there's simply, where there was a heavy me, there's a field of aware presence. Walking, sitting, moving, being.

It doesn't make problems anymore for itself, for other humans, for the planet. It doesn't create suffering anymore for itself, for other humans, for the planet. So this is why, since ancient times, they've used the word liberation to talk about this shift in consciousness, because all the ancient teachings, they point to it, and they sometimes call it liberation.

From what? Even in the New Testament, they use that expression. Free.

Jesus talks about, you will be free. You will know the truth. The truth will make you free.

Free, they said, we're already free. We are nobody's slaves. And Jesus said, no, you're not.

And he used the language that he used at the time. He said, you are the slaves of sin. Now, what's sin?

If he were talking nowadays, he would have said, you're totally conditioned entities and you're completely unconscious. You're the slaves of your conditioning. That's all.

It's the dysfunction that is sin. No more. It's nobody's fault.

It's collective dysfunction, that's all. It's not the way in which it's usually interpreted, but there's a truth in it, a deep truth. And just as there's original sin, there's original innocence, which is the sanity in you, which is the unconditioned consciousness in you, that's far vaster than the little original sin.

Far vaster. The little original sin is a little illusion. It only appears big when you're totally trapped in it.

So this is the liberation already happening. And as you walk away from here, you will have lost some weight. Not physical weight, that doesn't matter, but the weight of me, self, the problem making me.

If this were not already happening here, you would not have been able to sit here for an hour and a half, according to clock time. It would have become unbearable. Or you had to exert such willpower that you made yourself sit here.

But that's unlikely. So the greatest adventure that any human being can be involved in, you are involved. And some people are still asking about their life purpose.

Welcome.

I'm inviting you to be here fully, to inhabit this moment completely, to make yourself at home in this moment. The now, or whatever is. The now.

And it's so normal not to be at home in the now, but to look for your home somewhere else. And that deeply conditioned mind pattern, collective, if it is operating in you at this moment, you will already feel restless or impatient. And a little voice in the head saying, come on, get on with it.

This need to get on with it is the need to move away from now into the future. Looking for your home, for yourself. A little hint that may make it easier to be here fully is to feel a certain connectedness with the inner energy field of the body as you sit here.

Simply to, it's not complicated, simply to sense that the body is alive. To sense an underlying, this underlying field of aliveness. So some of your attention is there.

It's subtle, just, but in a very subtle way. Yes. Of course the body is alive.

Every cell is alive. Every cell is intelligent. More intelligent than the human mind.

So just to sense that, so to inhabit the now, one aspect of being fully present, a very rare state so far on this planet. One aspect of that is to also to inhabit the body, to be in it, to have some attention in it. So you're rooted, not totally in the head, not totally in your stream of thoughts, but with some attention in that aliveness that is here.

And then it's easier to sit here and listen to a speaker who is not saying very much, who is giving nothing to believe in, or even arousing your emotions. Then it's easier to be here with yourself. So we are here to experience the possibility of living in a different state of consciousness from the normal state, which is not to be here.

To be identified with a stream of thought, which is always about past and future. And as you sit here, sensing, even as you listen, that yes, there is an aliveness throughout my body. And you feel that, and there's enough attention left to listen.

So you're entering a state of alert presence. And in that state, you're aware of the words. And in themselves, the words so far have not been very important.

Because they point to something, that's all. In themselves, they are nothing. So you can be here and allow a state of alert presence to arise, in which you are able to allow this moment, the now, to be.

So I'm inviting you to enter that state of consciousness together. Which, from the point of view of the thinking mind, and from the point of view of that sense of self that is derived from continuous thought activity, the conceptualized me in the head, with its story, its name, its accumulation of experiences. From the point of view of that mind-made self, this state of consciousness is not significant.

It cannot be recognized by thought as significant. Thought is interested in the next thing, not this. Thought is saying, okay, you've been talking about the now for 10 minutes now.

What's next? I want to move on to the next thing. I've come here to be filled up, to be given something, to add something to the content of my mind.

That I can take home, and it's not coming. Because nothing needs to be added to you. And to see that, ultimately, to be yourself fully, nothing needs to be added.

That's an amazing revelation. Because everybody's looking to add something to me, to improve me through adding, to make me more complete, the self. I want to be bigger, more important, more spiritual, more wealthy, more secure, powerful.

And if you can't have that, it'll be happy to say, I'm miserable, and I want to be even more miserable. A mind made sense of self, a story, happy, unhappy, more unhappy than happy. And from the point of view of that, this state of consciousness that we are allowing to arise is not significant.

Presence, how does that solve my problems? How does that add more to me? And yet, it solves all your problems.

So as we sit here, to continue to feel that inner connectedness with the body, and occasionally detect a little voice in the head that's complaining, uh, uh, uh, not enough. I'm not being fed. Give me something to grasp.

And of course, usually this is what happens in this building, an institution of learning or education, where you're being fed information. And you're being told many things, taught many things except what really matters. So even if you notice restlessness arising, notice it, watch that, allow that also to be, allow this moment to be.

You might as well because this moment is always as it is. There is a suchness to now, the only place there ever is. Or if that may be, not everybody in this room may know that there's only now.

You can remember the past, but only in the now. And what you remember once was the now, otherwise it couldn't have happened. There would be nothing to remember.

So it's the power, the light of now that gives life to the past and the future, a mental projection. Some project it now. One day this is going to happen tomorrow.

When it comes, it's not the future anymore. It's the now. And you can only project a future now.

You can only think of a future now. When it comes, it comes as the now. So this is an important realization because we are moving into the now, and it's good to see how vital that is because it is life itself.

And humans live as if the now were totally, not only insignificant, they live trying to get away from it. Always, except for rare moments. Ah, I have arrived.

But you never arrive for very long. And then you realize you haven't arrived. I've made it.

Oh no, I haven't made it. So present moment awareness is why we are here. Not to acquire new ideas.

To allow that state that one could call awareness, now awareness, which is a new state of consciousness for human beings. Allow that to arise. And something in you loves it and responds to it.

And something else in you would rather be somewhere else and is saying, this isn't getting me anywhere. And one or two or more of you may leave. Because you're not being given content for the mind.

And so you can go from here maybe to a lecture at a higher place of learning, and you will get all that. Lecture on Buddhist philosophy. So much to learn.

And yet the essence is so amazingly simple. So as we sit here, we settle into now. And if something within doesn't feel settled in the now, you notice that.

Maybe a little knot in the chest, a little heaviness here, you notice that. Allow that. An openness, you bring an openness to now.

Instead of arguing with now or trying to run away from it. So present moment awareness arises, which is a state of great intelligence. All creativity comes out of that.

That state is known by anyone who has achieved mastery in any field. In that field of mastery, he or she is able to access that state of consciousness. Where you are no longer dependent on the accumulated knowledge, although that may come into play, you're not dependent on the accumulated knowledge of the mind where newness can come in.

A new creation, a new insight, realization, fresh, new, alive. That cannot be created by the human mind. The human mind can be a tool in giving that form, but it cannot be derived from the human mind, which is a kind of a computer.

It stores information, it analyzes information, it distinguishes between this and this and that. As that, it works quite well. But creative comes from a deeper place of where the one intelligence that expresses itself in form as the universe, where that resides in each human being, that one intelligence that is far greater than the conditioned little intelligence of the mind.

It encompasses it, but it's far greater. And that is accessible to every human being as that state of consciousness, of presence. And anybody who has achieved mastery in any field is familiar with that state, even if they don't know it.

They may not be able to talk about it, but they sit, and an alertness arises. They're not trying to get away from this moment, oh, I need to get there. No, there's total attention to the field of now.

And then the creative impulse comes, or the creative insight happens. And then perhaps at that stage, the mind gives it expressions, perhaps through words, or some movement happens for the artist, or even to the scientist. The problem he's been thinking about for hundreds of hours, suddenly he or she enters the state of aware presence in which thought, mind activity subsides.

But you don't lose consciousness at all. There's full awakened consciousness. Unconditioned, it has nothing to do with your past.

It can arise at any point in your life. Sometimes it arises accidentally, when people are faced with death, or a very dangerous situation that the mind could not cope with. And then the mind steps aside.

And that intelligence takes over while that critical situation lasts. And then people admire you and say, you did such a great thing. And you realize you didn't do anything.

It happened. I didn't do anything. I just did it.

I don't know. You are a hero. Well, no, I didn't do anything.

So that human beings here and there have tasted that. But it has never arisen on the planet as a new state of consciousness, not collectively. It's happened to a few individuals here and there.

And in many cases, only in the isolated field of their activity, those who created great things. And then as a way of habitual state of consciousness for a few so-called masters who dwell in that new state. But it is the destiny of all humans to become masters, to be masters, to embody that transformed consciousness.

That's why we're here. So that needs to be seen, how important it is for you to allow that state to arise. And it wants to arise.

The intelligence wants to move through this form and flower through this form. Humanity on the whole has not yet flowered. A few flowers here and there, Buddha, Jesus, many of them misunderstood, and a few that we don't know about.

And a few partial flowers, great artists, for example. Partial flowers because they were not yet able to live in that state, but they had access to it in their field of endeavor. And now because we're arriving at a very critical stage on this planet, this state needs to arise in humans as the next evolutionary step for mankind.

We can't get out of our problems on the same level of consciousness that created the problems, neither on a personal level nor on a collective level. Accumulating more information, more facts, memorize more facts, is that going to solve humanity's problems? Analysis.

It's still the same state of consciousness in which you're identified with a mind-made image that is never fulfilled for long, and it needs more. It needs its enemies because it defines its sense of me through others. And it feels stronger in its illusory sense of self.

Me, my story, my name, my history. Humans don't know themselves beyond that. And that covers up that which is unconditioned in each human being, the unconditioned consciousness, because they're totally identified with the unconditioned, derive their sense of self from that.

And so why we are here is to allow that unconditioned to arise, and this gathering here is part of the transformation of human consciousness. I'm not giving you some new idea that says it's all going to change at some future point. It's changing already.

Otherwise you wouldn't be here if you were not, if that change were not operating through you, you wouldn't be here. Except one or two who got dragged here against their will. You must come to this and listen.

I don't want to listen to this. But sometimes even those who got dragged to a gathering suddenly listen. Oh, they recognize something as if they had known it.

But this does not, let's not mislead ourselves and make this into a new interesting idea to believe in. And that idea would be consciousness is changing. I believe that now.

It's not enough. You've only strengthened your sense of self by identifying with a new belief and perhaps feeling a little bit more important now, because it's changing through me. And you will know that this is the case when somebody that you meet after this gathering, maybe your partner, your parents or a friend, and you'd say something about it and they say, no, that's not happiness, it's just nonsense.

And you get defensive. Oh, what are you defending? Yourself.

A mental position. It's become a mental position. And mental positions need to be defended.

When you identify with a mental position, you derive your sense of self from that mental position. You need to defend yourself. I'm right.

No, you're wrong. With a lot of emotional violence sometimes. So we're not making it into some new mind stuff.

It's easy to happen. This is how religions arise. At the core of it, there is a deep truth.

And then the mind comes in and makes it into something to believe in and to argue with and make others wrong and make yourself right. Oh, great. Killing others to show that you are right.

In that delusion, to make somebody else wrong can be a war on a collective level, religious war, nationalistic war. What on a personal level is the need to be right? Identifying with thought.

Completely. That is coming to an end. And what arises is a state of consciousness that one cannot really talk about because all the words are created by the mind.

It's a miracle that one talks about it. The words, however, are not it. They are only pointers.

And if you're trying to understand what I'm pointing to, you won't. And it can only be known directly. How?

Allow this moment to be as it is. Align yourself with now. This is how we started.

And this is the central core of our gathering, is to align yourself internally with now. It does not mean that you now become lethargic and no action will ever happen again. The opposite is true.

It is a state that is both deeply at rest and, if needed, dynamic. That state of alignment with now will respond immediately to whatever challenge presents itself in your life at this moment. Action will arise out of that state, out of that intelligence that is in that state.

Far more effective action than action that comes out of the state of denial of now and needs to arrive at some future point to make myself bigger, to get somewhere, to achieve anger, restlessness, not enough. I have to make it. So to become familiar with that incredible state of unconditioned presence, which is the state that nothing else is, the whole teachings in Zen, and some of you have read books about Zen or even practiced Zen, and it's usually regarded as very enigmatic teaching.

You can't quite figure out what they're talking about. People spend years studying, trying to figure out what are they actually saying? And there's some deep, some obscure sense that there's something important here, but I continue to miss it.

And there are even monks in Zen monasteries who miss it. And it's so simple, it's all embodied, it's all expressed in the beautiful gesture of the Zen master who would only ever give one answer to the question, what is Zen? And that answer was wordless, it was this.

And more people got it through this Zen master than other Zen masters who gave verbal explanations or would hit you with a stick, that's another method. And if they didn't get it when he did that, and he looked very fierce, the way Zen masters look, it shocks you into awakening. But those who didn't get it, they said, did you hear my question?

It didn't work. And to become familiar, and I haven't very often gone into it as I'm doing this evening, you must be ready for it, otherwise it wouldn't be happening, what arises in humans, in you, now, is something amazing. It is both simple and profound and amazing and an amazing evolutionary leap.

And what is that? It is the state of, and now please don't be frightened, it is the state of no thought. Without loss of consciousness, instead, an enormous intensification of consciousness compared to which the state of thought is a dreamlike state, as particularly the state of being identified with thought continuously, with that stream of mental noise, which is still the normal state, is a dreamlike state compared to the state of being free of thought.

Not that thought will never again arise, but you become familiar with that state in which there is a simple, clear space of alert presence. And the mind is not labeling what is. The allowing is so deep that it is not necessary to interpret this moment.

A greater intelligence than the little conditioned intelligence that is labeling or interpreting this moment now comes into operation. But from the point of view of the mind, the labeling intelligence, the analytical information-gathering mind, from the point of view of that, the state of no thought looks as if you didn't know anything anymore, and it's frightened of that state. And the amazing thing is, in many of you, because that state, it is an evolutionary, universal impulse, that state wants to arise through humans now, and in many of you it is already arising at all kinds of moments, but it's often not recognized for what it is, because the mind cannot recognize it, it can't do anything, there's nothing there for the mind.

The mind is object consciousness, it is consciousness with content, you're conscious, the mind is always identified with some content, thought forms, some form. And when you walk through the city, you can see how the mind is either commenting on what you see, even that is rare, because most of the time the mind is totally elsewhere, and you just have just enough awareness not to bump into people, you're just peripherally aware of your surroundings, just enough, but otherwise you're thinking about something much more important than this moment. And of course it's some form of next moment, so much more important, but you need to get there as quickly as possible.

That's normal. And it's so easy to overlook that this state is already arising in you, but it's immediately obscured again by mental noise. So one thing that you can do is to watch the arising of the state that is free of thought, it is a state of simple, clear, alert presence.

It is alert but relaxed at the same time. And that is the essence of who you are, is that field of aware presence. That can only be now, that is inseparable from now, that is actually the essence of now, of what now means.

There is a now that is associated with objects that arise in the now, that's mind, thoughts, sense perceptions, people, situations, events, they arise, objects in consciousness arise. Most humans only know themselves as an object in consciousness, they only know themselves as a story that they are telling themselves. My past, who are you?

The name, which is a sequence of sounds, not much more. I am John Smith. Oh, okay, now I know.

And then there is a role that is in consciousness that you identify with, society has given you maybe two or three roles. So you ask, who are you? You get the name as an answer, then you get, I'm a mother of three, I'm an accountant, I'm a divorcee, I'm unemployed, I'm a professor of such and such, or whatever it may be, or I'm somebody who's been treated unfairly by life, all is life, let me tell you about it.

And so that's all people know. Mind objects, they derive their sense of identity from mind objects, thoughts, an accumulation of certain thoughts and images in the mind, and it becomes a me. Now, the reason why people cannot stop thinking, it seems that they can't, but they can as the new consciousness is arising, but it's compulsive still to a large extent.

Thought is compulsive. Everybody, almost everybody, the stream of thinking, they don't, I must think, think, think, think, think all day long, you must think about something, even when there's nothing to think about, you must think, think. And psychologists examine that, even psychologists who are not aware of that there's a new consciousness arising, or if you told them that, they would say, come to me for treatment.

But even psychologists, they have examined the nature of thought and what kinds of thoughts go through people's heads, and they've come to the conclusion in several studies that 98% of, or 99% of thought activity is totally repetitive. The same thoughts go through your head again and again. But the mind is telling you this is terribly important.

I need to take responsibility for my life, these are big problems that I'm thinking about. And you have no time for presence, the problems are too important for that. And you can see the absence when you look into people's eyes sometimes, you can see there's nobody there.

They are not here, they are in some, it's the, they're not really looking, the look is inwards, it's all their consciousness is absorbed by thought, and that's where their attention is. It can't go out, it goes back in. And there's no emanation, there's no energy coming out of them, it's like a thick veil has descended.

And when you look, you can clearly see that they are somewhere totally different, a mind projection, future probably, unless they're so old there's little future left, in which case they'll live in the past. And the strange thing is, you're fooling yourself that your thinking serves a useful purpose, that it's actually there to figure out how to solve your problems. But it's actually creating far more problems than solving.

The amazing thing is, useless thinking is the place where problems are being created. There is no problem here, now. Now I can hear one or two minds saying, surely the world is full of problems and dreadful things are happening at this very moment, are you telling me that that's all an illusion?

No, of course dreadful things are happening at this moment. And that's because it is an externalization of the normal human state of consciousness, which is very dysfunctional now, especially in its final stage. That is very dysfunctional.

So enormous problems, yes, but are we solving them? The peace process, another peace process, and more bombs, and more peace process, and more bombs. It's only from a different state of consciousness that these things can be solved.

Now let's look at your own life, which seems that your identity is partly consists of problems, the sense of who you feel you are, an essential ingredient in that sense of me, my life situation, my past, my possible future, if there is one, because you can never be sure, my past, my future, that I hope there is a future because I need to complete my story and make it work. It's not really working yet, not yet, but any day now this is actually going to work. That's a strange thing that it doesn't really work in anybody, not for very long, and then again it's, oh, because the story cannot give you a satisfying sense of self.

It is only content in the head, so it's never satisfying for long, you never complete yourself in it, and even if the world thinks you have, when you look into these people who seem to have made it, and even scientists, you realize that even they often think, no, I haven't really solved the ultimate problem yet. Even Einstein, who was a deeply, very much in touch with his inner being, more than most other scientists, it hadn't arrived at the, hadn't worked out the entire secret of the universe, whatever it was, the unified field theory, or whatever it was called, he couldn't work that out, but the world, to the world he was the greatest of scientists, and he was, because he had access to that, and yet, on the level of his story, it didn't have seemed to work out either, because he couldn't figure out the ultimate secret of the universe. So the story, in its, cannot work structurally. In the very structure of that sense of self is contained the element of unsatisfactoriness, of not working, not satisfying you, not completing you.

So it's great to see that, oh, that means your life situation is no longer all absorbing, it does not absorb your entire attention anymore, it's a desperate search to make it, to arrive, to attain, and that goes, and then you realize there's something far more vital than your life situation, not that you don't honor it, as your situation unfolds in time, you have a role in relation to society, temporary roles, you honor that without seeking yourself in it, you play the role of mother for a while, without being totally identified with the role, then you become a stifling mother. But if you can play, you can honor your role beautifully without being absorbed in it, and deriving your sense of identity from it, and thinking that's who I am, because the role comes to an end. The chairman of the big corporation retires, and then he sits there, and the phone doesn't ring anymore, and nobody tells him who he is anymore, and he had never inquired more deeply before, it's sometimes a little late when you reach old age, and you have never inquired more deeply into who you are beyond objects in consciousness.

So here arises that which in ancient traditions is sometimes called the self, not the little self, the Atman, the one universal intelligence that is the essence of your identity. It arises as simple, thoughtless awareness. One could say stillness, that's only a small aspect of it.

It is an inner field of stillness, and yet it is so alert. And when you find for the first time, there are moments when you can look upon something, perhaps some in nature, perhaps it is a tree, a flower, you perceive it, and it is not being labeled by the mind. That is the arising of thoughtless awareness.

There is a knowing in that, but it is very different from what the thinking mind calls knowing, and you haven't lost the labels. If a label should be needed, it's there, but it's no longer absorbing all your attention, the conceptualized world of labels. So, so far humans have lived not only in a conceptualized sense of self in the head, but the moment you live in a conceptualized sense of self in the head, you inhabit a conceptualized reality.

In other words, whatever you come into contact with is immediately made into mental concepts, it is immediately judged, interpreted, and labeled according to the conditioning of the conceptualized mind, and the self that is in here, the me. So people go through life, every situation, they immediately interpret it, judge it, classify it, comment on it internally, often complain about it, dislike it. And this is called intelligence.

And at school, the children who are very quick to label things, they are called the good pupils. The best pupils are the ones who can immediately come up with an answer and can retain information and spit it out quickly. Best student in class, the hand goes up always immediately.

I have the answer. And then you have others who are slower, and the teacher asks the question, and those are the children in whom this new consciousness often is already arising. And there is not an immediate label there, because the question is actually quite deep, and so it falls into the depths.

And the pupil or the student just looks. And then the teacher says, okay, you don't know, obviously. And it's often, even Einstein was not very good at school.

There was too much depth. He couldn't immediately produce good results in exams. So that's the amazing thing, which to the mind looks not important.

How is that going to solve my problems? You look at a flower, you look at a tree, you look at the sky or anything, and the perception arises in a field of alert stillness. It doesn't matter how long, it's a timeless moment now.

And maybe after three seconds of clock time, the mind may come in and say, this is a beautiful flower. But for three seconds, four seconds, five seconds, maybe much more. So, the sense perception happened within a field of still and alert presence.

And maybe even the mind may come in after that and say, oh, I just perceived the flower in complete stillness. Which is mental noise, of course. But it is after that, the mind may come in different ways and claim and say something, or it may be very uneasy.

The mind may suddenly come up with a huge amount of noise because it's frightened of that state of stillness, because it thinks it's out of control now. I am not controlling the universe anymore. If I don't interpret and judge every moment, how do I figure out what this thing is all about, this moment?

And the amazing thing is, more often than not, you don't need to figure out what this is all about. You just need to look in the same way that the artist looks at a canvas in the state of that intense presence. You look at a situation and not attempting to figure it out.

That is habitual, of course. So the ability arises, at first you see it when you're in little perceptions and it's not being labeled. There's a spaciousness suddenly that is there.

And what that means is the world around you that before was a conceptualized reality, because you imposed mental labels on everything immediately, which deadened the world around you. People don't realize how dead the universe that they inhabit has become through immediate and compulsive mental labeling. All you relate to then is the labels.

You mistake the labels for what's there. On a simple level, you mistake, if that's a lily, I'm not sure, the label lily, you think you know what it is. What is this?

Oh, it's a lily. That's the end of it. But there is such, the mystery that is there, the incredible beauty and depth that is there, is gone completely because you've labeled it.

But if you allow the perception to arise in the field of stillness, it suddenly comes to life. It has a depth to it and a beauty and even a sacredness, which before, completely unaware of. And the entire universe, you realize, is an alive organism that humans have deadened, well, to themselves.

As far as they are concerned, the world is a dead place. So when you begin to allow perceptions to arise without compulsive labeling, the world comes alive again. There's a depth to everything and a mystery.

You don't fall into the delusion that when you have a little sound about something, then you know what it is. Lily. Or even worse with human beings.

When you have a little set of judgments about a human being, then you think you know who that human being is. And the depth, aliveness, and sacredness that is there in every human being, it's gone totally. It's not there for you.

All you know is that, oh, he is a such and such, she is a such and such, and this is what she did and said, and this is how she always is, and a few gone. All you know is you've said a little bit about the conditioning of that person and a lot about your own conditioning. That's all.

It was partly a projection of your own conditioning and partly, perhaps, a seeing of the conditioning of that person, if you're lucky. And so you reduce human beings to absurd caricatures by imposing a set of labels and think that people even do it to their partners. They don't see the partner anymore, just the opinion, now the labels that they have, that's how she is.

And that's human relations are so problematic, conflict-ridden, because there are no human relations. There are conditioned mind entities relating to each other, but the being of the human being is obscured by the labeling. The being isn't there, just minds interacting.

So at first you walk, nature can be a great help as you enter that state of aware presence. You walk through nature or you sit somewhere and simply watch for a while. Now this is very much like a one-year-old baby would watch the world, the baby that hasn't accumulated the labels yet in the mind.

There's a small stage when the baby is aware of surroundings, but has not yet accumulated the necessary labels to interpret the surroundings. So it hasn't even started to ask, what's this, what's this, what's this yet? Because that's the mind.

It simply looks. And some babies, you can see it very clearly, there's enormous consciousness light shining through their eyes, enormous love and joy looking through their eyes at you. And you know they're not saying anything in their heads about you.

They have no opinion about you. There's true communication, true communion as they look. And some humans can sense that, so they feel drawn to that baby and they don't want to leave.

They might make funny noises or something, but the baby doesn't really need that. But they feel drawn to the baby because there's almost a self-recognition there. And that is the destiny of humans, to re-enter that state.

But when they re-enter that state, it will have an added knowing to it because they have moved through the stage of mind and thought. Humanity as a whole has moved through that evolutionary cycle that is identification with thought. A long, long, long cycle for humanity.

And it's been tough. It's been tough on humans, as particularly in the later stages when, in the later stages of any evolutionary cycle, it is that cycle, that state that is in that cycle displays increasing dysfunction. So it's been tough for humans and even more tough for the planet as humans are moving into greater and greater dysfunction because the cycle of identification with thought is coming to an end and a thought-based self is coming to an end.

The planet is suffering greatly from human madness because we really need to call it now madness. Nothing wrong, it's not saying that shouldn't be happening. It is right for humans to be mad at this moment.

But we need to see it also as madness that is also right. The caterpillar becomes a butterfly. In the final stage of the caterpillar's life, the caterpillar becomes dysfunctional as a caterpillar.

It doesn't work anymore. Humans now have become dysfunctional on the planet. It's not working anymore.

We are destroying ourselves and the planet. Yes, this is the end of the evolutionary cycle. That's why it's mad.

Not that it shouldn't be happening. This is within the totality. It could not be otherwise.

But part of this is to see that it is mad, not condemning it as bad and shouldn't be happening, but to see it. And the seeing is already the beginning of liberation. Because that which sees the conditioned and its dysfunction is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness.

And so increasingly there's the ability to witness your own mind. And then there's the ability to dwell in the gaps. One thought comes to an end, no other thought has started.

There's a gap of still presence. And in that gap, there's great intelligence at work. This could be a very passive state, you're sitting on a park bench, simply looking in amazement at the beauty of all these forms all around you.

And then it exists as a dynamic state, which arises whenever you are confronted with a challenge. And life tends to do that. It doesn't leave you alone for too long.

And up comes another challenge, some situation. And instead of being drawn back into the old reaction, the conditioned reaction, the old resistance pattern, instead of that, you meet the challenge through alert presence, stillness, allow it to be. And there is a flow, one could say, a current of awareness flows through this form into the situation that is the challenge.

And this is an amazing thing, the arising of this ability to simply look, to simply give attention. So what then flows through you, one could say, all words are limited, so take that into consideration. They're all approximations.

One could say, what flows through you is, or what arises, a field of attention. And that is the expression of unconditioned intelligence. And any situation that you face fully in that way, because the old reaction never faces the situation fully.

It denies it, runs away from it. It never faces this moment fully, which is the only place where a challenge can arise. And in that way, it is faced immediately, and intelligent action, if action should be needed, arises.

Or no action may arise, and the intelligence that you are now aligned with, the one intelligence, acts upon the situation from some external point. In other words, here's the challenge, attention flows, you allow the prerequisite for the current of awareness to flow into a situation. The prerequisite for that is that you allow this moment to be, because you have given up arguing with what is.

You have seen that is already is. Whatever is, is. Not that it cannot be changed, but at this moment, it is as it is.

Not only that, it also could not be otherwise. If it is, it couldn't be otherwise. Because the tiniest we separate events and say this is a separate event, this is a separate situation, nothing is separate.

Every event happens within the totality of the entire cosmos. It is a web of interconnectedness with which every seemingly separate event is connected. Whatever happens is totally connected with everything else.

So how could it not, it couldn't be otherwise for that reason. So it is madness to argue internally with the suchness of now. And that is, of course, to argue internally with the suchness of now is the normal human state of dysfunction.

And they think this is how they are going to change the world. The opposite is true. This is how the world remains the same in its dysfunction.

So the shift now is you see the futility of arguing with the suchness of now, no matter what form it takes. And then you allow the suchness of now to be as it is, which is not a state of passivity, but dynamic. You allow it.

Now, certain situations, it is enough to allow the situation. Other situations require action, intelligent action. And the one intelligence that is greater than the human mind, the unconditioned, operates.

And it may operate as an external event that suddenly changes the situation, a coincidence, a factor that comes in that meets the needs of this moment just right. And perhaps you did nothing. In some cases, you just sit there and watch.

In some cases, no immediate action is possible. There are situations, the challenge is there, but there's not yet anything I can do. So it's simply allowed and you continue.

The outflow of awareness simply is there. And then when action becomes possible or necessary, it happens either through you or through an external factor, or the situation changes by itself. And this is amazing realization that in this way, problems do not arise anymore in your life.

Because problems is to mentally dwell on challenges that either are not even here, that might arise, or challenges that at this time you cannot do anything about. And then you play around with thought in circles, round and round and round about these situations. And that's a problem.

Now you have a problem. And now, in its madness, the mind-based self likes that. It doesn't say that openly, but it can increase its sense of self, you can enhance, it can enhance its sense of self, because now it has serious problems.

So I must be important. This is the underlying assumption. And I like, therefore, I like to think about how important my problems are.

And so you get totally absorbed by your life situation, by the story in the head. And this is the state that I described as the state of absence. You're gone.

Dream world in the head. Thinking you're taking responsibility for your life by worrying and lying awake at night, thinking about what the future holds for you, and what the future might do to you, or what the future might withhold from you. And it's, so that's, oh my God, this is how humans live.

This is the normal, the normal way to live. And of course, by the way, normal these days means insane. And so the root of dysfunction is in oneself.

Where else could you really find it? And the transformation of the world is in yourself. Out of that transformed consciousness comes a transformed world.

Because we know one good thing that has come out of physics, apart from the atom bomb and the chemical warfare, or whatever they do, hydrogen bomb, and a good thing that has come out of it is they have seen the interconnectedness between the observing consciousness and that which is being observed. A change in perspective changes what you're observing. And that was an amazing realization that came out of modern physics that has enormous repercussions.

And you can see how the world, what we experience as the world, in reality, now I'm talking about especially the so-called man-made world, human-made world. And what we really experience, what you experience when you switch on your TV or in your interact, the world, whatever you experience as the world, is basically your state of consciousness. So, and it's collective, it's not a personal, nobody to blame for anything.

It's a collective human condition. We have created this world. It is not entirely mad.

There are redeeming features to it. If it were entirely mad, it would already have self-destructed. It got very close in the latter, in the last century, it already got very close several times to self-destruction in its madness.

And it is still close. We are not free yet from the possibility of self-destruction, although the new state is arising. The only question is, is it arising fast enough?

Is it arising on a wide enough scale to compensate for the increasing madness of the old egoic consciousness and what it's doing to the planet and to human beings, to themselves, what they are doing to themselves? The fact that we are here is a good sign. This is the arising of the new.

So, I don't make any predictions because I don't know whether humanity is going to make it. Ultimately, of course, it doesn't matter. The universe is infinitely abundant in the life forms that it manifests.

The one intelligence manifesting has so many life forms. And many life forms, after a while, the one consciousness says, okay, that's enough. I'm withdrawing from there.

And it's gone. And then it flows into something else. And maybe it flowers through this form.

I know that it wants to flower through the human form. And there's no predicting what the world will look like once human consciousness has flowered collectively. There's no point in even speculating, be it enough to say that you wouldn't even recognize the planet.

It would look like some strange, perhaps heavenly realm. And if you went there with an ego, you would feel very uncomfortable. Oh, I need to get back to the old earth.

So that it is a great challenge and a great adventure and a great opportunity life at this time. Not that you are separate from the consciousness. You are an expression of the one consciousness.

The question is, is that one consciousness now going to move through you? Is the cosmic evolutionary impulse finding a sufficiently clear space here so that it can move in and move through and then emanate through this form? Some people will create wonderful things.

Others will simply emanate the state of joy, peace, aliveness, and love and walk through the world emanating that state and be a blessing to whoever they meet. That's quite enough, isn't it? And others may create great things.

Others will say, I don't need to create anything. It's simply to embody that state. That's the flowering, as I mentioned before, somewhere, maybe in the book, I can't remember.

The planet, there was plant life on the planet for millions of years, they say, before there ever was a flower. After millions of years of plant life, I'm told, one day the first flower must have opened. And when a plant becomes a flower, it's an analogy, as I'm using it here, for a new level of, a new dimension of being, of consciousness.

But what is happening to humans is much vaster than even that. But it's a beautiful analogy. And then it took thousands of years before another flower came, probably, and then two or three.

And then suddenly a profusion of flowers all over the planet. And this is very similar. We've had early flowers in humanity.

The great teachers of humanity, one can look upon them as early flowerings of human consciousness. The possibilities that are inherent in the human form for the first time express themselves fully through those great teachers, sages, only some of whom we know about. Some were relatively unknown.

So there were rare flowers here and there. And then a time comes when we are ready for the flowering on a much larger scale. And it cannot not be now, otherwise it's the end.

So it must be now. This is the time. It goes far beyond anything personal in your life.

On a personal level, it's very pleasant because it frees you from inhabiting an absurdly complex world of problem-making. That's great. So on a personal level, it takes the weight off you, the weight of the self, the mind-made self that already the Buddha, the early flower that he was, recognized.

A profound insight too early, probably for much too early for his time, to see the illusion of self that was the primordial insight of the Buddha. My God, he saw that. And so that's where it flowered.

As one Buddhist monk who was asked to explain the meaning of Buddhism simply said, the meaning of Buddhism is this, no self, no problem. Finished. Oh, yes, but I'd like to learn some philosophy.

Can you teach me? I have plenty of time. Please give me time, says the self.

I want to complete myself in time. So the burden of self, of that delusion, you don't walk around with that heaviness anymore, because that's a heavy, you'll become a heaviness on the planet. And whatever you walk on, you crush.

A heavy self walking, millions of heavy selves walking on the planet, crushing life. And they don't even know it. Life?

What's life? It's just a little something, says the mind. This is timber, it's worth six million dollars, I would say.

Okay, we can cut that in no time. And it's gone. A forest that was there for 100,000 years, where a field of sacredness, but the mind can't see it because the mind labeled it.

And that's nobody's fault. It's the human dysfunction. So the heaviness of self, the heaviness of self leaves you.

Oh, free of that delusion, that entity that was so hard to live with, the me that I had such a problematic relationship with. And now, there's simply, where there was a heavy me, there's a field of aware presence, walking, sitting, moving, being. It doesn't make problems anymore for itself, for other humans, for the planet.

It doesn't create suffering anymore for itself, for other humans, for the planet. Oh, and so this is why, since ancient times, they've used the word liberation to talk about this shift in consciousness, because all the ancient teachings, they point to it, and they sometimes call it liberation. From what?

Even in the New Testament, they use that expression. Free. Jesus talks about, you will be free.

You will know the truth. The truth will make you free. Free, they said, we're already free.

We are nobody's slaves. And Jesus said, no, you're not. And he used the language that he used at the time.

He said, you are the slaves of sin. Now, what's sin? If he were talking nowadays, he would have said, you're totally conditioned entities, and you're completely unconscious.

You're the slaves of your conditioning. That's all. It's the dysfunction that is sin.

No more. It's nobody's fault. It's the original sin, which is the collective dysfunction.

That's all. It's not the way in which it's usually interpreted, but there's a truth in it, a deep truth. And just as there's original sin, there's original innocence, which is the sanity in you, which is the unconditioned consciousness in you, that's far vaster than the little original sin, far vaster.

The little original sin is a little illusion. It only appears big when you are totally trapped in it. So this is the liberation already happening.

And as you walk away from here, you will have lost some weight. Not physical weight. That doesn't matter.

But the weight of me. Myself. The problem making me.

If this were not already happening here, you would not have been able to sit here for an hour and a half, according to clock time. It would have become unbearable. Or you had to exert such willpower that you made yourself sit here, but that's unlikely.

So the greatest adventure that any human being can be involved in, you are involved. And some people are still asking about their life purpose. That is your life purpose.

To embody this transformation. That's your primary life purpose. Nothing else matters.

Your secondary life purpose then is what form your external life takes as you embody this transformation. But you don't really need to do a lot of thinking about that. Because that looks after itself.

Thank you. Being here without expectancy, without a need for future, the psychological need. Is it possible to be here completely, where your field of attention is not being, right now, filled up with anything?

Unless there's a lot of mental noise in your head as you sit here, in which case the stream of thought is filling up that space of now. And it's a strange thing to become aware of the space of now without needing to fill it up with something. But if it's already filled up with mental noise, then you can at least see that and accept that.

And in that seeing and in that accepting, there is a space even around the mental noise. And there's some spaciousness there even with a noisy mind. So the little secret is, when you become aligned with this moment, now, no matter what's going on, there is space.

In that acceptance of what is, you go beyond what is. In the non-acceptance of what is, you remain stuck with what is. Although you could remove yourself to some other place, and the same stuckness condition would arise very quickly.

Stuck again. So one could say, although all words are limited, there's object consciousness. That's the normal state for most human beings.

They're identified with objects in their consciousness. Thought streams, emotions, sense perceptions. Some they like, some they dislike.

And then there is space consciousness. This is just a temporary perspective on it. And most humans don't know that yet.

Some stumble upon this accidentally almost, and are astonished. Space consciousness, what is that? It's, first of all, space consciousness arises at this very moment, as you sit here and pay attention to the words, that's object consciousness, words arise in your consciousness as temporary forms.

Same as your own thoughts, not much difference. But you also pay attention, and this is unusual for many people, to the silent spaces between the words. Paying attention simply means, one could say, to listen, to the silence that isn't part of this talk, if it's a talk.

They're just words, it's not really a talk. And that's a strange thing, at first it seems pointless, or the mind says, listen to the silent spaces. Well, that's not very interesting.

No, of course it's not interesting. Only object consciousness is interesting, because every object is so fascinating. Oh, look at that.

And every object you have some relationship with, react to. But what relationship could you have with space? And it certainly isn't interesting as such.

Interesting means it's feeding the need of the mind to add more content, more objects. Because the mind wants always more, it's the egoic mind, the self, mind made self. And space consciousness is nothing that you could add, because there seems to be nothing there.

So you pay attention to the silent spaces between words, sentences, and not only that, but also you simply pay attention, or one could say, listen, acknowledge that there is, that one could say there are two dimensions to this talk, the words, and the field, the space, the silence. Usually in a talk, people come to listen to the words, to take in new information, more of something. And here you're being invited, yes, to listen to the words, but it's being pointed out that there is a deeper dimension that mostly people would be unconscious of unless it's pointed out or they find it accidentally.

There is an underlying field, how the words couldn't even exist without the space, the stillness. Certain kinds of music can do the same. Music where stillness is an important element, and usually even there, people are not directly conscious of it, they only sense it is so deep and beautiful and sacred, and they still believe it's in the sounds.

But what really is the depth of that music lies in the ground out of which the sounds come. And the sounds point to that, and that's called very deeply spiritual kinds of music, because as you listen, something shifts inside you. Particularly if you bring conscious attention to the underlying ground, that shift happens to you the moment you pay attention to the field of stillness.

That moment is the arising of that field of stillness in you. Because with thought, you cannot listen to silence. With thought, the thinking mind, you can only listen to words or notes, sounds, but not silence.

The moment you tune into silence, silence or stillness arises in you. The moment you begin to listen to it, a dimension arises in you that we could call space consciousness, unconditioned consciousness, as it arises as a field of alert presence. And the objects are still there in consciousness, the sounds of the music, or in this case, the words.

But just as in those types of music, the sounds point beyond themselves, just as these words are not saying, listen to me, this is important. The words are not important, because they point beyond themselves. So the words have no self-importance.

They are quite unimportant, because we are here not for that. You have enough of object consciousness, the whole world is immersed in it. You have enough information, bombarded by information.

Do you need more? No. And a similar thing in certain types of painting, Eastern paintings, you have a landscape with a little tree down here, a rock, and a bird maybe flying just at the top of the painting across, and 85% of the painting is empty space.

And so from a mind perspective, this is not a significant painting, because there isn't very much there. Is that all? Couldn't he have done a little bit more to fill this canvas or the paper?

And that type of painting doesn't say, look at me, how great I am. Look at how, even the artist doesn't say, look what I can do. The artist denies him or herself, and the painting denies itself as something, because it's all pointing to something deeper than form.

And so a strange thing happens when you acknowledge that dimension in your life, and if you don't know that dimension, you don't know the most important thing there is, being itself, the ground itself, the essence of who you are. You go through your whole life immersed and identified with, and having a problematic relationship with object consciousness. And every object that arises in consciousness matters so much, and it has something to do with you.

You need it or you want to push it away. So, in other words, all you know is the world, all you know is this dimension of stuff, material stuff, mind stuff. All you know is that, and you go around battling with the stuff of this world, and you get tired after a while.

More stuff, there's only more stuff coming, all that you can gain here is more stuff, or lose the stuff that you've accumulated as the content of your mind, and then suffer, because it's painful to die as that illusion. So notice as you sit here, if there is a restlessness in you at this moment, maybe you're not even hearing what I'm saying, it could be that restless, that is, you're immersed in object consciousness thoughts, and it's frustrating, because nothing is being given to add to that. And then you can notice that, oh, oh, there's it, there it is.

And you acknowledge that. And suddenly you become conscious of the silent spaces. You listen to the silent spaces.

And for that, to be able to do that, a certain alertness is required. And a strange thing happens, as you listen to silence, and it may never be there for long, thought ceases, comes to a stop, because you cannot listen to silence with thought. You don't have to stop your mind, just listen to silence.

That's it. And the moment thought resumes, you're no longer listening to the silence. And it is good to live in that way, the two dimensions, the essence dimension, space consciousness, the dimension, one could say, of the absolute, and the dimension of the relative, in which you move in this world, as a physical body.

Interact with all these different forms, and then there is a balance in your life. For most people, all they have is the world, the stuff. And they are lost in it, they are lost in it, and trying to find themselves in and through it, for which they need future.

So our gathering here isn't really a lecture, a talk, it's something else. We don't even have a name for it. But in India, where they've been at it for longer, there's the expression satsang, which perhaps could be translated as, in the company of being, to be with being, because this is being.

Existence is form. Being is prior to form. Being is the essence of who you are.

In the company, really it means, traditionally satsang means being in the company of the teacher. But the deeper meaning is being with yourself, not the mind made self. With the deeper essence of who you are.

So we, this, I sometimes call this a portal into that state of consciousness that is the state of presence, of awareness, pure thoughtless awareness. The state of awake, being awake. Thought arises again, yes, but as you dwell in that ground of no thought, thought loses its capacity to make you unhappy.

You're no longer totally identified with every thought. You recognize the relativity of thought. You recognize that no thought contains the entire truth.

You recognize that whatever thought you think is a tiny fragment. And in many cases, more often than not, the opposite thought is equally true. It's just a different perspective.

And many other perspectives are possible, and thought can then be contained. The polarities of thought, you're no longer identified with one polarity. If they could know this in certain, in many parts of the world where there is violent conflict, each part is identified with one perspective, one viewpoint.

There's no, this is the truth. We have the truth. Only our perspective is true.

To see the relativity of thought, and whatever thought you have about yourself, it's not it. And so you can have a relationship with thought that is a little bit loose, and you stand back and say, okay, here goes another thought that's telling me that you can't make it, you're not good enough, whatever it says. Or you're, if only the world would recognize how great you are.

Whatever thought, and it's recognized as thought. You don't totally believe in every thought anymore, because it's conditioned. Other thoughts arise as you inhabit, as you dwell, are rooted in being.

Increasingly, thoughts arise that are very different from the conditioned mind activity. Those are thoughts of greater power. Those are also thoughts that can create, manifest, the famous, in new age, many people are interested in manifesting through thought.

And of course, everybody's doing it already. Everybody's manifesting whatever their world is through thought. Mostly it's unconscious.

But there's no point in dwelling on the possibilities that are inherent in thought, as far as external manifestation is concerned, unless you have gone through the shift in consciousness, so that you are not trying to manifest as a dissatisfied, little, egoic entity. And through your manifestation, trying to complete yourself or make yourself happy through this or that, that won't work. So it is primary to allow the shift in consciousness to happen, so that you recognize yourself as not what you thought you were, as the illusion of me and my story which needs to complete itself, and then desperately tries to manifest something, perhaps succeeds.

Of course, it works quite often, and then for a little while it's great, and then that doesn't fulfill its purpose either. Later, as this arises, you don't need to be concerned anymore with how to manifest, because you become then a powerful manifester, if that's a word. But it flows from the depths of your being.

That which is manifesting your reality then is not the little, egoic entity, but the one intelligence which is flowering through you, and that suddenly thoughts come that you couldn't even have thought before as an egoic entity. And then manifestation happens through you, and it's beautiful. So thought is powerful, and whatever you manifest in thought, through thought externally, will pertain to the world of external forms which come and go.

Nothing lasts forever. That remains. And that's fine.

So here we are not focusing on how to manifest, but on something more vital. How to be yourself first. Finding the portals into the unconditioned state of consciousness, then that operates.

And here is one portal, and that portal is listening to the space, the silence. And then being aware of that which comes up the objects at the same time. As God is defined in one of the Upanishads, as it's not that which you see, but that which makes all seeing possible.

It's not that which you hear, it's that all hearing possible. It's not what you think, it's that which makes all thought possible. So this stillness, we could say, that is here as external silence, which is inner stillness, is the greatest mystery.

Enormous depths in that. And Buddhists, so that you cannot make it into another mind object, call it emptiness. And that's very clever.

If you call it fullness, which is equally true, then it's easier for the mind to say there is something there. It becomes a mind object. I believe in fullness, but it's much harder to say, I believe in emptiness, because that means you believe in nothing.

So this is a portal, and it's an important one which you can use to access that state of consciousness. It's a simple fact. And outer silence helps initially with that practice, because there is something you can actually listen to the silence.

Out in nature, there will be a few sounds, but underlying the beautiful sounds that you hear in nature, there will be this vast realm of stillness in which these sounds appear. And it is that which gives people that, even if they are not conscious of it directly, they sense a depth, a beauty beyond the forms which are beautiful, but a depth to nature and a sacredness that they can't define. What is it that makes this so sacred and beautiful?

Yes, the forms, each flower, but there's even more, there's something that is beyond the forms that gives it its sacredness. And yes, it is the underlying field. And so when you walk in nature, also you can be in both worlds, so to speak, or rather in the world and in being.

As you listen, you walk around listening to the sounds and to the underlying stillness. Alertness is required for that. No tension, just a relaxed alertness.

It arises spontaneously as you listen, and there's a depth, and so already you are walking through nature in the state of thoughtless presence, awareness. Wow! And then suddenly a thought comes in, it's no longer a problem, it's just a thought, it comes in and another, and space is in between.

And as you walk in that state, you're no longer, your history becomes unimportant, your past and future, even your name and the story of me recedes. And instead what arises is the field of unconditioned consciousness. And nature is helpful because nature does not stimulate thought.

A city where everything is human-made is more likely to stimulate mind activity because the city is created by the human mind. It's the externalised mind. The noise of the city is the externalised mental noise.

And never have humans lived in a more noisy civilisation. Maybe one day this civilisation will be called the noisy civilisation. And of course the poisonous civilisation also, it creates an enormous amount of noise.

It's an externalisation of the increasing mental noise. So they create a very noisy world, and they're looking for new means of making more noise. And they have to fill up every space with noise.

I don't know how it is here, but in North America, finding a restaurant without loud music is almost impossible these days. You have to look very hard and you open the door, put in your head and it goes, and walk out again. And noise is of course, something is happening, objects arising.

Right. So nature does not stimulate thought. Of course it doesn't mean that thought doesn't arise.

Most humans, when they go into nature, are full of thought. And peripherally they see for a little while, oh that's a beautiful flower, and then the mind goes about their problems, and then they look again. There's a moment of recognition of beauty.

If they could catch that moment, there's a looking, but the navel hasn't come up yet. There's a fragment, there's a little space when they look at this flower. At first you glance at the tree or the sky.

And in many humans, that gap is for one second, two seconds. Or if you deepen, three seconds, four seconds. And if you deepen even more, ten, twenty.

And then already you are walking or standing in awe of, and then perhaps a thought may come. Beautiful. But many humans only have that as a gap of one second, two seconds, and immediately thought comes.

And that is the veil that descends between that. It's a conceptualized veil. Now, everything in nature exists in the state of no thought.

Intelligence manifests through all these forms. All these forms are the manifestation of this one intelligence. And they are beautiful, but it is prior to thought.

There was no committee meeting that said, let's work out how we can create a beautiful flower. Let's think, a think tank. Let's, okay, let's draw our plans.

Let's put data into the computer. And then after a thousand hours of thinking, you still couldn't create a rose. And but the rose didn't come out of thought.

It came out of stillness. The tree came out of stillness, grows in stillness. Timeless also.

And the entire universe is very, very still. No sound in outer space. Only in science fiction movies.

Just to give the impression that something is happening, because nobody could stand watching that silence. But there's no sound. A whole galaxy could explode, which would take millions of years.

It wouldn't make a single sound. And a whole galaxies are born out of complete stillness. And there is an intelligence at work in that stillness.

The one intelligence. Even the human mind has come out of it, it has a little experiment in noise. It's fine.

And the monkeys also, a few experiments with noise. Monkeys are very noisy. Very much like the human mind.

That's why Buddhists call the mind the monkey mind. And so to use as a portal, silence and listening to silence in nature or at home, anywhere, right here. The silence here, the stillness, is the true teacher, one could say, because it is the arising of space consciousness, of the unconditioned consciousness.

So this is a powerful portal. And as you listen to that, then you realize it's not really caused by the external silence. It can arise anywhere, no matter whether in your external surroundings, there is a silent space or not.

Because there are situations in this noisy world, many places and situations, there's hardly ever a silent space. You're bombarded by noise and noise making, even in the office or at your workplace. In the family, always things going on.

Many families, we go there, there's two or three TVs on, children screaming, parents saying, get this done, do this, we're in a hurry. And now a beautiful thing, when you notice that the arising of stillness can happen by itself, the listening to silence is really the arising of inner stillness. And for that you don't really need, it's beautiful if you have the stillness outside and you use that as a portal.

But once you become familiar, so to speak, with that state, it can be there no matter where you are, as the simple arising of thoughtless awareness. And this brings us to another portal, very powerful one. It takes you into the same place, and that is a portal of acceptance of what is.

Takes you also into space consciousness. And this is interesting. Acceptance of what is, we spoke about it already, because it is, there's nothing you can do with is.

You can argue with it, but it's futile. Is is as it is at this moment. What can you do?

And so you accept. Or you don't accept. And if you don't accept, contraction arises.

The self gets strengthened, the illusion of the me in that non-acceptance, the boundary around me gets strengthened, so the sense of identity, the artificial, illusory sense of identity gets strengthened through the non-acceptance. This shouldn't be. And the noise-making of the mind becomes stronger when you deny what is.

Because if you watch the noise-making, the compulsive thought activity, a lot is to do with projecting yourself into a future moment. In other words, trying to get away from this one, to a more fulfilling one, a more complete, powerful, pleasurable one. So the acceptance of what is, externally, then there's a stillness, a peace, and a stillness arises, no matter what the external condition is, if it is accepted internally, welcomed, the is-ness of it.

But if you can't do it, contraction arises. But if you are aware of that, the emotion that arises through non-acceptance, anger, sadness, you watch that, what do you do with that? It is as it is.

Then you accept that. And every time you accept on level one, you accept what is externally. So you do not create inner resistance.

You do not strengthen the illusory self through that. And a spaciousness arises around what is. If you miss that opportunity, resistance is there.

But suddenly you recognize that resistance is there, and you recognize the emotion that is arising in this situation, and instead of saying, oh, you see, you have failed again, you see, acceptance is totally pointless, you give up even trying to accept, you can't, you see, you're failing at this just as you failed at that. No. If you see it, it's enough.

There's the turbulence of the emotion. What do you do with that? It already is.

You allow it to be. And that suddenly, again, there is a space around the anger or the irritation, the tightness, through the yes. Let's say an irritating noise happens and you feel the irritation, you don't catch it quickly enough to say, well, there were children who were noisy before.

Irritation could arise and you don't catch it quickly enough, you've forgotten that this is the school and this is what children do. And so the mind says, it shouldn't be noisy here, we've come for spiritual talk. And so if you don't catch it soon enough, the irritation is there within a moment and it's accompanied by certain thoughts.

The thoughts are critical of this moment. And then suddenly you catch that and you say, hmm, you sense the irritation, you see the thought that goes with it, and then you say, well, there it is, there's the turbulence, let it be. What can you do?

You can't argue with it, it shouldn't be here, you have another problem on top of the irritation, you create the problem that you shouldn't be irritated with all the spiritual work you've done, you shouldn't be, by now you should be beyond this by now. But there it is. And so, oh, irritation.

And you simply, there's a flow of attention, you give it some attention, gentle flow of attention. And it is. And suddenly there's a space around the irritation.

It's still there, but it's being contained within a greater spaciousness. So in other words, you are now in touch with space consciousness. You know yourself ultimately as not that which arises, but that which contains all that arises.

And you know yourself as that simply through accepting whatever arises, instead of battling with it. So the doorway, the portal into self-realisation is not some kind of needing to become something that you're not yet, and beating yourself up when you're not living up to certain ideas in your head that perhaps have been put there by teachings or reading books of how beings should behave, and I'm not there yet. That's not the enlightened being.

Nothing in form is beyond the polarities as this form, including enlightened entities, beings, they will express somewhere certain polarities in their life. They might like chocolate cake or whatever, or go to Starbucks and drink coffee, as I do sometimes. And then people say, you drink coffee?

You shouldn't be drinking coffee. Well, it's only two or three times a week. Well, you shouldn't be drinking coffee.

You should be beyond that. And then you can internalise that as a voice in your head. I haven't made it yet.

The state of perfection has not been reached yet. You can struggle for a long time with that. And then you see, that's not the way.

There's a much quicker way. And that quick way has no problems in it, and doesn't make yourself into a problem, or anybody else into a problem, or any situation into a problem that is to be overcome. The mind itself likes that, because then it can struggle and be in opposition to something, even itself.

It likes to be in conflict with itself. And so, the doorway into the state of perfection is acceptance of the is-ness, whether it be external, or if you miss it there, your second chance is interval. It is.

Then you are no longer completely caught up in what is, in a reactive relationship to what is. You become deeper, you already are, but then you know that you are deeper than what is. And you know yourself as the spaciousness around what is.

And the irritation no longer matters that much. It's a human energy formation, nothing personal in it. The personal nature goes out of emotions, saying, me, there's a me in every emotion, a self in every emotion otherwise.

It's my problem, this emotion is mine, it's part of my story. And then you realize it's a human emotion, your fear is not much different from any other person's fear, or anger, or sadness, or irritation. It is an energy turbulence or a heaviness.

So as you allow it, the self, the delusion of self goes out of it. It's only through non-allowing that you strengthen the self nature of every feeling, every emotion, and thought, every thought. There's a self in it.

But then as you step back from the workings of the conditioned mind, you realize it's the human mind. And even that, it's not personal. The self that was in every thought is recognized as the Buddha did, as an illusion, an illusory entity.

And that arises now is self-realization. And it arises through seeing what you are not. Thoughts, emotions, events, sense perceptions, in other words, objects in consciousness.

There's no self there. The Buddhist doctrine, the Buddhist teaching of anatta, no self, of course. So who am I then?

I'm space, stillness, the ground, thoughtless, aware presence. In the absence of a spiritual teaching, all you have as a teacher is life, and the challenges of life, and what that is going to do to you sooner or later, it will take away objects that you have accumulated in your mind, in consciousness, and identified with as self. Loss.

Loss of possessions, loss of recognition, loss of people close to you, loss of physical abilities as you grow old. Or if you're lucky, before you grow old, you encounter some kind of disaster in your life, and you lose a lot all at once. Maybe your job, maybe your health at the same time, and your possessions, or someone close to you.

And it goes within a short space of time, it's all gone. Objects have like dissolved in front of your eyes that were me, part of me. And that is traditionally, and before there were ever any spiritual teachers or teachings, a few human beings realised who they were through sudden and great loss.

When objects that they had identified with in consciousness, content, was removed from them. The opposite of what the self, the mind-made self wanted and thought would get me to enlightenment, the opposite, because the mind-made self thinks in enlightenment, thinks of enlightenment in terms of more. Surely enlightenment is the greatest thing.

So it thinks of it in terms of something that I can add to myself as the attainment. And then suddenly life does something to you, and the opposite happens, not more, but less. Life takes things away.

Instead of giving you enlightenment, it takes away the little that you had, or the lot that you had, and so empty spaces appear where before there was something. And it's being torn out of you by life. Sometimes violent events can happen.

Life tears something from you, accidents, illness, whatever disaster. That's a powerful teacher. And so as it tears something from you, the opposite of what the self had been, because it had been planning a good outcome to its story.

I was planning a happy ending for my story, and now this has happened. It's destroyed everything, the whole script. I don't think I can put it back together again, or I have to rewrite the whole thing.

And so suddenly empty spaces appear where before there was something, now there is nothing. Before there was recognition of you as someone important, the world thought a lot of you, then you lose your position or your reputation through some scandal, maybe you did something silly, and now everybody thinks you're nothing, they don't even talk about you anymore. So that's an empty space.

A content, a mental image is gone, it's not fat anymore, it can't sustain itself. And then you lose your house, and then your wife leaves you, and then somebody very close to you dies, and then the stock market crashes. And before you know it, there's mostly empty spaces where before there was something, quite a lot.

And now two things are possible, an even more fearful and angry and bitter and resentful self-contraction of the egoic entity that now quickly rewrites the story and gets identified with that, and then the story says, I'm the most miserable of all beings, I have failed at everything, life has treated me unfairly, and that becomes a new story, which is what you're telling yourself in the head or telling to others. Before it looked like a great story, but now it's quickly rewritten, so that you can identify with a new conceptualised sense of self, and that is a very bitter and resentful one, and exists in a continuous state of contraction.

But at least you know who you are. Instead of allowing the empty spaces, you quickly fill them up with new concepts. Now this is of course an unhappy story, but it is far better to the self than no story at all that you can tell yourself and others.

So it's all been in vain, 30 years of work, all for nothing, they've all let me down, it's pointless, and then you have a lot to say about it. And you have a new sense of self arising out of that, and then you die. But there's a potential, on the other hand, that you don't run away from the empty spaces, and you may be so stunned by the empty spaces appearing suddenly, where before there was something, now there is nothing, that you just sit there, stunned, and look, and somehow you say, what can I do?

It's all gone. And you may suddenly laugh, and not realise, perhaps you don't have a word for it, that you have suddenly and spontaneously entered the surrendered state of consciousness. And the space, all these empty spaces where before there was something, through these holes in your life, space consciousness emerges.

There was the BMW, now there's a hole, and through it comes, there was the big house, now there's nothing there, and it comes through there. There was the wife that was there, beautiful, attractive, you could show her off to everybody, and so feel bigger, and now she left you for another man, betrayed you, let you down, or whatever the story says, and now there's nothing, she's gone, and what comes through is space, unconditioned, and suddenly you say, what's going on? I should be unhappy, and I feel so peaceful.

And you walk around in that state of amazement. You sit on a park bench, and no story is happening in your head anymore. Life is enough without a story.

Going through life without a story, except some memories, is fine, without the heaviness of a conceptualised identity. And you can notice, the conceptualised identity at times wants to reassert itself, and then you simply step into now, use a portal into now, because the conceptualised identity functions only through thought, and thought functions only through past and future. So there may be some of you here who have already experienced what I just talked about, life taking things away from you, and so that, the arising of that which is unconditioned is through the openings that is already happening.

And if that hadn't happened to you, you wouldn't be here. You would be happy watching TV now. You would be happy in your unhappiness of being asleep, and identified with the story of me, which seems to still be, it's still working, still hoping it's going to work out, and suddenly.

So grace comes in many ways into your life, not only in ways that are usually easily recognised as grace, grace comes in ways that you would never call grace until you realise what it is. There was a film made about the life of Ram Dass, a spiritual teacher who suffered a stroke, and the title of that film is Fierce Grace. Fierce is...

and so sometimes it happens that grace comes into your life in strange ways, that only afterwards you recognise as grace, such as loss, great loss. And loss is grace. Death is grace.

Because every loss is a form of death, loss of something that you had identified with as content of the mind, of me. That is a death, and that is grace. And that is, the mind calls it awful, dreadful, shouldn't be happening, but it happens all the time.

Now, a spiritual teaching, when you realise how this transformation operates, then the spiritual teaching comes into your life and you are suddenly opened. And then grace operates in that way, much more gentle. Grace is here, but it's more gentle than the fierce grace.

It's both grace. Maybe you already had the fierce. Maybe you'll get the fierce as the last thing you need to enter the surrendered state.

Maybe you don't need it anymore, because as we sit here, that which other people lose through loss, we voluntarily lose here because we recognise that ultimately it's an illusion. And that is also grace. And so, as it has been said in a holy book, die before you die.

That's how it's translated. Sometimes translated also as, find death before death finds you, because death will find you. Forms dissolve.

And now, here, you are finding death before it finds you, and realise only forms dissolve, and there's that which is beyond birth and death. Perhaps not even that, because that's already a mental formulation. It may be enough to realise the peace that is here now, as you no longer oppose this moment.

And that peace is beyond words, that spaciousness is beyond words and concepts. But it frees you from fear. It frees you from the illusory self.

And some humans have then said, I now know that there is no death. Well, that's one way of putting it. But no belief is required here.

So bring that yes to now, no matter what the now contains. It could not be otherwise. It's one with the totality, the form of this now.

Opposing it is madness. And then change happens out of that. This is good to know that no matter what happens to you, nothing can really stop you any more, because it's all as it should be.

Whatever condition rises, is as it is. And the yes to it will take you into that deep peace that comes with the realising the spaciousness around phenomena. You can give attention to the sound, listen to the sound, and listen particularly to the point where the sound begins to dissolve, and what's left is just the field of attention, the presence, the awareness.

In some teachings it's called the I am that is listening. So we have an object in consciousness, the sound, and consciousness as the ground that remains. And you can be aware both as you listen to the sound of the sound, and strangely enough, you can be aware of the awareness that is listening, the listening presence at the same time.

And we could call that awareness of awareness, not awareness of something in awareness, awareness of awareness, self-aware. This is an enormous shift in consciousness. I am that.

I am that. That is the one presence, the one fundamental identity of all things is the I am presence, the one consciousness. And so we have the beautiful phrase in the Bible somewhere when God defines him, her, itself as, I am that I am.

I am that. So that's the end of believing that I am this, or I am that, because every this and that is the beginning of a story, is the beginning of identification with some kind of form. In other words, it's the beginning of the dream, the dream of form, the dream of me being that form.

And so you realize the essence of I am is never I am this or that, because this or that is always form and it's a story that starts with a form. But simply, the eternal I am presence, eternal means timeless. There's no time in that consciousness, because it's not object consciousness.

Time operates in the world of objects. There can be no world of objects without time. Time has no existence as such.

It's created by the mind in order to create a world of forms. You could not even imagine a world of form without time. So time is in the structure of the human mind to create a universe, to project that, and that's fine on its own level.

But if who you are gets caught up in that world of relativity and polarity, then that is the state of ignorance. Knowing God, I don't use that word very often, is knowing I am as the essence. It's so simple.

And that is the one thing that everybody knows that there's something so precious in me, and I don't want to lose that. The essence of one's identity that gets mixed up with a story, that gets mixed up with form, is presence, is awareness, is the I am. After we have taken a little break, because the physical bodies need things like breaks, we will look at something that is a great obstacle for many people to the arising presence and that is the human pain body and how the pain body also can become, one could say, a portal instead of being an obstacle.

Pain body, as you know, is the accumulated past in every human being. Racial past, personal past, and there's a lot of heaviness in there. Another profound statement in the Bible that I quoted earlier, be still and know that I am God.

Be still and know. Be still means dwell in that state of no thought that is stillness. And know, so in that state of no thought, in that stillness, there is a deep knowing that I am God.

I am is one with the one. So in that little pointer, we have each word basically means the same. It's about being, be, stillness, knowing, the knowing that is beyond mind, beyond concepts, I am God, not as a new form identity.

So we are coming to know the meaning of consciousness without thought. To be awake means to be in the state of consciousness without thought. Not to be identified with thought is to be awake.

Portal into that state, we have seen listening to silence, acceptance of now as a portal into that state. And of course, the inner body is also a portal into that state, sensing the aliveness that is throughout your body. Now at first it may appear that that is an object that arises in your awareness, and at first that may be the case, because you feel certain energy movements.

As you go deeper, you realize there's vast spaciousness in here. And you realize the spaciousness that is in here, that is alive, that's spacious, is one with who you are. So although at first it may appear that when we speak of body awareness, as if the body were an object that arises in your consciousness, as you go deeper in, you realize the space of consciousness that is the essence of what appears temporarily as a physical body.

So the body also can become a doorway, a portal into space consciousness. And then that aliveness, that spacious aliveness, as you go through this portal, is suddenly everywhere. It's not confined anymore to the space of this body.

But the entry point is into attention moving into body. And so as we sit here, we can have a generalized sense of aware presence, or awareness is throughout the body. We're sensing the aliveness that is in every cell.

Very subtle at first, it's not just in the background. It's also a beautiful anchor for presence. You may at times want to close your eyes and go very deep into that inner body, so that you then lose the mental image of the form of the body.

And then they're no longer different parts of the body, but just a one generalized sense of spacious presence. And that is beautiful. It quickly takes you out of the story in the head into the power of now.

And this portal of the inner body is of course a way of contacting, of not just contacting, but realizing the intelligence that is there in that spaciousness of the body. That intelligence that is already greater than the human mind. Intelligence that operates temporarily as a physical body.

Enormous, from the point of view of mind, enormously complex. It operates noiselessly, beautifully, with no thinking involved. Intelligence.

So it has been said in a holy book somewhere, God is closer to you than hands and feet. Or it's been said in the Koran, God is closer to you than your jugular vein, which is up here somewhere, one of the main veins in the body. Closer to you than hands and feet.

What's closer than hands and feet? So that means God must be very close to me. And so if God, he, she, it, is closer than hands and feet, it must be even deeper than that, than hands and feet are out here.

So it's inside that. And for thousands of years, humans have looked for God through thought, mental abstraction. And for a long time thought, it's out there somewhere.

And then one early astronomer who looked, used one of the first people to use a telescope, said, I've looked everywhere and I haven't seen God anywhere. Well, good, that's the beginning of the end of an illusion. So this is a portal that is always there, because the body, wherever you go, the body goes with you.

Shifting attention from noise-making in the head, and then you notice it, because it brings about, very quickly, makes you suffer one way or another. And then you notice it. And the moment you notice that basically you've lost the now and so you suffer, that noticing is the arising of presence.

But that can be obscured immediately after you notice it by the mind again, which then judges the noticing and says, you see, you can't do it. And it says, oh, I can't be present now, not now, I have no time for the now. Tomorrow I'll look at the now again.

But first I have to sort all these things out which are more important than now. So often you will find a thought telling you, you can't be in the body now, it's just too much on my mind. And then you recognise that as a thought, without believing in it.

It's a thought, because thought has a momentum and it wants to keep going. And it will bring up other thoughts to justify that you should be giving your complete attention to thought. Every thought could be considered a little entity, a form, a life form with a short lifespan, but it's there and the entity wants to proliferate and grow and remain in its form.

So the mind can be considered an entity too in itself, an energy field, an energy form, and it wants to stay in control. It doesn't want to make room. So it will bring up thoughts that tell you, no, you can't do it now, this is too much, I've just...

And then you recognise the thought, and then you say, there's a thought that I can't do it, and then you move your attention into the body.

[Speaker 2] (4:40:37 - 4:40:37)

Oh.

[Speaker 1] (4:40:40 - 5:40:11)

And you might feel the pull of thought wanting your attention back up in the head. And you just, there's no struggle, you can't struggle with the mind, you can just gently hold attention in the body. If only, even the hands is enough as an anchor, because then some of your attention moves into the body.

And even sensing the aliveness that is in your hands, when the mind is extremely restless, and maybe you cannot feel immediately any other part of the body, just that is the beginning of the doorway, the portal, you're touching it as you go into hands, and then simply holding the feeling of hand, sensing that, so some of your attention is here, and the mind is slightly less active, it hasn't got all your attention anymore.

Now the mind will pretend, every thought pretends that it is, it matters, and you must believe me. Every thought wants to matter, to be important, and you have to believe it, thought about yourself, your relationship with your partner, thought about your partner, thought about, and you're in it every, and so to realise that at any time your attention from the stream of thought into presence, and a good doorway is the body, one of the portals. And simply holding attention in your hands helps.

And then attention gradually moves more into the body because you sense this is so alive. You may come across people in your daily life, maybe parents, friends, relatives, who are not yet ready to listen to the teaching of presence or acceptance of now, but many people are ready for such simple truths of sensing the body. And you can tell your father or grandfather or grandmother or uncle who is tortured by his mind, can't get out, has been telling the same stories for the past thirty years, and you can tell him, can you feel your hands?

What? And then the very just point out there is a possibility that you can feel an aliveness in the body. Just try it.

No, I can't feel a thing, I mean, leave me alone with that. You just try. No, I can't feel anything.

You can explain that the body contains intelligence. Most people can see that if you say that they couldn't control the functions of the body with their mind, so there must be some other intelligence at work. And then say, close your eyes, hold your right or left hand like this.

Is there any way you can find out whether your right hand is still there or not without opening your eyes, without touching anything? Can you know whether this hand is still there or not, you can ask. And if they do it, after a little while they say, well yes, I can feel it.

It's still there. So, there it is. So that question can take their attention, because if you only say move your attention into the body, they may not be able to do it if they have lived their whole life in the head.

But that little question, is there any way you can find out, how can you know whether your right hand is still there if you close your eyes and don't touch anything, and don't move it, and suddenly they feel it. Oh, yes. So this could be the beginning of something for somebody who is not yet ready for anything else, at least they can begin to move some, and then feel the benefit of that.

Okay, the portal is opening up, that portal is beginning to open. That's good. And then, for yourself, to have some attention in here, so that the mind doesn't create stories again.

While you go, while you travel on a bus, dwell in the energy field of body, and watch the landscape go past you, the cityscape go past you, and simultaneously have attention in the inner energy field of body. And there is the state that we pointed to earlier, in which you are able to perceive without needing to label it, because you have an anchor now for staying present. So you are not at the mercy of the conditioned mind, which labels things compulsively.

So this is the anchor, and so you can then perceive with that freshness, newness, and aliveness that is there when you are not interpreting or labelling that which you are perceiving. So you sense the body, at this very moment you can sense a little bit the subtleness, the energy field, the energy in the inner body, and hear the words, and be aware of the totality of the room, without needing to label, because your attention is not exclusively in thought anymore, it's moved out of mind. And so to use that anchor, also in nature it may be helpful, sit somewhere on the beach, on a stone, on a bench, enter the body, and then look, and then listen.

Oh, it's so easy now to listen without the interference of thought, and to be in that alertness. So whenever you feel overwhelmed by mind, a quick way is shifting attention into the inner body. And don't believe the thought that tells you you can't do it, at least not now.

One could say you have the choice now to be present. That's an enormous choice. You have the choice to be identified with mind.

It doesn't look like a choice, because the mind pulls you in. So you have the choice to step out of that, and be present. You only have that choice, ultimately, because the totality with which you are intrinsically connected is moving through you.

Presence is arising through you, but from the point of view of this entity, from that perspective, and everything I say, every language, every thought is only a perspective, from that perspective one could say that you have a choice now to be present. Ultimately the only reason why you have a choice is that the evolutionary impulse of the universe is moving through you. From the limited perspective of an entity, it seems that you have a choice, and it's a good perspective.

I have a choice now, I can choose presence. How is it that you can choose presence? Because it's happening.

Ultimately it's not you choosing. So this is a deeper perspective. You don't have a choice, presence is emerging.

But as a temporary limited perspective, it's helpful to say, I have a choice. That's part of the emerging presence, is to see that you have a choice, and later you can let go of that perspective. Because some of you have read certain teachings that say you have no choice, there's nothing you can do, go home.

It either happens or it doesn't happen. That's one kind of teaching, and that's one perspective, it has an element of truth also, but it's not the entire truth. No statement or perspective has the entire truth.

Another teaching says, unless you want liberation or enlightenment with the same urgency that a drowning person wants air, you won't get it. So which one am I going to believe? And they both seem reputable teachers, so is one of them wrong and the other one is right, or are they just different perspectives, and how can they ever be reconciled?

Where does the urgency come from with which I want liberation? It's all the one moving through you, but you can adopt different perspectives. Wanting liberation is good.

Wanting liberation in the future won't get you there. So if you shift the wanting liberation from future, a mudja, into now, wanting liberation now, then it works. And if you want liberation now, you realise there's nothing you can do beyond what already is.

Okay, let's see. If that impulse of wanting freedom, which usually seeks future, wanting implies you want something through future, if you see the fallacy of that, but don't go to the other polarity and say, okay, I've had it, I'm going home and watch every soap opera that there is and I'm going to drink beer, because there's nothing I can do anyway. No, the wanting that moves into future, can you move that wanting into now, that urgency, that seeking?

How can you seek in the now without future? There can be an intensity with which you face what is. So the seeking becomes an intensity of presence, and you meet the now with that intensity of alert presence.

Before that intensity became a mind movement of seeking, but now that intensity becomes the presence, and here's the now, and you embrace that in the field of presence, and uncompromising yes to what is. Now you've brought, and then the saying, the teacher that said there's nothing you can do was also right, because this is what is. Let's stop it here.

It's hard to reconcile seemingly opposite perspectives, but this was a little attempt to reconcile that there's nothing you can do, it's true, there's something you can do is also true, neither contains the entire truth, and it's happening now. So it's good whenever you are waiting somewhere, I mention that in the book, because it's amazing how much time people spend waiting for things in daily life. You're waiting on the phone, you're waiting on the computer, you're waiting at the bank, you're waiting at the post office, at the bus stop, at the traffic light, so much waiting, and most people are restless and uneasy and needing to get to the future, and then there's the waiting for some bigger event to happen in your life, making it one day they will recognise me, and that could be a long wait. So you have all these short waits, and then you have the long waits.

Let's just talk about the short waits, how when you're waiting you can bring, connect with the inner body, at any moment when there's nothing else you can do, you might as well sense the aliveness that is here now, use that portal, no matter where, traffic light, telephone, post office, hold the line please, they say, and ten minutes later you're still there, and you could be in here. It doesn't really, it's only the mind that tells you, oh you're wasting time, you have to sit somewhere, so you might as well sit here, and you have to hold your hand in some position, you might as well hold the phone. It doesn't really matter.

Wherever you go, you'll be sitting or standing somewhere and moving in some way. Is the next moment going to be so much greater than this one? At the airport, flight is delayed by three hours.

Oh my, no, not again. Well, does it matter whether you sit on this chair there or whether you sit on the plane, or when you arrive home you sit in another chair? There isn't that much more in phenomenal universe, it's what you can do with this body is limited.

And then at times when you think, this is great, presence is arising, freedom is here, suddenly you get overtaken by this incredible heaviness, turbulence, a little trigger did it, and you're totally back in mind and heavy emotions that go with it, and the energy field that you are shifts so that some people hardly recognize you, so great is the shift. Pain body, the accumulation of past emotional pain, human pain, going back a million years, personal pain, to add to the pain that's already there in every human being for the simple reason that you are a human being on this planet living in the collective human unconsciousness that has created so much suffering already for itself. So you carry some of that suffering as an emotional field of pain with you, and then in your childhood you absorb more of it through the suffering of the child from parents, so there's this emotional field, an entity, temporary being that lives in you, that is the pain body, contracted life energy, can't flow anymore, an aspect of the egoic entity, the me, and sometimes it's not there, you can't feel it, it's there, but it's dormant, it can't remain dormant for too long because it needs to feed, it needs more pain to feed on, that's what it recognizes, that kind of emotional pain, it loves that, it doesn't know anything else. So I'm offering you a perspective on something that is very real, not ultimately real, but relatively real in you, and to say that it is like an entity that has its own little intelligence is quite close to the truth, not the absolute truth. It is not an enemy, there's nothing ultimately that's an enemy and that is not you, it is life energy, and the only reason why it's painful is it's stagnant, under pressure, turbulent or heavy, and through the egoic delusions, the me with its constant dissatisfaction and lack and future projections and not enough, that's been over many thousands of years, it's come into being in humans, and then added to through the enormous suffering that humans have inflicted on other humans that increased it, and the torture, the rapes, killings, warfare almost continues in human history.

So humans have been through a lot. If humanity were one single being, you would say he or she has been through a lot. He's been through madness, well, hardly, just beginning to come out of it, and inflicted so much pain, suffered so much, and that's in every human being.

Sometimes the pain body is dormant, you can hardly feel it, not feel it at all, and when it needs to feed again, a little trigger, which could be just a thought in your head that you totally believe in, about yourself, about your relationship, about your position in the world, one little thought arises, you don't recognize it as a little thought, and you believe in it completely, and the pain body is ready to awaken, it will link into that thought, and suddenly it will come to life, it will awaken, and through that thought that's linked into, move into your mind, or it will use a reaction, a little thing goes wrong in your life, they keep you waiting for too long on the phone, or whatever it is, but the pain body was ready to awaken, and suddenly you get an enormous influx of turbulence, anger, or deep sadness, whatever the energy field of your pain body, the predominant energy field is, and then the pain body has awakened, and it will be feeding on your thought processes to start with, and they will reflect the energy field of the pain body, because the pain body can only feed on painful thoughts, and at that moment then you are totally identified, your sense of self, of me, the story of me, is totally identified with that movement of pain, totally identified with the thoughts that are being created by the pain body, and are feeding the pain body, a vicious circle. The old pain in you creates those thoughts, they're all total misinterpretations, they have perhaps a limited truth to them, but they are totally, a total distortion of the truth which is far beyond that, but every thought is totally believed in, and the emotion that comes with the thoughts is the pain body, and it's feeding on the thoughts and getting bigger, the more you think about yourself, or your life situation, the more it feeds, and you sit there in that heaviness or turbulence, and then you're waiting for somebody close to you to come and feed the pain body externally, to give you a reaction of pain, so that you can feed on your partner's or somebody else's reaction, pushing the buttons, and you get the feedback of emotional pain. Drama, I love it, give me more drama, this is, the heaviness of it, it could be the drama of anger, or it could be the drama of great heaviness, and the pain body is feeding, and it works, it uses your environment, at work it might do it, it's looking for pain. So beware when there are walking pain bodies around, and at any given time in the population, the people who are walking around the streets or driving cars, probably one can say 10% of those people are in the middle of pain body attack at any given time.

And they are dangerous, because they want something bad to happen. They don't know it, they don't say, they don't say I want something bad to happen, but they're looking for trouble. And we all meet people like that in that state, they are looking for something bad to happen.

And they are looking at you, challenging you to give them some bad feedback, or the driver is looking for the accident. Many of accidents that happen in traffic are caused by driving pain bodies. They are looking for the next bad thing, and the obvious next bad thing when you're driving is an accident.

Particularly good when two driving pain bodies meet. Then the likelihood is very high that the accident will happen, and then they can create even more pain. There's a recent phenomenon in, I don't know if it's the same here, called road rage, where after the accident, it's not enough for the pain bodies to have caused the accident and feel bad about it, after the accident they jump out of their cars and beat each other up to feel even worse, even kill, some have killed others.

So violence becomes possible in very unconscious people, and there are still many around, when they are in the middle of a pain body attack. There are certain situations where the pain body is more likely to arise because there's very little consciousness in you at those times, getting drunk, for example. Males particularly are prone to becoming violent, more in certain cultures than in others, when they drink.

After a few drinks, they're looking for, and they find something. I mentioned in the book for women, menstruation is a time when the collective female pain body tends to come up, because there is a strong collective aspect to each person's pain body. There's a collective male pain body, there's a collective female pain body, and women have suffered tremendously as women for thousands of years.

The cultures have been patriarchal, and women have been subservient to men and used in many cultures almost like slaves. So there is a strong female pain body that arose through the suffering of women that tends to arise at the time of menstruation and just before, and a woman can observe it at that time and bring more, suddenly, how do you get beyond pain body, that vicious circle? Simply know that it is there.

Bring presence to it, bring, sense it, feel it, there it is, look at it, aware, give it some attention, and what else can you do except to say, there it is? But when you watch it as it arises in you, it cannot use your mind and become an even more unhappy story, more unhappy than even it is unhappy enough without the pain body, the story of me. But when the pain body comes, the story of me becomes dreadful, an awful drama or tragedy, a very self-destructive story, so the pain body doesn't feed anymore on your thinking when you are able to bring attention to it, recognize it, and allow it to be the heaviness or the turbulence, so that it doesn't turn into the illusory self.

And that is the primary challenge of all those who are now going through this transformation of consciousness. Their primary challenge is not to lose themselves again in the pain body each time it comes, because it has enormous momentum. Wow!

Enormous momentum is contained in that, and alertness is required so that you can recognize it when it comes, especially if you can recognize it in its early stages, just as it begins to come up as a reaction, as a thought, and you feel the heaviness descending or the turbulence coming up, hmm, there it is. Or you may recognize it next time, even in the middle of it, it can happen, as presence is arising, when you are having, re-enacting the weekly drama with your partner, to suddenly, in the middle of it, wake up, and you suddenly realize we are acting it out again, and to sense the turbulence of it, wow, this feels very agitated, very turbulent, wow, there's the pain body, interesting. What do you do with it?

You can't get rid of it just like that. It is, there it is, there's the human pain body. You allow it to be.

It's a strange thing to allow the pain body to be, and then the pain body is not a self anymore, it doesn't become a self, an unhappy self. All that's left of it is turbulence, or heaviness, or tightness, fear, anger, sadness, depression, whatever form, hmm, maybe there's one out there. So you will find pain body in yourself, and you will see it more easily in others, and it's the challenge, it's your challenge to recognize it, really all that's needed is to recognize it.

Don't have to do anything beyond that, but to see it for what it is, just the seeing. The seeing implies that you just let it be, you can't see it without letting it be. There it is.

All that's ultimately needed is to see it and say, there it is, and then continue to watch that. Then it cannot feed anymore on your thoughts. It doesn't become a self.

All that's left is, it's almost a physical thing now. It's emotional, but it has a very strong physical component. It changes the chemistry of your body.

If you could examine the inner chemistry of your body, you would see the changes in the body chemistry that happen every time pain body arises in you, color of the stomach lining changes to red, innumerable changes in circulation, how the organs function, you could examine all that, so it has a very strong physical component. It is almost reduced to a physical symptom when you watch it, emotional, half emotional, half physical. But the main thing is, it's no longer an entity, a me.

You don't mistake it anymore, and then it's not, the energy then gradually becomes transmuted. It becomes freed from its stuckness, it couldn't flow anymore, but by allowing it, it begins to flow again, the energy that was contained in here. And it's very often people with heavy pain bodies have the greatest motivation to become free, because they just can't stand it anymore.

Again and again, I was such a person, who had such a heavy pain body, that one night, when it came up very strongly again, I couldn't live with myself anymore. Now myself was the pain body. And the mind made story, energized by the pain body, heavy, intolerable, I can't live with myself.

I didn't know at the time that that wasn't myself, but the sentence arose in my mind, I cannot live with myself any longer. I can't live with myself any longer, it's just too much. And then there was a stepping back from that thought, and I looked at the structure of the thought, I cannot live with myself.

Am I one or two? This sentence seems to imply that I'm two, I and the self that I cannot live with. Who is the self and who am I?

This could be a question that a Zen master might ask you, who is the self and who are you? It's a koan, but it could be. This koan arose spontaneously, it didn't have an answer, koans don't have real answers, not on the mind level, they just stop your mind.

And at that strange moment, I, and this is the whole essence of the teaching now, what happened that night, I didn't understand it at all until years later, I separated itself from the self, including the pain body. I, the sense of presence, consciousness, had become mixed with form, thought forms and emotional forms, the bundle of me. And suddenly, because it became so painful, I withdrew from identification with thoughts and emotions and remained in the state of the simple I am presence.

And I am is never unhappy, only the self is unhappy. I am is free, always. So it came out and then the self was no longer being sustained by identification with it, and it collapsed.

And what was left was, I am. And the next morning, I am said, how can I be so peaceful? What happened?

Something happened, but I don't know what. Just peace, wherever I go, there's peace. In the middle of the noisy traffic in the city, that's peaceful, everything is so peaceful, what happened?

No idea. I didn't know until years later that the self and the pain body had self-destructed. And this is relatively rare, I realized later.

For most humans, the process is a little bit more gradual. It's a gradual disidentification from the story, the mind-made self and the energy field of pain body. You're stepping out, you're drawn back in, step out, get drawn back in.

And gradually, presence arises more and more. But that was just amazing to see how the story of me evaporated. And then I didn't realize either that the peace was there, because there wasn't all that much thinking anymore.

Because without the story of me, there isn't that much to think about. And suddenly everything was so alive, which of course it always is. It was no longer obscured by the veil of conceptualization and labeling.

Aliveness. Everywhere. Peace.

And so that's, then this is the universal process of recognition. The pain that is old pain is human pain. Nothing personal.

Not an identity. Just pain. So all that's required is to see it when it arises, instead of being it.

That is the illusion. Because then it's, I am that pain. I am that story that's associated with that pain.

I am very heavy. I am very unhappy. And so there's the simple seeing.

Then I am doesn't get mixed up with that. So that is our task, is to be there as the witness of the pain body, one could say, and let it be. And at first you won't sense a lot of space around it, because pain body at first occupies everything.

They can be so heavy that they seem to, they occupy your entire being and they seem to, that heaviness seems to color all your sense perceptions and all your thoughts and the entire world seems to be heavy with it. And so you allow it to be and at first there's just a little bit of space around it suddenly. And then suddenly there's a bit more space around it.

And the more you allow it to be, the greater the spaciousness around it. And then it seems, the pain body seems to shrink. It does shrink, but also it shrinks because you have a different perspective on it.

And then the space is so much vaster than that. This is the process of transformation. So also not making an identity out of the pain body for other human beings.

Because as you go through life, very often you encounter humans that are in the grip of pain body. And you will probably recognize it more easily now. If you know people well, you can see the shift that comes over them as the pain body takes them over, immediately, as the entire energy field changes.

And this has been a shock for many people who got married. These days it happens less, but in the past, many people got married without ever living together at first. So they would get married and then start living together.

And so after getting married, you would certainly meet your partner's pain body. It can be a dreadful shock because, of course, you didn't know what it was. You just thought, this was the person I married, the beautiful angel, or Mr. Right, and suddenly turns into this monster. Is he now showing his real face? Is that her real self that she's been hiding from me? And so it can easily be misinterpreted, and it's spoiled many honeymoons, because it hasn't been recognized as the pain body.

You thought, oh, I made a dreadful mistake marrying that person. Of course, the truth is, whoever you marry will have a pain body unless they're already free, and there are not yet many that are free. Freedom is secondary from pain body.

The question is whether they are totally identified with it or not. As presence comes through you into the relationship, that will affect the other person also. If you can talk about the pain body when you're not being possessed by it in times of consciousness, talk about your last pain body attack and the drama that came out of it.

When was it? Oh yes, the day before yesterday. Where did it start?

How did it start? What triggered it? What did you first feel?

What did I first feel? And then what? And then we started shouting at each other, and then we were totally in it.

Isn't that interesting? And three hours later we finally came out of it. Three days later, who knows?

And so you can sometimes, I very rarely say think about the past, but in this instance, it occasionally can be helpful just to briefly relive a past pain body episode, and as you relive it, bring presence into it and watch what happened. If you watch what happened, it'll be easier to watch what happens when it happens again. Then you can watch it then, as you watched it.

It's a little bit easier, much easier in fact, to watch a past pain body attack, because you have a distance, it's only a memory, but even then it can happen as you start to remember it, it's happening again. So if you bring your attention back with your partner and say let's look at the last pain body drama that we went through, and if you're not alert, it can happen that reliving it can activate it again, and before long you're shouting at each other again, no it didn't start in me, it started in you. You were the first to say, no it didn't.

And then perhaps in the middle of that you suddenly wake up. When you wake up, it's the most beautiful thing that could happen, is to wake up in the middle of a pain body attack and suddenly laugh or smile. That's the beginning of liberation, then it's really happening.

And there are couples now who are, to whom this is happening. If you don't yet wake up in the middle of it, you wake up just afterwards, oh there it was again. If your partner doesn't want to hear about pain body, then what can you do?

If you say let's talk about pain body and he says, I don't want to hear about pain body.

You do your own thing, I do my thing. And so all you can do is stay present when his or her pain body comes up.

And it wants you to be unhappy too, that's what pain bodies do. And it will do everything it can to make you unhappy and finally get a reaction. So you have to be really present and then if one partner stays conscious, it cannot not affect the other.

Or in frustration, the other is going to leave you. The frustration is that the pain body is not being fed enough living with you. And so the pain body says, okay, I'm going to look for somewhere else for pain because this is not feeding me.

It also happens that people feel strongly attracted to each other because their pain bodies are mutually compatible. And sometimes this is the basis of certain relationships. It's unconscious, of course.

So they are acting out what they have to act out and it works perfectly. And that strong, compelling pull towards another person that is sometimes called falling in love, that enormous pull towards another person is sometimes, or has a strong element quite often, also of a pain body that recognises a compatible pain body. And pain body can get mixed up with sexuality also, of only feeling sexually excited with somebody who is going to cause you some pain.

It doesn't have to be physical necessarily, but some kind of drama involved, that pain in the drama that can give you a stimulus. And again, if that's the case, just watching it is helpful, it's enough. If that is, and this happens more often than humans realise, and some humans are condemned to repeating the same cycle unconsciously.

They say, this time I want a husband who is kind and helpful and gentle and compassionate, not that jerk that I had last time. And then you think you find the one and you start living together and suddenly the same jerk comes out again. And you thought he was gentle and compassionate, but you got attracted to his pain body.

And it comes out, and suddenly, the same thing again. That was the attraction. That is described, there was some years ago, there was a very popular book, it didn't mention pain body as such, but it mentioned from the perspective of women, women who love too much, was the title, how unconsciously, through being forced to act out certain conditioned patterns, continuously choose the wrong man.

It happens to men also of course. So this is very interesting to watch in oneself, in one's relationship. Pain bodies with children, children have pain bodies also.

Children also suffer from pain body attacks. Most children do. If you are a parent, you will then recognise when a child is suddenly totally taken over by his or her pain body.

Whatever the child does, withdraws completely, has a screaming fit, throws him or herself on the floor, throws things, is transformed in one moment from an angel into a monster. And many parents have witnessed that in their children, say, what is going on here? They don't realise it happens to them also.

Maybe a little bit more disguised, it's the human pain body in the child. And so a parent can simply point out to the child afterwards, not in the middle, except later on, but at first not in the middle of it, afterwards, what was that? What did it feel like?

Wasn't that strange? When did you first feel it? Does it have a name?

Temporary name or only temporary? Oh, it's called the green monster. Okay.

And so occasionally it comes and gets hold of you. Yeah. Okay.

Two days later, the pain body, you can watch, oh, is the green monster coming? There it is. And then of course the pain body will already be in the child and the pain body will always deny itself and it will say, no, I'm not the green monster.

Your partner will do the same. If you say to your partner, is that your pain body? He or she will throw something at you and deny it.

The pain body will never admit that it's the pain body. Oh yes, I am the pain body. So this is the work of, you help children.

If they teach at school that pain bodies happen, that people have pain bodies and that you can actually watch it, that would be an enormous thing to tell, even a five-year-old will understand it because it's so simple, it's so obvious. There it is. And then presence can arise.

That's it. So the pain body seems an obstacle, but it's the greatest incentive for becoming free. And it's almost as if the energy that is contained in there then becomes the fuel for consciousness, becomes the fuel for presence, becomes transmuted and is transmuted into presence.

And so it often is that people with very heavy pain bodies quickly go beyond, disidentify from. People with moderate pain bodies, they can live with themselves. They have found an arrangement of living with themselves.

Periodically, yes, they get unhappy, but it's okay, I can manage. But if you're very heavy, you get so fed up with yourself that you will want to be free. In Eastern terms, one could say pain body is karma because it's the accumulated, it's an aspect of karma, it's the accumulated past in you, the conditioned past in you, which you identify as yourself.

That is karma. To identify with a conditioned past in me as myself is acting out karma. And the acting out of karma is the renewing of karma.

Action, reaction, that's the meaning of karma. Action, reaction, it's the vicious circle. You're being forced to act out your conditioning.

And a large part of your conditioning is the human collective conditioning. So that's the action of karma. In karma you can't really get to the end of karma through time.

You can't really say, okay, if I wait long enough, finally I will come to the end of karma. No, because it renews itself. The end of karma is not through time, but through accessing the power of now.

Then you come to the end of action, reaction. So it's only in the now that karma dissolves, through accessing the power that is inherent here in this presence. Wonderful.

Many of you would not be here if it weren't for your pain bodies. Already you've created so much trouble and suffering for yourself that you had to wake up, just as I did. So you're waking up.

When we have these gatherings, time passes very quickly. It's strange. And so it's happened again.

It's only been one moment that's why it passed so quickly. There may be some questions in your minds, but the clock tells us that we need to stop now. What about these questions?

Is there any question that is truly critical, that you need to know the answer to? There can be no presence unless you know the answer to this question. And you cannot surrender to what is unless you know the answer.

No, there isn't. We don't need any questions.

Eckhart Tolle Talk Retreat Sowing Seeds of Consciousness in Pondicherry Chennai Rishikesh Mumbai INDIA

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 8:30:22)

To this gathering, I'm very happy to be here. This is the first talk in India, the place where it all started, the birthplace of spirituality, one could say, where thousands of years ago consciousness, for the first time, began to flower through the human form in a few isolated individuals here and there, early flowers. And those early flowers of human consciousness left behind maps or signposts pointing the way to the transformation of human consciousness.

And in time, in other places too, consciousness flowered here and there. And so signposts came into being, maps, signposts, in the form of scriptures, some of them very beautiful, to help us find the way back. Because even then, thousands of years ago, humanity was already lost.

And then over the centuries, there were many people who became interpreters of signposts. They studied the signposts, collected the signposts, compared the signposts, and some of them are very beautiful. And sometimes neglected, or even forgot, that every teaching, every spiritual teaching, points beyond itself.

It's never in the words. The words only point. But there was a tendency of getting attached to words, and deriving an enhanced sense of identity from attachment to certain words.

So I'm saying this because also tonight, words are spoken. One could say a new signpost, pointing to the same place. Not to get attached to the words, but always look beyond the words.

The words are not it. The essence of all spiritual teachings is very simple. They all point to the possibility of the transformation of human consciousness.

They also point out, before they speak of that, that there is a dysfunction in human consciousness. Lost. Humans are lost because of that dysfunction.

And they call that dysfunction by different names. Different teachings, different traditions, call that dysfunction by different names. It may be called delusion, or illusion.

It may be called suffering, which according to the Buddha is an intrinsic part of the human condition. It could be called sin in the Christian teachings. Original sin.

Again, it's been sometimes misinterpreted. They all point to the same thing. Something is not functional.

And of course if you look at human history, one place you can look to find out whether this is true, and you read human history, you will see how insane most of that is. Read 20th century history, and what humans have done to other humans. Untold suffering inflicted by humans on other humans.

So the worst century of all has been the 20th century in those terms. And we are carrying on now. So if you look at human history, then you have to come to the conclusion there's some very strong streak of insanity running through it.

Or another way to find out about it is to switch on television. And another way to find out about it is to observe your own mind. And there's nothing personal in that.

Your own mind is the human mind. And when you begin to become aware of the human mind, you realize, first of all, the simple fact that it rarely stops. There's a continuous stream of thinking.

And for most people, that is the reality that they inhabit. Their reality is thought-based. In other words, they are identified completely with that continuous stream of thinking.

And the emotion that go with that stream of thinking. And of course, the entire stream of thinking that never stops. The compulsion to think, which is in every human being.

One could almost say the addiction to thinking is in everyone. And it's considered normal. Nobody even questions it.

So humans are trapped in mental noise. And the emotions that accompany mental noise. What does it mean when we say they are trapped in?

It means they derive their sense of self from mind movements, from that continuous stream of thinking. Their sense of identity, their sense of self is completely in there, in the stream of thought. And that begins at a very early age.

To mistake the stream of thinking for who you are. So ultimately, bondage ultimately is bondage to thought. To be totally identified with thought movements.

And you don't know yourself beyond that. So your entire sense of self is derived from mind. And so, the first thing a child learns is his or her name.

This is the beginning of mistaking thought for who you are. And immediately, your sense of identity narrows tremendously the moment you learn your name. And then you repeat the name.

Then the name becomes the receptacle for further accumulations, things that the mind accumulates, content. And from then onwards, the mind is seeking to enhance its content, its accumulations in the form of experiences, knowledge, whatever it can add to its store of content. And out of that, a sense of identity grows.

A story-based me. Me and my story. And so, that me, thought-based me, based on past, lives in a state of dissatisfaction and unease.

It cannot be free of that for very long. Because that mind-based sense of identity, that mind-based sense of self, is by its very nature dissatisfied and uneasy. And you can test it in your own life, if you look at your sense of self, that it does not yet, except in those who have gone beyond mind identification, your sense of self does not feel complete.

There is a strange sense of not quite having made it yet. Not having reached all you could reach. Not having made it.

And you look around, and you might look at some other people and say, surely they made it, but I haven't made it yet. My sense of self is not yet complete. That sense of incompleteness is built into every mind-based sense of self.

People mistake it for their personal problem. The story of me, that limited sense of identity, my past, my experiences, is never satisfied at ease for long. Briefly, you may believe that now my sense of self has completed itself.

I finally arrived. A sense of elation comes over you. You found the ideal partner, or a very good job.

Something good has just happened. You have received a lot of money. Surely now I'm free.

Surely now I know who I am. And before long, that proves to be a little soap bubble. The wedding still is part of the delusion that now your sense of self is complete.

And most films that you watch, they end there. Because only if the director cuts there, can the delusion be upheld that on the level of story, you can reach some kind of completion or fulfillment. So there is an enormous urge in everyone to add more to the content of one's mind, to seek for further content to add in order to enhance me, my sense of self, through knowledge, through relationships, through experiences, through accumulation of wealth, status, other people's opinions, also as content that you can add to yourself.

And so this entity, the mind-based me, the egoic entity, is continuously looking out for more. Because there is this deep-seated feeling of not enough. It's not enough.

I'm not yet myself. And there is the belief, unconscious, semi-conscious, that I can become fully myself by adding more to me, to myself, in whatever form. So that compulsion for more can even be operating as you sit here.

Because you want to, the human mind wants to say, what is it that I can take home from here? What new facts, or new beliefs, it loves beliefs, can add some new belief and can identify with that. And that for a little while enhances my sense of self.

The conversion phenomenon. They're all extremely enthusiastic once they convert to something. And then after a year or two that wears off, and then they need more.

That wasn't it either. So even here the need for more could be operating. What is it that he can give me, that I can take home?

In some, there you can go to seminars where people even give you folders. You can take them home with you. All the information that you can have accumulated during the seminar.

Oh, it feels good for a while. Now I have all the answers here. And then you realize after a while, oh that wasn't, that wasn't all the answers.

So to observe that compulsion for more, which is there because of the state of dissatisfaction or non-completion that is inherent in the mind-identified human condition. And that means of course, because the story of me is not all that satisfying, except for brief delusory moments, the story of me is not all that satisfying. It hasn't quite worked the way it was supposed to.

And people don't realize that that non-satisfaction of a story-based identity is built into the structure of the human mind and has nothing to do with their particular story. It is not in the nature of that sense of identity to be able to give you fulfillment or completion. So people believe there must be something not right because I haven't arrived.

You cannot complete yourself, find yourself, be yourself on the level of story or through adding more to the story of me. And that's an enormous pull in human beings for more expresses itself as the psychological need, very deep seated for future, the psychological need for the next moment. And that is deeply embedded in the human mind that pull towards future.

Because it's only through future that you can, the future the mind believes can give you the more. Future can complete you. Through future you can finally be fully yourself.

All you need is, says the mind, the mind based me, all you need is just a little bit more future. And surely then I can make it finally. And then a little bit more.

And so there comes the trying to make your life work and there's nothing wrong with obviously adding things to you. It's part of phenomenal existence that there are experiences, you go and explore the world, you learn a new skill, a new language and whatever it is, all these things you can add to you. But through that finding yourself never works.

Through that arriving at that sense of deep rootedness, saying I'm home, I have arrived home. That continuous deep peace that comes with that ultimately, that sense of intense aliveness that Jesus described as abundant life or the fullness of life. That's what he pointed to.

And that on the level of story cannot be obtained through more of this or more of that. In other words, it cannot be obtained through future. And this is particularly interesting when we come to spiritual seekers.

Spiritual seekers are those who have seen the fallacy and the futility of finding themselves through wealth, through status, through worldly achievement, through relationships. Perhaps they have tried it and seen that the dissatisfaction that is there, if you are looking for yourself through that, if you're looking for a more complete sense of self through that, but the spiritual seeker then shifts the search for self. But not enough.

The spiritual seeker is still seeking to add something to him or herself through more future. The spiritual seeker implies that he or she is seeking in future, through future. And after 10, 20, 30 years of being a spiritual seeker, you're still a seeker.

And you might be say, okay, that's okay. A few more lifetimes of seeking perhaps. So condemned to a continuous state of non-fulfillment, living in and through a false sense of self, a story-based sense of self that not only has built into it the element of dissatisfaction and unease, more than that, the story-based sense of self seeks out conflict and problems to enhance itself, to create a stronger sense of self through having enemies somewhere.

And that is unconscious. It is an unconscious movement. The need for enemies in the form of people, situations, places, the need for conflict is an intrinsic part of the mind-based, thought-based sense of self.

Because it strengthens its selfhood through opposition, through fighting, through being against something, having an enemy. Hence, an enormously powerful need for humans to be right, even in simple things like an argument in your relationship. The need for the other person to be wrong, to identify again with mind, with a mental position.

You adopt a perspective or a position and your sense of self flows into what is no more than a thought movement. But your sense of self moves into that thought and thought becomes self. And so somebody disagrees with you or challenges your position, your mental position, and it is regarded unconsciously as an attack on your very self-identity, on me.

And so there's an enormous emotional defense mechanism, an attack mechanism that comes into play because you now need that other person to be wrong. And if you can, the other person can be wrong for a moment, your sense of self, which is always shaky, the mind-based, becomes strengthened. And so you've won an argument or you have shouted and then you've you ran out of the room so that the counter argument cannot reach you anymore.

And so you have triumphed. The self for a moment has triumphed. The need to be right collectively you see as warfare between nations.

Collectively they identify with a position, a mental, a rigid identity. The self, because the self is not only personal selfhood, a strong part of the self, can be collective, me or us, nation, tribe, religion. So part of that sense of mind-based, mental position-based sense of self, sometimes a very large part, sometimes a smaller part, is collective, a collective us against them.

And any collective us that then gives, is part of every individual sense of identity, nationalism, religion, whatever it may be, that you can see how they need their enemies and that is enormously satisfying to their sense, their false sense of self. It strengthens temporarily the delusion of me or us. And so nation may go at war, go to war, and it's very, people sometimes are elated in that.

And the stronger the mind identification, the greater the need for enemies because then you draw a line. This is me, there's a strengthened and enhanced sense of separateness. And that is the illusion of being that separate entity, me, and that your enemy is absolutely needed to, so that your sense of self can perpetuate itself.

So you can see examples in last century, Germany went to war with almost the entire world. So it's just one example of delusion and needing more and more enemies and their sense of collective sense of self became enormously enhanced. Every human being felt more themselves for a few years.

Suicides almost disappeared completely at that time. It was a strengthening of the illusion and for a while it always works and then it collapses because it always reveals itself as an illusion in the end. So the mind-based sense of self has a strong need for enemies, not only the collective mind-based sense of self, also the personal mind-based sense of self, the need in relationships for drama, the need for problems.

We all know people who love to talk about their problems, some more than others, but the tendency is in everyone. Please listen to my problems, they are important and if you listen you will confirm to me that yes, I have important problems, so I am important. It's unconscious of course.

The more important my problems, the more important I feel and I can think about it day and night in that continuous stream of thinking that never stops with its heaviness, me and my problems. How am I ever going to solve them? And you don't want to solve them.

That would be the end of the false sense of self. It strives on problems. It loves it.

You can see it collectively how the speakers on, the news readers on TV, they strive on problems collectively. It's very rare that they talk about something that is not problematic as news. Every news is problematic.

So here we have on a personal level the need for enemies expresses itself most strongly in making the one thing that could free you, the one thing that potentially is liberating, of making that also into an enemy in the egoic delusion. What is that one thing that is potentially liberating, the one that is the only real thing in your whole life? It's the present moment and the mind-based sense of self denies it continuously, runs away with it continuously, resists it continuously, argues with it continuously.

The now, which is life itself, all there is ever in your life, now, and this little entity is fighting against it or trying to get away from it to some future moment where I'm going to complete myself. I'm looking for the fullness of life there and I'm going to get there. And then you miss here and you miss now and you miss the fullness of life that is already here by paying no attention to it whatsoever.

Your attention is there, always looking there. And even many spiritual seekers do that. They are seeking to achieve a future state, a state, a projected state of whatever it is called, liberation, enlightenment, seeking to arrive at a mental projection of you as more complete, more perfect than now.

Note the word more, an essential part. And so they are moving, and every spiritual practice, there are beautiful spiritual practices, there are beautiful meditations. The good ones are so simple.

The powerful meditation practices are designed to take you into now totally. The only problem with them is not so much the meditation technique, although some techniques give you too much time to become good at it, but the meditator is, the practitioner is the problem, because the practitioner, no matter how beautiful the spiritual practice may be, is trying to get somewhere and become more through it, even become good at it. So not yet good enough.

The person who is trying to enhance his or her sense of self through relationships, money, or status also feeds the same, not yet enough. I'm not yet myself. And the one, the essence of all teachings is that you are already yourself fully and completely now.

Now, how do you know this to be true? How can you know this to be true? Not mentally, not by believing.

I believe that I'm already fully myself. Well, that's a comforting belief, but it doesn't free you. It's one more belief, which for a little while feels good, because you've added something.

I believe in now. Okay, comforting, but are you there? So how do we, if all the ancient teachings and teachers, and more recent teachings and teachers, and now of course the teaching is accelerating because humanity is coming to a point of where its survival is at stake, the madness on the planet, the dysfunction of the human mind has become magnified through the means of science and technology more and more.

And so for the first time, very recently, humanity was able to completely destroy itself and the planet, and that possibility is still there very strongly. In fact, if no change happens in human consciousness this century, it will be the last. The planet cannot endure another hundred years of madness, the same as the 20th, but worse, which inevitably it would be.

Worse not only collectively, worse for every individual as more misery, more anger, confusion, madness, in every individual, as many children these days live out already totally disconnected, totally identified with thinking, looking just for the next stimulus. So this, the beauty of being alive now is that you're living in a time of crisis on the planet, and for the first time those rare flowers, and what they showed us, the early teachers, the early masters, for the first time, because there's no longer a choice, this transformation of consciousness is now open for great numbers of people for the first time, whereas before, very rare flowers appeared here and there.

The species needs to evolve to that new state of consciousness or it will die, and this is why it's happening. So the question arises, how? How, if that's, yes, the transformed state of consciousness in which I no longer inflict suffering on myself and other human beings, in which I no longer inhabit a world of problems and conflict, in which I emanate love, compassion, and aliveness, and in which I move as a blessing on this planet rather than as a curse on this planet, this new state of consciousness, yes, I want it.

How do I get there? The mind says, because you're obviously not there, so how do you get there? So the mind is asking, it wants to know, tell me how to get from here to there.

It still believes that that state of consciousness is there. The amazing thing is, underneath the mental noise, that state of consciousness is already there. A vast pool of stillness, of unconditioned consciousness, the mind is the conditioned, is already there, just waiting to emerge.

So how? The question arises, okay, if I cannot get there in the future, then what does that mean? It means to use the portal of the present moment.

And walk through that. How? It's quite simply, you realize that there is nothing else but now, ever.

Your life is always now. You also realize that until this moment you have lived in a way that denied the now, running away from now, always looking to the next moment. It's going more important than this.

The now was a means to an end, that's the normal human state of consciousness. And you realize that, and then a little shift happens, and that shift can only happen now, and that shift is, internally, you're no longer arguing with now. You surrender your arguments with the present moment, a complete alignment with the is-ness, or the suchness, as the Buddha used that expression, of now.

No inner resistance to now, but a welcoming of now, because you realize that now is life itself, and therefore you welcome life itself. And it is now. That is aligning yourself with life.

When you are not aligned with now internally, you are out of alignment with life, and that is the dysfunction. That keeps the egoic self going continuously. The conditioning of the human mind has been building up for thousands and thousands of years, the egoic entity, but the amazing thing is you don't need thousands of years for it to dissolve.

It is no longer operating when your attention moves into the present moment. And what that means, we're exploring that right now, what that means, your attention moves into the present moment, and then you find a very simple fact, which explains why people believe that their life, or even one day, consists of many moments, which is not the case. They believe that because there's a continuous fluctuation of the form that this moment takes, the form that this moment takes changes continuously.

This is because, this is why people believe that there are many moments, because they mistake the form that this moment takes for the depths of this moment of now. And all they relate to and identify with is the form that the now takes. This is what they react against.

So this is very, so, and more often than not, the form that this moment takes in your field of consciousness, it appears as a situation, it appears as a place, it appears as a person. That's the form this moment takes. Very often, the form that this moment takes is some form of limitation on your life.

And that's why people don't like the now. Because every time something, a new form arises in the now, it seems to be more often than not, just another limitation. And so there is this deep longing, and this is the self, the seeking for who you are beyond the limited.

Knowing yourself as the unlimited. And it seems that the present moment is your heart's enemy, because all it gives you, or most of the time, is some more limitation through the person that you don't want to be having to confront, a situation you don't want to have to confront, but it's here. And even if suddenly your life becomes changed dramatically through winning 10 million dollars in the lottery, of course there's the delusion for a moment that now the unlimited has arrived.

And then there's other limitations would come very quickly, perhaps even created by your wealth. You would very quickly find new limitations entering now. So this is why, since there is this deep-seated search to know yourself as unlimited, this is why it seems so nonsensical, especially to the egoic me, it seems nonsensical to accept the present moment.

It's this, are you telling me that I should accept that limitation on my life and then be stuck with it forever? This doesn't make sense. And so people live in that continuous denial, trying to get to a future point where you've added enough to be free and unlimited.

And so the circle continues. Now, the only way to break the circle is to say yes internally to the form that this moment takes. And yes, it will probably be more often than not some form of limitation seemingly.

But you cannot go beyond limitation by running away from limitation or denying it or mentally projecting yourself to a moment where you're free. And an amazing miracle happens when internally you say yes totally to the form that this moment takes. Even if it is a limitation or appears to be a limitation on you, internally it is not resisted.

In other words, you allow this moment to be as it is completely. This does not mean that now you are passive, you're condemned to sitting for the rest of your life like the Buddha and not move anymore. The Buddha was moving continuously.

We know only because of this Buddha Rupa, we think that he sat all the time. He traveled and he talked and he taught. You're not condemned to inactivity.

It doesn't mean you cannot change a situation. It doesn't mean you cannot take action. It simply means the basis for action is the state of acceptance and surrender and yes to now.

The basis for action is not denial of life, a little egoic entity trying to strengthen itself which becomes a motivating factor for action or to protect itself. The two motivating factors for action in the egoic state are desire, the need for more, or fear, protect myself because I might lose the little that I have. So these two motivate people and in normal existence there are no other motivating factors except desire and fear.

They motivate what people do and say and speak and think. All the compulsive thought movements, if you look into them, governed by desire and fear. And this is the trap and this is, humans are trapped in that and that's their little me and they don't know the essence of their being as unlimited.

They don't know who they are beyond the little person with its little past and little future and then gone. So we move into the state of total, unconditional, even I would say radical acceptance of now. No argument with it internally because it is futile to argue with is.

It is. What is, is. How can you, it is already.

It's, what argument could there be? This moment is as it is. And so you recognize that is, is already.

So you welcome that is-ness completely. And this is, looks bad to the little me because what you welcome in many cases is actually welcoming some form of limitation. So how does that free you if you welcome the now and it is a limitation on your life?

It limits you. So what, what, what happens when you completely allow this moment to be as it is, completely aligned with it? And there's a limitation.

Maybe even an extreme limitation. Maybe even a prison cell around you. Maybe even the body no longer able to move very much.

Extreme forms of limitation perhaps. And there is an uncompromising, for many of you it'll be little meditations and occasionally big ones, whatever the now, whatever form the now takes. An uncompromising and radical yes.

Aligned. Now, what I say now one cannot really speak of. I'm simply using words to point internally you will sense what the words point to.

When you completely accept this moment because that's all there is, it's life itself, there is suddenly a sense of space or spaciousness around whatever happens in the now. Even around the limitation, an inner sense of space. And there's the form of this moment.

Something is just broken down. You've just lost something. Somebody has just left you.

There it's gone. And there's a yes. The allowing brings about a recognition of a vast spaciousness around whatever happens in the now.

And that is the depth of now. And what is that? It is the unconditioned itself, formless, unconditioned consciousness.

And it is the arising of stillness that comes with acceptance of what is. The compulsion to think perpetuates, the compulsion to think perpetuates the conditions that are being resisted through that compulsive thinking. So this is an amazing shift that can only happen now from being out of alignment to suddenly being empowered by life.

The one consciousness, the one intelligence can suddenly move through you, can suddenly express itself fully through you. It's not being blocked anymore. You're aligned with the power of life or consciousness itself.

And that becomes the power that acts and speaks through you. That is the flowering of human consciousness. When the conditioned gives way to the unconditioned.

Not that it totally disappears. You still exist as this form for a little while. But you know yourself as the formless one life through surrender to now, through that primordial spiritual practice that has no future in it.

The primordial spiritual practice with absolutely no future, it's alignment with now. The master, there's only one difference between the master, the spiritual master and you. The spiritual master has absolutely no argument with now.

Whatever happens is met in total yes. And that is the power of the master. Through that he or she is a master.

Not through more knowledge. The great masters had less knowledge than almost anybody of you. They didn't need accumulated knowledge.

You can have it or not have it. It's not vital. It's part of the phenomenal world that you play with.

So this is the primordial practice of surrender to what is. And their vast spaciousness opens up through that. And that field of spaciousness is the now.

Beyond that which happens in it, it's the depth of now. And what is that? What does that mean?

It's the unconditioned consciousness itself. The essence of all life. The essence of you.

The essence of all life. Knowing yourself as that is the flowering and from then on no suffering is created within you. No suffering is created for other human beings through you.

You simply emanate compassion, love, aliveness. The personal has given way to that which is beyond the person. And you still operate on the personal when needed.

Your name is still perhaps in the phone book. Not disappeared for a little while. Your name is in the phone book and one day your name disappears from the phone book.

Oh, he's gone. Quickly. And so this is vital for humans to enter that state of consciousness now.

It wants to emerge. If it didn't want to emerge, that state, there would be nothing we could do. Sometimes people ask, is there anything we can do?

Yes and no. To totally say yes to now, one could say it's almost a non-doing. Everything else is doing.

And now you need to be aware of one thing and that is the planet having suffered from human unconsciousness, having suffered from dysfunction of the collective human mind for thousands of years. There's an accumulation on the planet of one could almost say pain or heavy negativity, an energy field of that, that humans have created over thousands of years. A field of pain in the collective of the planet.

That is often something that will emerge inside you as what I call the human pain body. That is past pain that lives in you from your personal life, childhood, from parents, what they did or didn't do. Humans carry inside their share of human pain, emotional pain, which is no more than contracted life energy through egoic delusion.

So this is something that you need to recognize because otherwise that can obscure your practice of uncompromising yes to what is and will many times obscure the arising consciousness if you cannot recognize it. The pain body that humans carry as their share of human pain, residues left of pain that you have suffered and pain that the whole of humanity has suffered, that I call that field of pain the pain body that lives in humans. And it may be certain pain bodies are predominantly angry.

They have the vibration of anger. Other pain bodies have the vibration of great fear. Other pain bodies have the vibration of heaviness, sadness, depression.

That is whatever the predominant vibration of the pain body is in your case, it is human pain. That you will have to face periodically because the human pain body has two stages, dormant and active. When it's dormant, you might feel not so bad.

There's still the egoic searching for future and being uneasy in the present moment and looking for the next moment and it's never quite enough. That's still there but you can live with that. But then the pain body becomes active.

Periodically it needs to become active because it needs to take in more food. It needs more pain. It needs the experience of further pain and you can see it in your life very often when a little trigger in the form of a thought, somebody saying something or a little thing going wrong brings up suddenly an enormous amount of emotional pain.

And that emotional pain or anger, heaviness, it moves into the mind and without knowing it, it controls your thinking. And your thinking then reflects the energy of the pain body. Angry thoughts, depressed thoughts, fearful thoughts, every thought feeds the pain body because thought is an energy form.

The pain body loves it. It loves to run your mind. So when people, when your pain body is active and it may last for a few hours, it may last for a few days, the active period, the incessant mental noise that people are trapped in, that is bad enough even when the pain body is not amplifying it, the incessant mental noise that humans are trapped in becomes of unbearable heaviness or unbearable fear.

And it's hard, almost can't live with that anymore. And that moves, it moves into the mind and it feeds on your thinking. It loves it.

In other words, you are identified with the pain body and then it will feed on other people. The pain body, when it possesses you, will try other people to give you pain. You will then provoke some drama in your relationship so that you can get the feedback of pain from your wife or husband.

Or somebody in the family or somebody close to you. It wants, one could call the pain body the addiction to pain in human beings. And so when that is operating, you don't know what you are doing.

You're simply at the mercy of an unconscious movement of needing to express human pain. The pain flows into the mind and amplifies the story of me, which then becomes very unhappy, extremely unhappy, a very unhappy story, a very unhappy self. It makes the sense of self very heavy.

But in egoic delusion, even that the ego likes, because the painful ego is a very strong ego, and it's looking for somebody else to make unhappy. It wants to make someone unhappy and usually succeeds. And so once it has taken on enough food from somebody close to you as feedback of emotional pain or your mind, it subsides and you feel a little bit better.

And then a few days later, a couple of weeks later, it comes up again. And so here the uncompromising yes will very often apply not so much to what arises externally in your life in this now, but also what arises internally in this now. And sometimes what arises internally will be a pain movement.

And a certain degree of alertness is needed so that the deeply conditioned, very old pain movement does not overpower you and use your thoughts again. And you become it. And you're forced to act it out until it leaves you for a little while.

It's still there, but it goes, becomes dormant to digest its food, so to speak. So alertness is needed so that you can watch the arising of the pain body as it happens directly. So it cannot use your mind, feed on your thinking.

You watch it and what do you do with it? It is. You allow it to be.

You allow the form that this moment takes to be. And you may not succeed each time with the pain body because it can come so quickly that only afterwards you suddenly wake up. It's, oh, that was the pain body.

But as presence arises in you, which is that unconditioned consciousness, it will be easier to stay present when the movement of pain seeks to overpower you and control you. And so you bring that alert presence to it that comes with unconditionally accepting what is and knowing yourself, not looking for yourself in anything that arises in this now.

You are not the pain body.

It is human pain. It seeks to become a self, to strengthen the illusion of self, a me. When you observe it, the pain body is not a self anymore.

It's simply human pain. It's not using your mind and becomes the illusion of self. So that is the transition to the new state of consciousness that is happening now.

The vital thing here is that alert presence that comes with a yes. Yes. Alert presence and acceptance and presence are one.

That is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness. And you realize you are not that which arises in this now. That's the form it takes.

You don't seek yourself in that form anymore. You allow it. It's fine because you live in the world of form.

Of course there needs to be some form in the now, but there's no self-seeking through allowing the form. And you know yourself to be not that which happens, but the space in which it happens. The stillness in which it happens.

The field of now in which everything happens. You know yourself as that and that is the end of self-seeking in future or in some form that you could add. You can suddenly see the delusion of self-seeking through adding some form to me.

This is so simple that essential teaching, allowing this moment to be is a very gentle thing, but it's also a very radical thing to do. And from now on, as you go away from here, at any given time, often you will realize whether you are in a state of no internally or whether you are in a state of yes internally. And you recognize more and more when the no is still there.

It has a momentum. It's another no in whatever form. And so if you catch yourself in another no to what is, what can you do?

You allow it. You bring the yes into the no, no matter what happens. Bring yes into it.

Always the yes. That is the most empowered human state it is. And every sage that ever lived, every spiritual teacher, every spiritual master lived in that state that we could call the surrendered state of consciousness.

Not a state of weakness, but a state of great power. Not only to the little egoic entity, the surrendered state of consciousness sounds like weakness. The surrendered state of consciousness totally.

And then you emanate love, peace, compassion, aliveness, and enormous creativity comes through you. It will express itself in some form. No more suffering is created out of that state.

In the surrendered state, nothing that you do in this now is a means to some end that is regarded as more important. Nothing, the now is never reduced anymore to a means to an end, which is part of the normal mad state, where the now is always a means to an end. The now is honored totally.

It is not reduced to a means to an end. That is the surrendered state. That means whatever you do in the now has a beauty and an aliveness to it, because it is honored so completely.

I'm not, you've read certain ancient scriptures, they speak of that also. It is the end of karma. Surrendered action is the end of karma.

Non-surrendered action keeps you trapped in karma. That's very simple. Surrender is the end of that.

Now, I've had enough pain. Years, a million years of pain, isn't that enough? When, how much time?

Okay, I think I'm going to surrender. I need another 20 years and maybe 10 lifetimes. So much suffering on the planet, so much suffering in your individual life.

When, if not now, now enter the surrendered state of consciousness. And there, nothing to do with resignation is misunderstood. Oh, well, I can't do anything anyway, so I might as well accept here where I am stuck here.

No, that's not it. It's, yes, I welcome this. I welcome it totally.

And enormous power is released for action also, if needed. Not the useless action that the ego gets involved in. If action is required, action arises.

Unpremeditated, it simply happens. Presence through the yes. The arising of presence.

The new state of consciousness. The surrendered state of consciousness. I'm saying new because for the first time, there is the possibility for many, many people simultaneously on this planet to enter that state.

Nothing else can save the planet. And so, enough pain, enough suffering. If you're really fed up with suffering, then you say, all right, from now on I will create no more suffering by entering a state of non-surrender.

The only root of, the only cause for suffering is the state of non-surrender. I will create no more suffering for myself and others. It goes together.

Now the pain body may still occasionally come. That's only pain, not suffering. It's human pain.

Suffering requires a mind-based entity that identifies with the pain as me and has a story around it and a sense of self around it. That's suffering. Without that false sense of self, there's no suffering.

A movement of pain is still possible. It's not that bad, just pain. Let it be there.

And all the pain does, it erodes delusion as you allow it to be, burns it up, and then the pain is gone too, through surrender. Miracles of transformation happen, even healing through surrender. That is the message.

And in the past, it has been given a few times in different forms. This is a different form of the message and a signpost. There's an enormous acceleration now of the emerging energy of presence.

No more time. No more time. Enter that state now.

And that's the end of the need, the need for psychological future, to arrive somewhere and be someone. And then you play with the world of form and it's beautiful. The strange thing is, when the world of form is no longer controlling you, there's no self-seeking in it anymore, it improves in a strange way.

When you don't need it to improve anymore for your sense of self, it suddenly improves. And before you desperately needed this to happen and that to happen, and you needed to add this, and when that self-seeking isn't there anymore, suddenly the entire universe, the way in which you relate to it and you experience reality, the world, becomes benign, benevolent. There's suddenly a benevolence in the world.

As you interact with the world and people, the universe is suddenly showing a friendly face. Not that limitations will entirely disappear as long as you're here as form. Some limitations will be there, but they are not important anymore.

You don't need to run away from them. Each time a limitation comes, you walk right through it, through surrender. Beautifully expressed in the image of Jesus on the cross.

The ultimate symbol for limitation, to be tied to a cross, can't even move anymore. Nothing, totally limited, and at that moment, total surrender happened. Not my will, but thy will be done, the will of the totality, the one.

And then the cross became transformed in its nature because it has a dual symbolism. One is, it's the torture instrument or the symbol of limitation, and the other side of the dual symbolism of the cross, it symbolizes transcendence, and it symbolizes the divine. And the two are one.

Limitation and knowing yourself as unlimited are one. And it's only by non-surrender internally to the limitation that you recognize the oneness of how the unlimited is concealed, is hidden within the limited, and very often is hidden in the worst form of limitation. Something that you would say, no human could live with that dreadful affliction.

And some of those humans suddenly, without any spiritual teaching, or ever opened a book perhaps on any spiritual, suddenly within that most unacceptable, seemingly unacceptable limitation, they surrendered. And it opened up, and they entered the state of deep peace and aliveness, and freedom from the form, knowing yourself as the vastness, spaciousness that is there. So it's, remember that any limitation is a cross, and walk through it, not away from it.

And it's the opening, through welcoming whatever is, welcoming. The greatest power is released then. That's the message.

It's too simple to make philosophy out of that. It's very practical. It requires no belief.

You can keep beliefs, there must be a few things still kept in your mind, so you keep whatever is there, it's fine. Knowledge, beliefs, I believe this. No, I disagree with you.

Okay, that's fine. No longer a self in it. Now let's honor this moment, the only one there ever is.

When you go away from here, it's still now, now, now. Only the form changes. Are you friendly with it?

Or in disagreement? Friendly. That's, and this is how the planet and the world will become transformed, not because you need the world to be transformed to be yourself.

So as you've been sitting here, something has been dying inside you, the illusion, the person, the heaviness of that. And what or who is walking out of this room, simply a field of conscious presence. Perceptions happen, they're not resisted.

A field of conscious presence, a field of stillness, even if noise, there's a lot of noise out there, suddenly you walk out and you're bombarded by noise, and you continue to walk as a field of presence. Watching. And so, seeds of the transformed consciousness walking out of here.

Any spiritual practice, nothing needs to be abandoned. Let it take you more deeply into this. It's the journey without distance.

The journey without time into the timeless state of consciousness, the surrendered state. That's the journey you're on, the vertical dimension. The horizontal will look after itself.

And may you be blessed on this journey into yourself, into the now. Thank you. Please have a look inside to see if you are in a state of waiting or presence.

Waiting for the first words to be spoken or whatever the next moment brings. Or being here so completely that that inner compulsive movement away from this comes to an end. And if you can detect within yourself that compulsive movement to the next moment, the reaching out, to grasp something in the next moment, to complete me, to enhance me, to add to me a thought, an experience, a new belief, an experience, whatever it may be, the compulsive movement to add something to me.

And that is the state of waiting for the next moment. And that is associated intrinsically with thought. The movement of thought that moves away from this and reaches out into a projected future moment to grasp something there.

And so there's identification with thought. Identification with thought. That is the normal human state of consciousness.

To be trapped in a continuous stream of thinking that moves forward, that pulls you out of now. The only place that has any reality, the only place where life can be, the only place where anything can be is now. The space of now.

So much so that being and now must be synonymous because there can be no life unless it is now. But humans, and this is almost the mind says, okay, what else are you going to tell me? I knew that already.

That's not a big thing. I've read it in many books. What I'm looking for is some new ideas, some new thoughts to add to me.

I didn't come here to hear that there's only now. And of course, many teachings pointed to that, not perhaps in such an immediate and direct way. Jesus talked about the importance of living in the present.

Buddhist, probably the most important Buddhist practices, meditative practices are to bring you totally into this moment with your attention, totally full state of presence. Observe your breathing. You have to be totally present, not look to the next breath.

But I'm not introducing some new meditation technique either. In fact, there's nothing much here on the level of thought that you can take home with you, that you can add to you. That's not what it is about.

So on the level of thought, that compulsive movement that seeks to add to me, it is frustrating to be sitting here for an hour and a half, maybe, and not being given food for thought. And the words that are being spoken perhaps say, well, yes, that's the Buddha said that, and Jesus said that. What's then?

Give me something new. This is not what our gathering is about, to add something to your store of knowledge, ideas, beliefs, or to create some experience. So it doesn't work sitting here, does not work on the level of content.

This gathering is not about adding content to you, to your mind. It adds nothing. So it's not about improving thought, refining thought.

It is about becoming acquainted, experiencing, and that's everybody's limited, it's not experience, knowing for yourself a state of consciousness that is beyond thought, a state of consciousness of great aliveness and alertness. And you are suddenly free of the compulsive stream of thinking, but you're awake, you're alert, you're present, and in that state, you are very intelligent. Intelligent, not the narrow view of intelligence that the mind has, the ability to solve IQ tests, a very narrow view of the ability to store up information and regurgitate it in exams, a very limited view of intelligence, tiny bit, but true intelligence is vaster than that.

And why is it that you become intelligent, truly, as you enter that state of, and it's very, I don't want to frighten you, but I have to say it, the state that is free of thought. Not that you lose your ability to think when needed, you are no longer trapped in the movement of thought. What does that mean, trapped in the movement of thought?

It means to derive your sense of self, of me, from that continuous mental noise that consists of monologues, dialogues, and stories that you tell yourself and others, rehearsing something for the next moment. Continuous, enormous amount of noise that most people are completely trapped in, identified with as a me. And the me is never full enough, never complete enough.

That self, that me, has not reached its perfection, its point of fullness, has not arrived home. I'm not myself yet, all I need is add a bit more. On all levels, people, whether it's on the level of ideas, beliefs, material possessions, status, experiences, relationships, identification with even some spiritual practice, anything I can add to that to feel I'm now growing.

It's a looking for an enhanced version of me by adding further content to the mental accumulations. That's how, this is the normal way to live. So everybody is looking for an enhanced version of themselves, an improved, a fuller, bigger me, through material possessions, and then perhaps you go beyond that, then through interesting experiences, and then perhaps you move beyond that, and then through spiritual identification with this or that spiritual belief.

And that's quite comforting for a while too, but never satisfies for that long, or there always comes a moment of dissatisfaction, usually very quickly, where the me again feels that sense of lack and incompleteness. That wasn't quite it either. Well, I've added a bit to me, but that wasn't it either.

It's never quite it, that experience, that relationship, that marriage, that possession, that status symbol, spiritual or material. I'm still looking for myself. Of course, the good thing is I have future, and I can reach out there because that surely contains my salvation.

It's out there somewhere because I need the future to add more to me. So that's how the future comes in, and the most dreadful thing that anybody could tell you that would scare you to death, and you have no more future. And it happens to some people.

They are told that, whether it's true or not, who knows? Miracles happen also. They are told there's no more future.

That's an enormous, potentially an enormous thing has just opened up for you if you were told that you have no more future. But most of you are not that lucky. You still believe that through enough future, you can complete the me, and being fully, completely rooted to be totally yourself, that sense of having arrived, having being home.

So that's the striving, the compulsion to strive to add to me, normal human state of consciousness. The whole civilization, even Eastern civilization, Western, of course, is reaching out for more. And many are reaching out with an enormous, an enormous emotional pull for more, as if possessed.

If you go to big cities, New York, London, how they were running to get somewhere. Every day they are running to get somewhere. Then they get to the office, and they are under great stress to get this done and that.

And why? If you stop them, if you could stop them, you can't, because they'll say, don't stop me now. Not, I can't talk to you now.

But if you stop them, they would all, if you go to get to the bottom of it, they are running towards the future. All of them, no matter what form that future takes, that compulsion. Am I saying that make no plans anymore?

No, I'm talking about an inner compulsion, a psychological compulsion that desperately needs a future. And that's created that peculiar civilization that we live in, where everybody, almost everybody is under great stress trying to make it. But that mind pattern already existed thousands of years ago, it's just becoming more accentuated, more pronounced now.

The mind is becoming more and more noisy, and people are more and more trapped in that noise as me, never enough. Not only never enough, needing to sustain that sense of separate selfhood, if that is a word, needing to sustain that sense of separate me by being in an antagonistic position to what's not me's, other me's. To be, in other words, at odds with something or someone, to be opposing something or someone, enhances the mind made me.

And that explains in part why the normal human consciousness is so dysfunctional, why it creates so much suffering on the planet. 20th century, madness, complete madness. What is it?

There must be, where is that dysfunction? It must be somewhere in the human mind to create such a world, to create so much suffering, both collectively and on a personal level. So what is that?

What is that sense of self that is derived from mind movements? What, why does it have the need to be surrounded, one could almost say, by enemies? Because it enhances the sense of separate identity.

I define myself, the mind made self, through my problems, through my conflicts, through the people that I argue with, through situations that I react against. The little me, the mind made me, is extremely reactive. It reacts to situations, people, places.

This shouldn't, they shouldn't, you shouldn't, I shouldn't. Never aligned with now, basically against now. Collectively, you see how when you, people are trapped in that delusory identity, one could say they don't know who they are.

They're trying to strengthen the fictitious sense of self collectively, then they create an us, a big, very big me, is us, the group, the nation, the tribe, the religion. And that, the mechanical unconscious movement, once you're identified, so the individual derives his or her sense of self from the group to a large extent, then the group will display the dysfunction that is built into that mindset and will start looking for some enemy unconsciously. Religions need their enemies.

Political parties need their enemies. Companies, institutions, always. Nations define their identity if they have strong collective identification, such as was the case, for example, Germany, Japan, 20th century, strong collective egoic identifications with our nation.

And it, the stronger it got, the more people felt that now they knew who they are because they have enemies all around. We have enemies north, south, east, and west, and they now define our selfhood. Now we know who we are.

For a moment, there's an elation because the illusory sense of self, in this case collective, has become strengthened. And that for a moment you feel good, you feel much bigger. But inevitably, when you are trapped in illusion, disaster follows.

Suffering follows. You cannot be trapped in illusion without suffering following very soon. So to observe collectively and individually how that conditioned mind operates, and in people's personal lives, the need for enemies that is built into this, the me doesn't really want peace, love, joy.

It says, that's what I'm looking for. But then when you observe, you see, it couldn't tolerate peace for very long because its separate sense of me would dissolve in a state of prolonged peace. That's why there's very rarely been prolonged peace on the planet.

And you individual humans also cannot be at peace. You look at relationships. How long can you go without conflict in a relationship?

A few days. Unless you have gone beyond that already, beyond identification with mind, beyond deriving a sense of self from mind movement and the emotion that go that reflect those mind movements. And so on a personal level, what you make into an enemy to sustain the delusory sense of self, one could say, is the now, the present moment.

And this is the amazing realization how rarely in that state of consciousness one is aligned at ease, at peace, totally at home in now, aligned with now, open to now, welcoming now. Very rare to welcome the now because most little me's are trying to get somewhere else because they need to add something to me. They're trying to get to the future.

The now is a stepping stone to the future. Even spiritual practitioners very often are trapped in that mindset where they have a strong psychological need for the future because this is obviously enlightenment, liberation, freedom is to be attained there. So you look at liberation, freedom or enlightenment in terms, almost in terms of content, adding more to me as the ultimate achievement and needing the future to find yourself, to be yourself fully and completely.

And this is the fallacy, future, one could say, you need future for everything, surely to learn a new skill, to learn a new language, to explore new countries, to acquire this or that, to meet a new husband or wife at some point, he or she is waiting for you. For all that you need future. It works.

But the only thing that truly matters, that ultimately matters, is the one thing that you don't need future for, and that is to be yourself fully and completely. That state is already there, simply obscured by mental noise. It's an amazing realization that through future you cannot become liberated.

The portal, the opening into yourself, into God, into reality is only now. The one place that you never looked in the mind-identified state, the one place that was inferior to a mental projection of a future state. So spiritual practitioners can fall into the trap of projecting a future state to be achieved.

So you give yourself future. That's very satisfying to the self. It would be more satisfying to that sense of self here if I said, I can give you steps of how to become liberated, free, enlightened.

There are 10 steps, and it will take 10 years. Oh great, he's given us time, and that feels satisfying. Now I know where I'm going.

Now the strange thing is, now you say, well, what are you saying that I am already enlightened when I know that I'm not? When everything in my life is telling me, or lots of things in my life are telling me that I haven't made it yet, and what are you putting some new belief into my mind that says, just be happy, smile, you're already enlightened, just believe that you're already enlightened, and you are enlightened. More thought, more belief, and for a while that can be satisfying.

You can go around saying, great, I'm enlightened. I realize it now. I'm converted now to the church of enlightenment.

This is the truth. This is it. Until a little bit later, life shows you very clearly that you were deluded, and more suffering comes in.

I shouldn't have believed that man. Why did I ever go to that talk? So let's not be very careful so that what I'm saying does not become some facile new belief that you add to yourself.

It goes deeper than that. To realize the truth of this, you need to realize what the now means. You need to realize the depth of now.

So the real purpose of this gathering is to enable you, if only to glimpse, perhaps more, the depth and truth of what it really means when we say now, what the now really is, not as intellectual understanding, but as a deeper, immediate realization of what now means. That's the purpose of this gathering. So it's not in the realm of ideas or beliefs.

It's to know now directly. What is that? The only thing there ever is, which nobody could argue with.

Nobody could really argue with the fact that your life has never not been now, not possible, nor could your life ever in the future not be now, neither in past. There was no nothing ever happened in the past. And don't think about this.

Just listen. If you start thinking about it, you will get into a little mental knot and say, well, okay, but doesn't make much sense. But well, no, I disagree with you.

There is a past. Okay. Don't think.

Just surely nothing ever happened in the past. Of course not. It happened in the now.

Where else nothing can happen that is not now. Nothing will ever happen in the future. It cannot.

Of course, for anything to be, to happen, it must be now. So reality, life is inseparable from now. You can remember the past.

You can store up memory traces of a past now, and then you remember it. But now, only the light of now gives life to your memory. Of course, it's the light of now that illuminates that.

And there is only this, the only thing that never left you, no matter how many transformations you have already gone through in your life. And there are some people in this world who have already, they feel as if they had already had three or four incarnations because their life has changed so drastically already several times. And this is more frequent these days.

In the past, in village societies, people just stay in one place, one incarnation, and then it comes to an end. But many people these days, their life has already had great ups and downs. And yet, it was always now.

That's almost nonsensical to say it, almost superfluous to say it, easy to ignore. That's it. That's all there is.

It's this, this, this, the suchness of this moment. Now, why are people running away from it? They need an enemy.

The mind-made self makes the now into an enemy. That's the arch enemy of the egoic self. It has many other enemies, but it really, it has made the now into an enemy.

That's how people live. They are not at one with what is, they are against it. They deny it, they reduce it to a mere stepping stone because the next moment surely is more important.

That's where I need to get to. Okay, I'm just stepping over this one. I'm on my way to the future.

And you carry on continuously. And sometimes it's only some disaster that pushes you into now. A moment when your life is threatened, when the conditioned mind couldn't cope anymore with the situation, something, a greater intelligence has to take over.

And in those cases, some people accidentally experience what it means to be totally present and to act out of that state of consciousness. No longer as a little me trying to achieve this or that, but being totally aligned with the totality of consciousness. So the action is the one, the totality moving through you.

And it's, sometimes people do the amazing things in that situation of great danger. Right action, unpremeditated, happens and it works. And then when danger is over, sometimes then they fall back into the normal consciousness.

What was that? What was that power that moved through me? And then other people come and say, how could you?

You did such a great thing. You are a hero. It's just me, hero?

I didn't do anything. It just happened. So there are people who accidentally get a glimpse of that and never forget it.

But it becomes, in many cases, becomes a memory. Sometimes they feel bad that they haven't got it now. So they have to remember it.

What have people said just before they had an accident? They were driving in a car and they knew that the accident, the collision was now unavoidable. The other car was coming towards you, maybe four seconds left, maybe five seconds left.

They survived. And some of them later talked about it and said, something very strange happened when I saw the inevitability of the accident. Suddenly all fear left me and I had this great sense of serenity and peace.

And I wasn't concerned at all about dying. It looked as if I was going to die, but there was this great peace. And if that peace could have spoken, they would have said, all is well.

There is no death. And so they experienced something at that moment when seemingly all future was removed from them. Total now-ness, total presence emerged as a new state of consciousness, far more intelligent, far more effective than the normal mind-identified conditioned state.

Conditioned, of course, by the past. So in that state, you are your past. You are a walking past.

And you can only really repeat the past. Newness can only come in, in this space, if there's an openness to now. And so you, maybe one or two of you, have experienced that.

But here we don't need to wait for some, our life to be threatened, to enter that state that the beauty of the spiritual teaching is. Well, ultimately, the beauty of spiritual teaching is, it's telling you, it's here now. You don't need time anymore.

You don't need time anymore. What do you mean, I don't need time anymore? Attention moves into the field of now.

An alertness arises, an alertness that is of such intensity that it is incompatible with thinking. A greater non-conditioned intelligence arises, out of which thought can come, but it is infinitely faster than thought. And you know it the moment your attention moves from past and future, which means the stream of thinking.

Your attention steps out of the stream of thought into the intense and sacred aliveness of this moment, which is far deeper than what is happening at this moment. And people confuse the now with what is happening in the now. And of course, that changes continuously.

Every form that arises in the now is fleeting. Nothing stays around for very long. Continuously it changes.

And the forms come and go and evaporate. That's why they leave you. So there's a continuous flux of impermanent forms that appear in the field of now, in the field of consciousness.

And people are so identified with that movement of appearing forms, which includes thoughts. On the most primordial level, it is thought. The continuous stream of arising and subsiding thoughts, people are so fascinated by that.

And the mind objects, sense perceptions, the world of form, in other words, inner forms, thought forms, emotional forms, outer forms that come and go in the field of now. And people are so fascinated by the arising and subsiding forms that they are completely lost in them, because they are looking for themselves in those forms and just think, I need to add a few more forms, hang on to those, get rid of those. So you are in a reactive relationship to the forms that arise in your life, because the little self rejects or wants to pull towards itself these forms.

It either wants to grasp them or it fears them. So that movement in the delusional state, which is the normal state, that movement of desire and fear, which is connected with the forms that you either want or don't want, that governs almost everybody's behavior. All actions, speech and thought movement are governed by desire and fear.

That is the deluded state and it's normal. That's ultimately dysfunctional and it's normal. And since we are coming to the end on evolutionary level, to that, we're coming to the end of that level of human evolution, the dysfunction has become particularly pronounced because we are reaching an end of this evolutionary cycle of being identified with form and seeking for yourself in the arising forms, thoughts and outer forms.

And then you have a personalized and reactive relationship to the forms that arise in the now. And of course you're acting out conditioning from the past. It's the me, the conditioned entity, me, mind made.

It reacts, it likes, it dislikes. And so that's all that people know about the now. They know the forms that appear in the now.

So they say, oh, every hour consists of hundreds of moments. Nobody knows how long one moment is because it's not an exact measurement. But everybody believes that their day consists of many, many moments because every moment something else happens.

Every moment a new thought or an emotion or something externally appears in your life. So they think, okay, another moment. No, it's not another moment.

It's the same one now. The form has changed that the now appears as. The form that arises in the now has changed.

The now remained always. And so how do you know this to be true, truly, so that it is vital, transformative knowledge to know this to be true? How do you get there?

And that's so simple that people have been missing it for thousands of years. And they had to make the sublime simplicity of spiritual teachings, the truth of such sublime simplicity, they had to make it into mind stuff. Belief systems and speculations to fuel the mind-made sense of self and identify with something.

But the simplicity is simply this. Not to internally offer resistance to the form that this moment takes. The conditioned mind, of course, says, yeah, but this is not what I want.

This isn't the form that I wanted. That's why I'm trying to get somewhere else. Surely you're not telling me that this place where I am and this job that I have and this inner state that I'm in, that's it?

That can't be it. Well, no, that's not it. It's the form that this moment takes.

What can you do? It is already. This moment is as it is.

It cannot not be as it is. And that is a strange realization. The mind, it doesn't make sense to the mind.

Yeah, okay, well, the totality has brought about the form that this, because everything is totally interconnected on atomic level, subatomic level. It's all totally one web. And that has brought about the appearance in your field of consciousness of this now.

How could it be otherwise? It is as it is. And so you realize the futility and ultimate madness of resisting internally the isness of this moment.

Now the mind says, yeah, but I don't want it. At least I don't want it to last for very long. Or the mind says, yeah, but this is a limitation on my life.

I'm not going to accept this limitation on my life. My body maybe is not well. Maybe where I live is not the greatest place.

It's such a small room, I can hardly move. And you're telling me I should accept this limitation Well, all that is required is to accept this moment. Not an idea in your head that says, okay, here I am in prison.

I've got another 10 years to do. I might as well resign myself to the fact that I'm in here for 10 years. Nothing to do with the present moment.

Or I might as well resign myself to the fact that I'm ill and I'm probably not going to recover. So what can I, nothing to do with the present moment. That's, those are mind movements.

They concern your life situation. We're not talking about your life situation, which are the circumstances of your life that unfold in time. Yes, but we are talking about life, not the outer form of life.

Life itself, the life that you are beyond form, the one life, the one consciousness, the one to know that, not by seeking, because knowing the one is knowing yourself as unlimited and free. No longer being trapped in a personalized little sense of identity. Never at ease and rarely at ease and needing more of this and more of that.

In conflict with this and that continuously. Knowing yourself truly, not through some mental concept, knowing yourself as that which is unlimited, the essence of your being. Now, you've been seeking the unlimited by trying to escape internally from the limited, which is more often than not, it's the now, the form that the now takes.

Here I am sitting on this bus full with a hundred people, especially buses here are very full. So you're squished. Oh, you're telling me I should accept.

Yes, this is the form that this now takes. It is as it is. You see the futility of resisting it.

You're not projecting a future moment when you're going to be free, because then there will be some other limitation appearing in the now. It is in the nature of the world of form to give you some limitation. The very fact that you have a body is a limitation.

And then life, you move through life and you meet one after another. And then you meet your ideal partner. And a year later, the ideal partner is another limitation on your life.

And then you say, okay, that wasn't it. He wasn't it. She wasn't it.

Or you become very unhappy for the rest of your life. I made a mistake. So it's not by escaping internally from the limitations into a future realm, where you are hoping to find yourself or the essence of yourself.

You never get there. So the amazing thing is, take the now, just this segment that is now, not some mind movement like a life situation, an illness, financial lack, health. These are life situations.

Out of that, there's only this moment. At this moment, say I have 10 rupees in my pocket. And then you look at your bank balance, and it shows zero.

And here you sit. There's the coins. And there you sit on a bench.

And you're breathing and looking around. It is as it is. This moment is as it is.

And suddenly, you drop resistance and you actually, something arises because there was that yes to now was so deep. And I spent some time on park benches, so I know what I'm talking about. But the yes to now was so deep that that seeming, that apparent limitation, that was totally, only this moment was totally accepted.

And suddenly, something arises. I have to be careful with words now because I don't want to put any ideas in your head. With that complete acceptance of now, whatever limitation it may be, you can't argue with is, is.

That's what happened to those people who saw the car coming. The accident seemed inevitable. They no longer argued.

That happened to people who were in a dangerous situation and did the right thing totally, not out of a state of inner resistance, but out of a state of total alignment, an intense aliveness, and a deep peace that comes with the yes to now. A sense of, and I use that word carefully because the word is only a pointer, a sense of spaciousness around events, a sense of spaciousness around emotions even, a sense of spaciousness that is there. Here comes the form of this now.

And you meet it with a total and uncompromising yes. And suddenly, you go, internally you go beyond the limitation of the form, not because you ran away from the limitation, you walked through the limitation. You are no longer in a reactive relationship to that apparent limitation.

It no longer strengthens your sense of self or of me. And then you take action out of that delusion, which produces further delusion and more of the same. That state of no matter what form this takes the now, I welcome it.

That open, alert presence with which you welcome what is, takes you beyond the form of this moment to the unconditioned, or rather it doesn't take you, you realize yourself as the unconditioned consciousness in which this form appears. And that is a sense of, one could say, stillness or peace around what happens. Or one could say, whatever happens then, happens within a field of stillness or peace.

That you cannot grasp conceptually, there is an underlying peace, stillness, in which everything happens. And not that it condemns you to a state of passivity, at times that state is dynamic because action can arise out of it. But it is non-reactive action.

Non-reactive, not a little me trying to strengthen itself. And it's absolutely right for this moment. This is what they try to teach in schools like Zen and others.

Simply this utter and complete yes to what is. Utter and complete presence. Not looking for the limit, the unlimited through future, but by totally accepting, one could say, although some of you may not like that word, surrendering totally to the form that this now takes internally.

That is the surrendered state of consciousness. And that is the most powerful of the, really the only truly effective, powerful state of consciousness. It is the state of being aligned with the one intelligence, beyond the conditioned temporary expression of that intelligence that is the human mind.

Nothing wrong with it. Human mind is beautiful, it's fine. It's only when you are looking for yourself in it, it traps you in a little form identity.

So not that you no longer have a form identity. Of course you have a, there's still the bodily form. You have your name and you have a life situation that goes on, but something much more vital has come in.

The liberating power of now. And now you begin to realize what the depth of now is. It's not what happens in the now.

That's not the now. That's the form it takes. The now is the field in which it happens.

The field of consciousness, one could say, but be careful with words because then the mind can attach itself to a word. The field of consciousness, unconditioned, pure intelligence, whatever you want to call it, in which the entire phenomenal universe unfolds, which appears as form. Millions and millions of forms being born out of that, returning into it.

The miracle of phenomenal existence. Wow. And you're no longer threatened then by the world of form, nor does the world of form, which is the world, hold that great promise that it once did.

That at some point, through the acquisition of some form, you can complete yourself. That's the promise of the world of form, which is not going to be delivered. So you can then, you come to be at ease with the world of form, no longer demanding that some form, a person, a situation, a condition should complete you or make you happy.

Please make me happy. You say to a place, to a situation, to a person, and they never comply for a little while. Yeah, that's the place.

And then something happens to spoil it because it's form and it's limited. So enormous freedom comes then that the demand that you make upon the world to complete you, and that's what makes living so frustrating. Because there's the demand that the world should give you something and it never gives it to you.

Although occasionally you get the delusion that now it's given it to you, that makes it even more frustrating. So as you drop that demand, an enormous sense of relief comes because you're no longer looking for yourself in the forms that come and go. That's the beautiful play of form of the phenomenal universe.

And for the first time, you can actually participate freely in that without self-seeking and forms, without needing to have certain forms to complete you. It's beautiful. You play with the world of form and allow it, allow the forms to come and go.

And as a byproduct of such a living in such a way and living out of such a state of consciousness, as a byproduct of that, you may notice that your life, even in the world of form, unfolds with greater ease because you're no longer standing in a reactive relationship to the world of form. And the universe then appears to you as a more benign, more benevolent place suddenly. Oh, how nice.

Not that forms are no longer limited. You will still experience the limitations of each forms, but somehow that doesn't matter anymore. In fact, it's almost one could say, you welcome the limitations of the forms.

That also is beautiful. And that means you welcome death. Death means a form leaves you.

Death means a form dissolves. And there is great beauty and sacredness in a form that is at the transitional point between being a form and being the formless. As a form dissolves, death in other words, whenever a form dissolves in this space of now, something shines through the opening.

It leaves a kind of emptiness, one could say. It's gone. And through that little hole, and it could be a person close to you who died.

It could be loss of some great possession that was important to you and suddenly it's gone. And what shines through when a form disappears from the now suddenly, which is death, the now itself, which is the essence of who you are, which is the unconditioned consciousness, which is the formless one life. That is why death is sacred.

Because whenever death occurs, the end of a form, the formless one life shines through that opening. And then you truly, deeply can know and sense what the depth of now is and means. And you realise that it is none other but yourself.

The now is yourself, not the little mind made self, the one self. And when this is liberation, simply is knowing the field of now to be yourself. It's an amazing thing to realise that you are the now.

That's why it never left you. No matter where you went. And that's, you're suddenly liberated from time, past and future, which you can still use to catch a bus.

It works. To meet someone, it works. But not much beyond that.

You are freed from past and future. You are freed from compulsive thinking, obsessive thinking, the incessant stream of thinking, identification with that. And you are freed from suffering.

How could you suffer when you're totally aligned with now? Whatever arises is as it is.

Emotions, okay.

It is. And it is. A stream moving through, all right, there it is.

What can you do? It is. You welcome that.

Suddenly there's a space around that too. And you are that. It's the now.

So you then go through life as this deepens in you. You go through life not no longer compulsively reacting to the forms, but knowing yourself as that which underlies all forms. In other words, you go through life with the awareness of the field of now, which is awareness itself.

Self-awareness. In other words, and again, just little pointers, you become aware. Just another little same thing.

You become aware of awareness as the underlying field. This sounds dualistic, as if there were a subject and an object, but that's only because of language. You become self-aware, and that's limited too because of language.

You know yourself as the awareness, not as that which happens in the awareness. Self-aware. And that is then the undercurrent in your life that is infinitely vaster and deeper than anything that happens in your life.

So what happens, you can actually now, for the first time, enjoy what happens without feeling either threatened by it or feeling that you need to grasp at this or that and demand that something or someone should make you happy. So really, the only reason why we are here is to know at first hand that state of consciousness and it's already in you. It's not, it cannot be achieved.

It's already the essence of who you are. So it's only through entering the surrendered state that who you truly are beyond form emerges. Emerges.

And the moment it emerges, you will notice the compulsion to think disappears. Thought begins to slow down. Before it went, because you needed to go on and on because yourself was, I have to keep myself alive.

I think, therefore I am. So I have to keep thinking. And as you enter the surrendered state aligned with now, the compulsion goes because you realize that why there was compulsive thinking was because desperately you try to work yourself, work your way out of the now through that compulsive thinking.

Let's see how I get out of here. And so the stillness that is the essence of your being and stillness, all that it means is unconditioned consciousness, thoughtless awareness is already there. It's already fully there.

Not to be perfected or achieved. It can't even be an achievement. Not to be obtained.

It's nobody's achievement. That's a pity. Can't add it to me.

Nothing to add. And those people who found it accidentally and there have been throughout history and perhaps the first spiritual teachers, the first who became liberated, they didn't become liberated through monasteries or schools. They became liberated because life took away from them all the content that they had identified with as me.

They lost everything. Even their beliefs, everything collapsed, deaths all around, unbearable. It became so unbearable, the suffering, that something snapped and they entered the surrendered state.

And suddenly the formless one life was there as a sense of deep peace and aliveness. And they looked around, the world around them had collapsed. Even perhaps in their mind, they couldn't explain things anymore, thought structures.

In the face of death, especially if death comes at you in multiple forms, in the face of death, it doesn't make sense anymore. And even that collapses, your beliefs collapse. There's nothing left.

And there you are, and suddenly surrender to that. All that is contained in the symbolism, of course, of the cross, which is the symbol of the extreme form of limitation. Jesus nailed to the cross symbolizes limitation in its extreme form.

And then something happened, surrender happened. Not my will, but thy will be done. The will of the totality, the one, not my, not me.

Surrender happened. And the cross then becomes transformed into a symbol of the divine. The dual symbolism of the cross is, it's a torture instrument, extreme symbol of limitation, and it's a symbol of the divine in one.

So there's enormous wisdom in that, contained in that, that it is not away from the limitations of form that you find yourself, that you know yourself as the formless, but by walking through, surrendering to and walking through the limitations, then the very limitation becomes an opening. And that's why otherwise living in this world would be, some malevolent God would be having a good time laughing at human suffering. Why?

But that's not how it is. It's everybody encountering limitation and many humans in extreme forms. And there's only one lesson, walk through it, not away from it, right, through welcoming.

The form that this moment takes, that's transformation, that's the transformed consciousness. And that is a spiritual practice that requires no time, no future, you can only do it now. You can't get good at it, you can only do it now or not do it now, and suffer.

That's a learning in itself. And those who are here have all, and who haven't walked out yet, have all reached a point where they realize the possibility of living free of suffering. But suffering was wonderful, of course, because it brought you to this point where you can hear this, so be great, you probably needed it, you need suffering.

People ask me, do we need suffering or not? Sometimes they say, you're not very clear. Sometimes you seem to say it's a great thing and then you say, you don't need it.

And the truth can only be expressed in paradox. And the paradox is you need suffering until you realize that you don't need suffering. And you need time until you realize that you don't need time, it's all right.

The universe allows, if you need more time, which implies that you need more suffering, fine, all right. So this is the, one could say, how is it that such vital truth is not taught at schools? Why is it that very few people seem to know this?

Is there some conspiracy at work? They're trying to cover up the truth. Don't talk about it.

Liberation must not be mentioned unless it's a belief system, then you can talk about it. Well, the egoic sense of self doesn't like it, of course. So one could almost say there's a conspiracy.

It's the egoic conspiracy that says, let's not talk about liberation. We can make a church out of it or a belief system, that's okay, but not the actual thing. This is the message.

If you're ready, many of you are ready, and many more humans on this planet are entering the state of readiness, then from now on, the unconditioned state will be there every moment, the surrendered state. And at other moments, you will notice you're not surrendered in the now, some contraction, some inner no, and suddenly you notice it. What do you do then?

Well, the mind, what the mind wants to do then, it will say, you see, no point. You can't do it, it doesn't work. No, just observe the no, say, all right, here goes another contraction, another no.

That's how it is. It's the form that this moment takes. I can feel my whole body contracting as I sit here.

What's that? What's that music? It shouldn't be there.

People shouldn't sing while other people talk. And then you notice it. Oh, another contraction.

And then suddenly the very form that you had reacted against is actually quite beautiful. Oh, and the now is always sacred, nothing else is. When you enter the now, you enter also the realm of the sacred.

But God is only here now. And that I'm not going to define further. I don't need to.

It's an amazing realization when you see that the sacredness is there as you enter now. Oh. No matter what form it takes.

Thank you. Thank you for honoring us with your presence. And to all of you for coming here this afternoon.

The prayer that we offer before the talk is a moment of silence. I would like to explore a moment of silence that is a very important moment in our lives. that is a moment of silence that is a moment of silence with you this afternoon, the deepest truth of human existence.

When I say that, that may sound a little bit abstract, interesting, but abstract, human existence. And it may sound a little bit philosophical, but this is not a lecture on philosophy, nor is it a lecture at all. The best way to look upon it is as a meditation.

Although somebody is speaking, look upon it as a meditation. So when I say the deepest truth of human existence, it sounds a little bit removed from your everyday concerns. So let's put it in another way.

We are here to explore the deepest truth of who you are, because you are human existence. We are here to explore the deepest truth within yourself, knowing yourself at the deepest level. So a level so deep that knowing yourself and knowing God become one and the same.

There are two levels to this talk, if it can be called that. One is the words and one is the gaps between the words, a certain stillness. I've just pointed this out because it is helpful as you listen to be aware not only of the words but of an underlying field of stillness out of which the words come, nothing personal.

There's a field of stillness that is both within and without gaps between the words, a silent space in between and underlying the words. And simply to be aware also of that dimension. Then listening to these words is more than absorbing information, because there isn't that much information here.

It's not an information-based talk. Then it becomes a meditation to just sit here and listen. And the deeper teaching, if it can even be called teaching, is not in and through the words.

The deeper teaching lies in the dimension of stillness. Because the moment you acknowledge that underlying dimension, then you have accessed a realm within yourself that is deeper than the stream of mind, with which most people are identified as themselves. Simply as we sit here to acknowledge to notice, to listen to an underlying stillness.

That which acknowledges that in you, that which is able to listen to that dimension, listen not to something, listen to nothing, to nothing, just the act of listening. That in you which is able to acknowledge that dimension, to be attentive to that dimension, is a realm of stillness underneath the stream of mental noise. In other words, the moment you pay attention to that dimension of silence, there is a stillness.

In you, because through thought, you cannot pay attention to silence because thought is noise. So already, although through words we are going to progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence, even as you sit here and follow the words that progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence, that deepest truth of human existence is already emerging in you as you sit here and listen, even now, simply by paying attention to silence through the inner stillness. That is the only way you can notice.

The stillness in you notices that. And you have gone beyond the continuous stream of mental noise that for most people is who they think they are. So the answer to the initial question that I asked, I said, let's explore the deepest truth of human existence, the deepest truth of who you are.

The answer of that is never really in the future, not even within the framework of this talk is the answer of who you are beyond the conditioned mind. Never is that answer in the future. It's always now.

So our question, what does that mean? The deepest truth of who you are, knowing yourself. Doesn't everybody know themselves already?

And most people would say, yes, I know my name and all those things that are associated with my name, things that cling to that initial form identity that my parents have given me when they taught me what my name is, such and such, whatever it may be. First, what's your name, the little child is asked, and is very proud to be able to say his or her name. And the parents say, very good.

That's the way human existence goes. And nobody realizes that already through the initial first label, mental label, first identification with a thought, a sequence of sounds, the first limitation, an illusory limitation on who you truly are beyond mental concepts. The first limitation has already arisen.

You have already entered a prison of conceptualization. It is the beginning of it. But we need to go that way.

Humans have to move through that. It would be futile to tell a child, you have no name. Don't identify yourself with a name.

That the child has to go through the stage. Every human being has to go through the stage where they begin to accumulate experiences, knowledge, labels, words, concepts, all kinds of things, cultural conditioning, personal conditioning through their environment. And these things then cling around the name.

And after a few years, gradually a sense of self develops, a me. Even in a small child, it begins to develop when the child says, my toy is bigger than yours. It feels good to the child to strengthen its sense of self through feeling I have more than you.

I know more than you, or my father is stronger than yours. You can add a bit more to that sense of self. And again, that is a normal process.

And so gradually the accumulations continue and you become an adult. And then you have a certain sense of self based on the conditioning of your mind. That is the mind that never stops.

That is the mind that is a continuous stream of thought processes. And the thought processes are strongly connected with the conditioning of your mind. So the stream of thinking, and this doesn't depend on culture.

It doesn't depend whether you live on India, in India or in the West. It is the same in every human being. The stream of thinking goes on incessantly.

And a lot of that is to do with me and my concerns and my problems and what's going to happen to me. There's a story of me, which is my past. Things have happened to me, things that I have accumulated, the content of my mind is a kind of story that people like to dwell on, talk to themselves about their story, have a monologue or a dialogue in the head.

And so a sense of self develops that is mind based. And that's again happens to everybody. A sense of self develops that is content based, content and form based, a psychological form of me.

And for most people, that is who they are. So if you ask them, who are you, they will tell you a little story. It could be, they could keep it brief, they could give you a brief summary of me, or they can make it very long.

They can go on for hours because my story is so interesting and dramatic. Have you got enough time to listen to it? Let me tell you what my story is and what I have suffered, what I have seen, what I have, my triumphs and my victories and my defeats, what people have done to me and all the bad things that I have done.

I'll tell you about all of this. And so this is why psychoanalysts make a good living because there you pay them to listen to you and to the story. And if you want to be thorough in psychoanalysis, you have to go three times a week for a few years.

And so you tell your story. And as you tell the story of me, more and more layers of complexity become revealed about me. And it's so interesting.

And so after you have completed your course of psychoanalysis, if ever, if ever, then the psychoanalysts might tell you we have come to the end. By the way, that's very rare. He will tell you we have come to the end of our analysis.

We have analyzed everything about you and I will give you the file. It's big. Here it is.

You can take it home. This is you. This is you.

And if then somebody asks you, do you know yourself? You say, oh yes, it's all here. The content of my mind has been analyzed and here it is in this file or it might be a computer disc these days.

And so I can tell you all about it. And of course, when they say I know myself, what they really mean is I know a lot about myself. I know many things about myself, a lot of information, many facts.

And they forget who the I is that knows because all that knowledge is knowledge about. It's form knowledge. You know a lot about your psychological form identity.

Not that there's anything wrong with it. Each person moves within a form identity, has a form identity, which is not to be rejected, but to be honored. Part of your form identity is the function that you have in this world, the social function, your profession, whatever you do, your activity, your relationship to other people as a mother, as a father, as the boss.

Many other things come into it, your cultural background, your nationality, the nation that you feel you are part of is part of that conditioning. It is not to be discarded, but also to be honored. You honor the forms that are part of you.

The content of your mind, you identify with as me. The only thing is, if you only know yourself as those forms, because every form identity exists, consists of various roles that people play within that form. And that usually is the limit of people's self-knowledge.

Plus, if they've done psychoanalysis, they know about their childhood and all those things that happened then. So is there more to who you are than the form identity, which has two levels. We've been speaking about the psychological form of me.

And of course, then there is the physical form of the body. So people identify with the two. There's my physical body, me, and there's a psychological story.

And that is the story of me. And that includes all the conditioning or the reactive patterns, all those things are in there. The content of the mind is the psychological form of me.

So we have the two levels of identification. And sometimes the body can be a very strong identification in certain people. It becomes part also of the psychological form identity.

If, for example, your body is very beautiful or your body is very strong, that enhances your psychological form identity. It gives you a feeling that you are stronger, more beautiful than others. And the sense of self becomes enhanced through that.

And that can last for quite a while. And it works quite well until you reach, the body begins to grow old. And then the beauty fades.

And if that was the main part of your form identity, great suffering starts when the beauty fades that you thought that was me. So the form identity, both physical and even more strongly psychological form, has certain characteristics. And one of the characteristic of form identity is that it never feels complete.

It never feels, except for brief moments, which turned out to be delusory, never feels really at ease or at peace. It never feels that you are freely and fully yourself yet. Yet is added by the mind because that's a little escape, which says, okay, yes, there is this recurring, almost permanently underlying sense of lack of insufficiency and of incompleteness.

And many people who are not conscious enough, don't feel it directly. It becomes translated into continuous wanting and needing this or that to fill that hole that they feel, to fill that sense of lack and insufficiency with something to make myself complete in this form identity. And so there is an enormous need in human beings to add more to me, to make me complete.

And that is the search, that is the enormous momentum behind human wanting and needing. The Buddha speaks of desire. And again, that's a little bit abstract.

At his time, it was a powerful word perhaps, but desire really is wanting, needing. And then you look for things to add to the accumulated content of mental identifications to complete my sense of self. So you look to, and it's strange, it's a little bit like a, it'll grasp at anything to add to me, whatever it can.

And a very common one, of course, is material possessions that I identify with. I have more than you. This enhances my sense of self.

I identify with my house, I identify with my car in a very subtle way. I feel it's an extension of me. The car has become a mind object.

And that mind object is used to strengthen, to enhance a deficient sense of self. And for a little while, it works. You feel bigger as you step into your BMW.

You have expanded. Your sense of self has grown. And you are more powerful than all those little puny little cars around you.

And for a little while, that works. You feel almost you have arrived. And then before long, it wears off.

And then you sit in that car and it's not that fulfilling anymore. It's just a car. It gets you from A to B.

That wasn't quite it. And then you look to the next thing. And the next thing could be a relationship to complete me.

Because the last one didn't work. It didn't complete me. Something went wrong.

So you go out and look for it there. The ideal one, I'm going to meet one day. I'm looking for the ideal partner that is going to complete my sense of self.

And then it happens at times that you find him or her. That means it's called falling in love. And it says, okay, I found you.

You are going to complete me. You are going to make me happy, which you sometimes read in the lonely hearts columns, looking for someone to make me happy. What they mean is to make my sense of self complete, to fill that lack that I feel.

And so you might get married. And for a while, the illusion is there, just as it was there with the BMW, that now I have arrived. This is when you fall in love.

You have this euphoria of completeness. It's just... Finally, the story of me has completed itself.

I have arrived. I made it. And then comes the honeymoon.

And then comes ordinary existence and all the things that arise in ordinary existence. And sooner or later, this ideal partner fails to live up to what she had promised when he signed the wedding document that is to complete you, to make you happy. It's not working anymore.

That feeling disappears. And then it becomes, oh, I made a dreadful mistake. It wasn't the right one.

He wasn't right. Or you begin to look elsewhere. But in the meantime, you've been looking every day for hundreds of little things to add to me to enhance your sense of self.

All kinds of little things to whatever. I could make a list of hundreds of things, how that egoic self and mind-made entity looks for little things to add to me. Experiences can add.

Anything, drugs maybe to have an experience with that. Maybe that food, even food. I can add that.

It's a psychological need. The body has a limited need for food, but the psychological me has a great need for food because even through that, it can make itself feel a little bit more complete. A box of chocolate works for an hour or two.

And you can see the impulse behind it when people reach into the bag of chips or the chocolate, and there's no, there's more. It's not the body really that wants, it's the mind-made self that seeks some completion through that. And when the bag of chips is empty, it looks for the next thing.

So in many little and big things, there is this enormous need to add to me and in everywhere to make myself complete because it's never, that completeness never lasts. And so people believe that their sense of not having arrived, of not quite having made it yet, of not being truly and fully yourself, people believe that this is their personal problem. They believe that others exist who have made it because you see the movies and you see the magazines that show you these glamorous, famous people who apparently, surely they must have made it.

They look so happy in their glamorous surroundings. And the culture tells you that that is the way to go. You can make it, just try harder to have more possessions or more status, that's a big intangible but enormous thing to add to oneself.

Other people's view of me is an enormous piece, bigger even, can be bigger than the greatest mansion, that need for others to give me their approval, their high opinion. And so there's the need for status in society, for others to tell me that I am great and good enough. And that's an enormous, these are enormous chunks that are identifications that you can add to the deficient sense of self.

And for a little while, it also works. And then if you've met any of the famous people that you see in the magazines and films, whatever they, sports, movies, famous this, famous that, people who are told by the surrounding culture and the world that they are special, that they have made it and they are great role symbols in society, and if you meet them, you will see that underneath the glamorous facade, there is the same sense of deficiency. It didn't complete them. The whole world telling them that they are great and deep down, they feel this is a big lie.

Also, there are famous people who have actually, through that, have seen through the delusion of that, the meaninglessness of this world, which to a large extent is mad because it's the human egoic mind, telling you that you are important. And some people striving a lifetime to add that to their sense of self, to the world, please tell me that I matter. My sense of self depends on it.

Please tell me that I am important. And then, of course, only a few are told that. The others are left in limbo and are unhappy there.

And those that are told that they are important, they are unhappy there, not complete. And it happens occasionally that a few of those people who made it rich and famous, they begin to go deeper because they have everything and they can't possibly think of any more to add to me because what can you add when you have everything, could buy anything, go anywhere, and everybody thinks you are God and still feel. And so some of those actually see through the delusion and then penetrate to deeper levels of their being.

But for many of us, there is always the hope that through this or that addition to me, added content for the mind, the mental identifications, that through that, I can complete myself and my life is going to work and finally feel that I have arrived. I'm home. I'm fully myself.

And what people don't realize is it is not their personal problem, the fact that they feel that they haven't arrived, that they haven't made it. It is built into the very structure of the mind-made sense of self. That deficiency and sense of lack is inseparable from those mind structures, from that identity.

So it is nothing to do with what you could possibly add. Nothing that you add could fulfill you, is the truth. And that is, for spiritual seekers, this is a very subtle point because that mindset, which is collectively conditioned, nobody's personal problem, that has an enormous need for more, for more of whatever it may be, more.

That mindset is quite deep-seated. It implies, of course, that you have an enormous need for future because you can, it's only through future, and you're looking into future, where you can get the future, the mind-made self tells you, will enable you to get that. And this is why very few human beings are actually where they are, rooted in the presence of now.

They are reaching out in that drive for more. They are reaching continuously. They are being pulled out of now, which is all there ever is, which is life itself.

Nothing else ever exists except now. But they are pulled out of this into a mental projection, a psychological future where they are going to complete themselves because they will reach that more there. That's the momentum, and that's how most people live.

In that continuous, almost desperate search for being ultimately yourself, finding yourself through more, through future, finding myself through future. Everybody's doing it through looking where you can add more. Where is the more?

I need more. And then you become frustrated with the more gross levels of more. And then you move up into the subtle levels of more, where you seek to add, perhaps, spiritual experiences.

And a spiritual seeker needs to be very careful and look whether within him or herself, the need for more still operates. And then the spiritual search becomes a need to add more to me as spiritual knowledge. Spiritual knowledge is valuable and beautiful as a pointer, but it can become mental content that I identify with as me.

Spiritual scriptures and spiritual knowledge is wonderful. This country is the cradle for that. It has got the most beautiful and profound maps or signposts towards who you truly are to point you to that.

And if used rightly, it works beautifully and powerfully. But if used by a mind that is seeking more to add to me, then the very scripture can become a hindrance because you accumulate maps and signposts. They are beautiful and you carry great knowledge.

And in a very subtle way, a spiritual ego could also come in. It's very more subtle than the BMW ego. It's the ego coming back through the back door.

And there's a very subtle sense of, I am now more than all those poor little worms who have not yet seen the light. I have studied those things. I have studied with masters.

I've been to monasteries or in the West, it's workshops. I have done all those and there's so much. I have, there's a very subtle sense of more, but never enough because you haven't, you feel, well, I haven't quite arrived yet, but I'm already more than all those.

All those mere more, it's a very, very subtle thing. And you have to be very vigilant to see it in yourself. That still, that deep seated collective mental conditioning, the need for more flows even into the spiritual search, the spiritual seeking, seeking to become fully myself.

And again, there's a great psychological need for future because I seek to complete myself in future so that the same mindset can operate in that realm also. So it's good to know that because once you know it and you know that the sense of insufficiency or lack is intrinsically linked with that mindset, you can't get out of it, no matter what you do, no matter how much you add, it's never enough. Even spiritual knowledge, if it's only an adding of experiences or knowledge, it's never quite enough yet.

But the search goes on, the great need for more. More of me until you see how it operates in yourself, until you see that there's a continuous movement away from what is now, until you see the need for this mind made sense of self. And this is really lies at the root of that continuous conflict in the world collectively and personally, the madness of human history.

Why is that? Why is human history so insane? 80% of it, look at the 20th century, incredible.

How can humans do this? There must be an enormous dysfunction at the core of the human mind. And this is it because a great need of this mind made sense of self is actually in order to continue to feel its sense of self, it needs to create opposition with others, situations and people, because only by fighting against, by having issues with, can it continue to feel its mentally derived sense of self.

You need the sense of separation of me against you. There's a need for conflict and problems built into the mind made sense of self. It never says that openly.

It says, I'm looking for peace, joy and happiness. But then what it says and does is the opposite in many cases. So you can see the need for conflict in personal relationships, in organizations, nations between nations and nations religions, and even within religions, any human structure, sooner or later, they will be in conflict.

There's these relationships every few days, most relationships, you seem to be forced to act out that kind of conditioned script where you are in conflict with each other. And problems, the little self says, the egoic self says, I want to be free of problems. But problems are part of its sense of identity.

It's looking for the next one. And we all know people who you say, who would they be without their problems? It's easier to see it in others.

All that is the structure of the self that needs its enemies to continue to feel. It's a very favorite way of enhancing your sense of self through enemies is to argue and feel the enormous momentum behind being right in an argument, making the other person wrong. If you can make the other person wrong, you can strengthen your sense of self.

Of course, you don't know that you have really only strengthened the illusion, but for a moment, it feels good. Not really, but the ego says it feels good. The body knows that it doesn't feel good at all.

But the ego says, I've shown him that I'm right. And for the moment, you have added that big rightness to the sense of self and it grows. And then after a little while, it wears off.

And then you need somebody else to make wrong. And you might even be looking. It's of course unconscious.

And then you start discussing a spiritual matter and you say, you don't know what you're talking about. Let me tell you. Or you say something and somebody doubts your point of view.

Now what, well, your point of view is a mental position, a thought. This is how it is. And somebody else says, that's not how it is at all.

But you have a mental sense of self. You have identified with the thought. Identified means your sense of self is in that thought.

It's a me. Your self is in the thought. One could say, I sometimes use the expression, you have reincarnated into the thought form for a moment.

Reincarnated means your self is in it. It's one with your sense of self. So when somebody says, no, you're completely wrong.

It is an attack on your very life. This is illusion. Because your identity is in the thought.

And so there's an enormous amount of emotional, the defensiveness that comes, or the aggression that comes when you defend your mental position. In very unconscious people, it can easily degenerate into violence. And then violence, in many cases, that is the root of violence.

Making the other wrong. Even a nation, collectively the same mindset operates, making the other nation wrong. Okay, let's prove that they are wrong.

We'll attack them. And then we are right. And the more enemies we have, the more we feel our sense of self.

So it operates whether on a personal or collective level, that delusion that through fighting and opposition, you can strengthen the self, the me. And so it's always looking out. It's not really, the egoic self isn't really looking for peace.

It says that. It cannot show you openly that it's looking for trouble. If it weren't, human history would not be the way it is.

The world situation would not be the way it is. The madness of it. And I always say, if you doubt it, read 20th century or any other century, but the 20th century is the most mad.

Or watch TV tonight. If you doubt the madness, what is this? And so it is built in this need for enemies, for problems and conflict.

Everybody carries that in here and is forced to act it out, to strengthen the illusion of me. And it always works for a little while. So all these things operate, the adding and the needing opposition, needing an enemy works.

Those two work very strongly. So you're always looking for the next thing. And so what is humankind to do if humankind is trapped in this collective conditioning of the mind?

Are we ever going to find the sanity? Are we ever going to find who we are beyond that delusion? And there's nothing wrong with a form identity, but if your sense of self is completely in it, it becomes dysfunctional.

Form identity is an aspect of who you are, the form aspect. Function, social function, all those things I mentioned, beautiful. But if your self is in it, if you derive your sense of self from that and have nothing deeper than that, it's always a cause of problems and suffering.

It's beautiful being a mother, but if you only know yourself as that role, you will be clinging, and you will be clinging to that form. If you don't know yourself beyond form, there's always a dysfunction that comes in. So how do you know yourself beyond form?

This is the question that's been asked ever since the spiritual search started because it is a spiritual question. It is the ultimate spiritual question. Who am I?

Am I more than this? And of course, you could add answers on the mind level by adding beliefs. They're a little bit comforting.

How do I know that I am more? How do I know that? How do I step out of this continuous stream of thinking?

A lot of it is to do with self. That's why it never stops. It's so compulsive because I need to keep myself going.

There's mind streams after mind streams, many concerned with future and the next moment. How do I step out of thousands and thousands of years of collective conditioning? Now, if you look at the characteristic of the mind-made self, one of them is the need for enemies.

And that you can now see there's one form of enemy to the mind-made self that is almost constant, but it's always overlooked. And that is the mind-made egoic self, what its main enemy, it has many, it needs them, but its main enemy that it continuously fights and ignores, opposes, resists, is actually the present moment, the now. It doesn't want this.

It never wants the now. There's always an unease with the now. There's always more, sometimes more than unease because I'm looking, I'm on my way to the future that is going to fulfill me.

This is, the now is a stepping stone. It enables me to get to the mental projection of future where I'm going to complete myself. So please don't hold me up now, I have no time for now.

I have something much more important on my mind and that is myself as this future projection where I'm going to make it. That could also be a spiritual thing. It could be a spiritual mental image of a future stage to be achieved as a strong mental projection.

And you're just trying to get away from this because you need to get there. Full liberation, attainment, realization can have an enormous pull towards future. And you don't realize you are trapped in the same mindset that the BMW person is trapped in.

It's become a pull towards future and trying to make it. And so I've met many spiritual seekers who've become unhappy after 30 years of search, 40 years of search, 50 years of search. When am I going to arrive to really, have you ever looked at now?

Have you ever looked at the only thing that never leaves you? The only thing that is ever real, the only thing where anything can ever happen, be said, thought, experienced, it's got to be now. Life is always this moment, but the mind made egoic self is striving towards the next one for its completion.

It's looking for itself there. It doesn't know that it is already here. Here, if you could only acknowledge fully and deeply this here and this now, if you could go deeply into this now, you would find that yourself beyond a mental story is already totally complete.

And only on the level of form could you add things, and that's beautiful, never to find yourself. You can learn new things, that's beautiful. Explore new countries, beautiful.

More of this, even have more possessions, but you can't find yourself through that. If you try to look for yourself through more, even spiritual experiences, they are nice too. But if you're looking for yourself, that never works.

So adding more is beautiful, except you can't find yourself through more. More works on the phenomenal level. And when you realize that, you give up.

You recognize, first of all, the egoic need to make the now into an enemy and to run away from it, to make it into a means to an end, to resist it internally, to criticize it, to project yourself away from it. I'm not interested in this because this is a limitation on who I am, who I want to be. I'm on my way to the future.

Everybody in the big cities of the world, they are all almost out of breath. And if you stopped any one of them, they would give you a reason why they are out of breath, and be like, I need to get there. But the common denominator is they're all trying to get to the future.

And the whole life is spent like that. And the spiritual aspirant, metaphorically speaking, maybe he's not running around, but there could be this same inner urge for future inside, so the breathlessness would become a metaphor. When am I going to be myself?

Have you looked deeply into now, the only thing that never leaves you, all there ever is, your entire life, here, in this space of now? Don't talk to me about now. I don't want this.

This is a limitation. I don't want the place where I live. You mean, this is not what I want.

I don't want to have these, the place where I live, the place where I work, all these are limitations on my life. I want to limitless. I want to find myself as that which is beyond limitation.

That's why I'm trying to get away from the now. But has it worked? How many years have we been trying to get away from it?

Well, 55, 60. And have you gotten away from the limitations of now? Not yet, but I have some more time left.

And you see the fallacy of that. And then you suddenly, you pay a little bit more attention to now. First, you see the pull away from it, and you notice that.

And then your attention moves into just this. Now, just this often is not, sometimes it's beautiful, but more often than not, okay, it's not that interesting. I mean, why should I linger here?

And at other times, it's not only not interesting, it's actually, this is not where I want to be. This not, this now, because this now is a limitation on my life. I'm trying to get out of this.

Okay, but you can't. So you look more deeply, and then something opens up within you. So you pay attention to this moment.

And then comes the realization, all you ever have is now, the one thing that is permanent in your life. Now, to the mind, it hardly makes sense to say that. What does that mean, it's always now?

The mind is, no, it's not always now. There's so many different moments in my life. They're all different.

It's not the case. The form that this now takes changes continuously. Forms appear in this field of now.

And because people know only the form that appears in the now, they believe that there are many different nows every day and every hour, one moment after another moment at another. But of course, it is always the one eternal, timeless one moment. Only the form in which it appears changes continuously.

Now, the very form in which it appears, this is the reason why many people don't want the now, because it's not satisfying enough. It doesn't add enough to me. It might even threaten my sense of self, the form that this moment takes.

And in any case, it's not fulfilling enough. It might even be a limitation on me. I want expansion.

And here I am in this little prison cell in certain extreme cases, where the now is seen as very, very limiting. Or your body, your physical body may be ill, can't move very well anymore. So that becomes very, the now, the form that this now takes can, in some cases, be extremely limiting.

And you are asking me, a person might say, not to try and get away from it? Yes, because that didn't work. Why not try something else?

Why not try to live in alignment, inner alignment with the form that this now takes? In other words, to embrace the now internally, no matter in what form it comes. To say yes to now, which after all is life.

It is inseparable from now. Life is always now, never not now. And so you say yes to life by saying yes to this moment.

And whatever form this moment takes, you say, how can I argue with it? It already is. It is, it is the is-ness of this moment.

Of course, I can change it. I can take action now. If I'm stuck in a, I'm locked in a building, I've lost the key.

This is the now. Of course, then I can get up and shout out of the window and say, can somebody please open the door? But if nobody hears, maybe somebody will come.

But at this moment, this is this now. Now you can internally argue with it and resist it, or you can say, that is the is-ness of this moment. That is the suchness of now, the form it takes.

And you see the futility and even madness of arguing with is, because whatever is, is already the case. So you, the shift in consciousness happens the moment you say yes to what is, because the entire structure of the egoic mind-made self lives on resistance and opposition and on making the now into an enemy. It lives through that.

That keeps it going. So the beauty of is, is we can step out of thousands of years of collective conditioning, not through needing more time to step out of it. And this message cannot yet be heard by everybody.

There are still many people on the planet, before they are ready to listen to this, they need more time. But since you are sitting here, I assume that something in you hears the message that to find yourself, and we will look more deeply now, see what does it mean now? To find yourself, you don't need future.

For everything else, it's helpful on the practical realm. It works quite well. Now, when you say yes to whatever form this moment takes, what happens?

Here comes the form of that this now takes. You say, all right, I welcome this, because it is. The form that this now takes, usually something in you, which is the egoic structures would have resisted it as limiting, not enough, it's not what completes me.

And through resisting this form in a situation, an event, a person, a human being, it can only appear in the field of now. Through resisting it, any form that appears, you strengthen your own form identity. There's a contraction in your form identity when you resist a form that appears in the now.

And that contraction is the strengthening of the illusory self. And so it likes that, it has strong momentum, because it survives in and through that resistance. When you relinquish the resistance, because you've seen through the futility and madness of living in that way, and you embrace the now, there's the form that the now takes, and you bring a yes to that.

And suddenly, what I say now is only a little metaphor or a pointer, there is a sense of space around what is happening in the now. There's a larger spaciousness, inner, perhaps even outer, a space around the form of now, which could be a human being, a situation, something has gone wrong, which happens a lot. The mind would call it wrong, because it's against what should be happening.

This shouldn't be happening now, but here it is. Yeah, but it shouldn't, but here it is. Oh, okay, you become aligned with that isness, and that is suddenly, whew, oh.

There's a spaciousness around the form of now. It happens within a field of, yes, peace around it. You can't, it is not something that you can easily capture in words or thoughts, because it is formless.

Through that act of what ultimately we could call surrender, entering the surrendered state of consciousness, surrender to God, that's a little bit abstract. Who knows what God wants? How do I surrender to God?

And surrender to whatever form this now takes, because the totality has brought this about. It is intrinsically linked with the totality of the cosmos. Everything is totally interconnected.

So the form that this now takes could not be otherwise. The whole universe has brought this about as form, and there's a little me in the head that has an argument with it, and strengthens itself through that argument. That is suffering.

That is the cause of human suffering. That is not knowing yourself beyond this little form. So suddenly there is a depth of spaciousness that is there when you surrender to what is completely.

An uncompromising, yes, that is surrender to God. And in that, the egoic structures that live on resistance and on denial of now subside. And there's a depth to your being suddenly, and a peace that is there no matter what form this now takes, because quite often, as we pointed out, it is a limitation.

It appears as a limitation on your life. Not on the head, but it's here. So the limitation, now people sometimes spend a whole lifetime running away externally and internally from limitations.

And I'm not saying don't change a situation if change is possible. But if you find whatever situation you get into, you encounter new limitations, and you are going to find that. Yes, you can improve your life situation, but even if you improve it, some other limitations will appear.

I gave the example in the talk yesterday, an unemployed actress working as a waitress, being in resistance to that, or being in surrender to that seeming limitation through being in the surrendered state, in my little story that I gave. To explain that, in the surrendered state, she honored the now, each customer in the restaurant, instead of saying, here I am, I'm a brilliant actress, and what has life given me? A waitressing job.

And then the now you can't honor, because the now is so limiting and unpleasant, you would be fighting it internally, continuously, and every customer would, you would make him or her feel that, that you don't like this now. And you are part of it. And then if she enters the state of, all right, this, not a mental concept, I might as well accept that I'm a waitress.

That is a further conceptualized sense of self, strengthening that. Of course, you're not a waitress, it's a temporary function. You're nothing permanently, and it's all a temporary function.

So don't derive an identity, an unpleasant, not enough identity from saying, I'm a waitress. This is what life has given me. Simply accept, not that you are a waitress, it's a delusion, accept this moment.

And there you are, there's a customer, and you say, can I help you? You're honoring and saying yes to now. With that comes in a totally different energy into the interaction.

And the customer senses that he or she is being honored. You honor the now, and any form that comes into the now, that goes with it, without saying, if you honor the now, whatever form this takes is honored. And so, and I gave a little humorous example that after serving many people in that way, she meets a director who gives her a card and call me up, my name is Steven Spielberg.

And the shift came in, three years later, she's a famous actress, world famous, and is her life now free of limitation? No, she can't walk alone in the street anymore. Everybody wants something.

Totally restricted her freedom of movement. What does she do there? To see that before long, some form of limitation will recur in your life in the now.

And you surrender to that. You can change a situation, but knowing the limitless is not to be encountered in the world of form, because form means limitation. So you say yes to the now, even if it is a form of limitation, seemingly.

You surrender to that, yes. And suddenly, around to the seeming limitation, there is spaciousness. At certain depths.

What really is arising here, although we need to be careful with words, all forms, thought forms, physical forms are conditioned. It's the conditioning. Conditioned consciousness, consciousness appearing as a form, consciousness appearing as a thought form, consciousness appearing in many, many forms.

But there is, the appearance arises out of a vast realm of the unconditioned consciousness before it takes form. And that is within every human being, that dimension is there, one could say, underneath the conditioned, which is all thought forms and emotional forms. There's the depths of the unconditioned, which could be, can be felt, cannot be known as such as you know an object in consciousness.

People look for God or themselves, believing that at some point in the future, of course, they are going to find God or themselves as an object in consciousness, as a knowledge in a subject object relationship, as if they could know it in the way that you can know a tree or, but you can't because the unconditioned is not an object. It is the ground out of which all mind objects, objects in consciousness arise into which they subside. So you can never know yourself in the normal sense of the word, but you can be that.

And that is felt, one could say, it is a realm of stillness underneath the mental noise. And every word will reduce it. It is far more than that.

Every word is no more than a little pointer, a realm of aware presence that is beyond thought. Thought can happen, come out of it, but in itself, it is consciousness, one could say, without thought, unconditioned. Oh, that is the deepest meaning of now because the strange thing about now is that it never leaves you and it doesn't change the field of now because it is, the essence of now is, it is the unconditioned consciousness, the field in which all phenomena happen.

And this, and now, the beauty here is to know that, one could say, you know the now beyond the form it takes, but you don't know it in a subject-object relationship. You know this field of now. When you surrender to the form, you know that which is beyond form.

Surrender to the form, the limitation, and then that emerges that is beyond form and beyond limitation as yourself. And this goes against how everybody lives in this world. They do not surrender to the limitation of this form.

They think they want to get away from it. Surrender to the form of now takes you into the depths of the now itself which you then know as the essence of your being, but don't know anything about it, a direct, unitive knowing as yourself. I would go so far as to say that you are the now.

Totally one with it. It never leaves you. You can't leave yourself.

The essence, the unconditioned dimension of who you are. And when you know that, you can allow the conditioned and the form to be, and it's beautiful, the form as which you appear because you don't need it anymore to derive a sense of self from it. Then the forms are beautiful also.

You honor them really for the first time when you know yourself to be beyond the form, you honor all the forms completely also. So to surrender to the limitation, the seeming limitation, this is the essential truth. The ultimate truth of all religions is the surrendered state of consciousness.

There's even one religion that's called surrender, Islam, but it is the essence of all religion in Christianity. That essence is contained in the image of the cross. Jesus on the cross is all of humanity.

The cross is the ultimate symbol of extreme limitation. Couldn't be more limited than to be nailed to a cross. It's a torture instrument.

So in a way, for a while, humans experienced the world, which is a world of form, almost as a torture. It's so heavy. And then that can take a time until suddenly they can hear the message of surrender.

And then at that moment, as symbolized by that image of Jesus, surrender happens on the cross, total surrender to extreme limitation and the seemingly unacceptable, not my will, but thy will be done. Thy will is the will of the one. And then my and thy merge in the act of surrender.

There's no longer my that opposes thy. When my and thy merge, there is total surrender. Your will is one with the totality.

And at that moment, the cross becomes a symbol for the divine. The very limitation turns into the symbol for God or the divine. So it's not by resisting or running away from, but by that deep act of surrender that the divine is realized.

And that, amazingly, does not take time. Surrender can only be now. It may take time to dwell in the surrendered state as your permanent state.

You fall back into resistance because the momentum of the collective conditioning is so strong. And then you reenter surrender. But the moment of surrender is always now because you surrender to the now and in the now.

So it can only be now. So that one decisive act or spiritual practice is the one that doesn't take time. And that's the beauty of it.

It really means you don't need future to find yourself and you need to add nothing to you to find yourself. Nothing. Then you can play with the realm of phenomena and add things.

It's beautiful. It's a play. But you no longer need it for yourself.

That's the essence of spiritual realization. All the teachings point to it. And that is to see that, what grace to see that the very thing that looked so heavy, which is the world of form, the very thing that seemed to be limiting me on all sides, that very thing is the doorway into the formless and into who I am beyond form.

And you see that ultimately they are one. Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form.

They are one. And that is the message of eternal salvation, the most sublime message for humankind. Nothing else is needed.

But that. Thank you. We were welcomed in all those places that we visited in India, very warmly with great openness.

It's now my turn to welcome you here to this gathering, not lecture, not workshop, just a gathering. Not that long ago, it would have been inconceivable, absurd even, for a Western form person to give a spiritual talk in India. What could he possibly teach us?

He would have said. We've been at it for so long. The cradle of human spirituality is here.

There are many sublime scriptures, sages, but the truth always finds new channels. And the truth is now emerging on this planet as never before. And one could consider it an advantage that this speaker has little knowledge of ancient scriptures.

So the truth needs to seek new channels to express itself through. And sometimes new channels can have a power and an immediacy that the old maps or signposts, beautiful and profound as they are, not always have because they've been there for so long. And then suddenly you see the truth again, you hear it, and you recognize it again in perhaps the scriptures that you have been reading or reciting for so long.

And it has renewed power also. So what is this truth? And that truth is the only subject matter of this gathering.

I'm not talking about many things. Only one thing, today and tomorrow. All the words point to that one thing, and it's not even a thing, but language is limited.

All the words point to the possibility of the transformation of human consciousness. And if that's a little abstract, all the words point to the possibility of that transformation within yourself, not in the distant future, but here and now. And so that is also the essence of all scriptures.

The possibility of human transformation, a completely different state of consciousness from the one that has dominated human history up to this point. The most profound question, the only vital question to ask yourself, of course, is the question, who am I? And that's the question, the primordial question of all spiritual endeavor has been that question.

Am I more than what I appear to be? More than this temporary physical form? More than my past, which is not very much, my future, which is not very much either, and the story of me that is the conditioning of my mind?

Is there more, or is that it? And a few beings who discovered who they were beyond the form, the physical form and the psychological form of me, they pointed the way towards that realization. But in most cases, it became belief.

You believed that you were more than that, and that's a little bit comforting, but ultimately not liberating. How can I know who I am beyond the psychological form of me, the content of my mind that I identify with, and the physical temporary vehicle? How can I know that beyond doubt?

And this is what this gathering is about, knowing yourself at the deepest level. There are two levels here of teaching, if you can call it that, it's not teaching because I'm not adding anything to your mind. There are two levels to our being together here, the words and the energy field out of which the words arise.

One could say the words, they all point us to that, nothing else, not meant to be explanations so that you understand the universe more completely. That wouldn't free you. And whatever thought you could add to your mind would only be one further fragment, a further perspective, never the complete truth.

All thought is a fragment and a perspective. So not to get attached to anything that you hear and believe that it in itself contains the truth, it is only a signpost or a perspective, it's never it. So don't expect too much from the words.

The mind expects too much and says, please define further, you haven't quite defined yet. And you go into further and further differentiation, which is very satisfying to the mind, but I won't give you that. We will keep it very simple.

It is helpful as you sit here to allow the words to be there, but pay some attention to the gaps between the words, brief silences, an undercurrent out of which the words come. Just acknowledge that, not through thought, but through the simple act of being attentive to that. And what is that?

One could say being attentive to nothing, the nothing that underlies the things, the words. Pay attention to that. In other words, that requires you to be in a certain state of alertness, relaxed alertness as you sit here.

Because only if there's this relaxed alertness can you be attentive to the underlying stillness. And you may notice if you are attentive to that, it's only through the stillness in yourself that you can become aware of that underlying field. And here we're already getting to the essence before I've explained anything.

The essence of this gathering is here every minute. I'm not building up to the climax, the final explanation that you're going to receive at the end tomorrow evening. It's already, the essence is contained here every moment.

So, as you sit here, see if you can pay attention to that and observe what happens within yourself as you pay as much attention to the words as the gaps. The moment you pay attention to a gap, there's a gap in your own thought stream because it's only that that can be aware of the stillness. And there already is arising that in you that is not conditioned.

It's the possibility is there every moment for that to arise. We are going to see here the absurdity of looking to the future for an answer to that question, who am I? So, what this is about is that state of consciousness in which you know yourself to be the unconditioned, pure consciousness, not anything that forms the content of your mind.

And to sit here is a little bit frustrating for the thinking mind because our gathering is not thought-based and is not meant to add to the accumulated content of your mind. There's enough there already in everyone. More than enough knowledge, more than enough noise.

Now, you may have noticed a characteristic of human beings, and that is that they live with a continuous stream of thoughts that move through their minds. Very rarely in normal existence do you encounter a gap in that continuous stream of thinking. And that is the only species humans have that characteristic.

Flowers don't have that problem because it becomes a problem for most people. Animals don't. So when you look at the world of nature, there's often a very surprising contrast between the insanity to a large extent of the human condition and the sanity that is there in an animal or in a tree, the rootedness in being, being completely itself.

Every animal is still rooted in that. Very few humans are themselves. They are an image of themselves, mind-created, associated with a continuous stream of thinking, the accumulated content of the mind that humans identify with, which means derive their sense of self from their thought processes.

So the beginning of not knowing who you are is when you think you start to learn who you are. You're being taught your name, certain sequence of sounds the child is taught, and their parents say, that's you, you are. Oh, first identification comes with a thought, which is the name, as me.

And now to that primordial thought, but other, many other thoughts will cling to that me that ultimately is just a thought. It then collects experiences that stick to it. Knowledge, viewpoints, opinions, all kinds of personal and collective conditioning, your surrounding culture, other thoughts come in there, other forms of mental conditioning.

And finally, institutions do it to you. They add to it very strongly. And then you emerge triumphantly, having graduated from university, thinking you know who you are.

And then society gives you a particular function. And that becomes you, again, a mind image no more. And that becomes your sense of self.

Whether it's a work, family, relationship, mother, father, brother, this, that, you play a role. The surrounding culture tells you who you are. You accept it or you react against it, which is another form of conditioning.

And so what you have then is basically a mental story that is who you think you are. Me and my story, me and my past. And you need to, the compulsion to think, which is in every human being, which is so normal that nobody even questions it, derives from the fact that you derive your sense of self from thought.

So to stop thinking would be threatening to that sense of self that is derived from thought. That me, the little me, as I sometimes call it. My story, the script in my mind that has been put in there.

And this is the limit of self-knowledge for most people. And even that they don't know much about. It just operates through them.

They are forced to act out their conditioning. They go through their lifetime simply acting out the conditioning of their minds. And that is what all the great teachers recognized as a fiction.

That is what the Buddha simply called the self. Not the self, there's another self that is the unconditioned. But in Buddhist terminology, that is the false self that the Buddha recognized as an illusory entity.

So here we have a sense of identity that is derived from the accumulated content of my mind, me. Now, what kind of a sense of self is that? Is it satisfying?

Is it at ease? Very rarely. Is it happy, in a state of joy?

Very rarely. There are brief interludes in that sense of self when you feel, you know, things are going fine. They never last for very long.

Problems arise continuously. Conflict situations arise continuously. In other words, that sense of self is not satisfying, not fulfilling, underlying that sense of identity there is a great sense of insufficiency, of lack, of not enough, of not being fully myself yet, of not having arrived yet.

Unease, something missing, something vital missing, and many people are not conscious of that directly, it only expresses itself through them as a continuous compulsion to seek self-completion through adding more content to me in order to make myself complete. So there is the search, the compulsive search in that state of consciousness for more in order to find that fulfillment, that sense of being fully, truly myself. The strange fact then is that that sense of self that is mind-based in no human being feels complete, feels fulfilled for long.

All you can get is brief moments of the illusion of fulfillment, the illusion of having arrived when you've just added something to your sense of self, just, you've just added it. A good example of that is you win a lot of money suddenly, you add all that, surely with 10 million dollars, I'm free now, surely. And for a little while, you feel complete.

And then very soon you realize that didn't complete me either. The same problems that I had in my life now become magnified in a bigger mansion rather than in a little house. I experience the same problems again, the same relationships.

And then you add a possession. For a moment, you drive a big car and your sense of self has expanded into the car. And you feel, oh, it's fulfilling.

Other people admire the car, which means you, they admire you, because the self has flown into that. You might try a big house, so the sense of self gets even bigger, flows into that, me. Surely now I have arrived with a mansion.

And sooner or later, the same sense of lack or dissatisfaction comes in again. And there you sit in the big house. It wasn't quite, maybe it's not big enough.

Others have similar big houses. I need to see if I, or maybe it's something, relationship. I could add that there must be a man or woman here on this planet that is destined to complete me.

And so you start looking for the one or whoever who is going to complete, to fulfill that longing, the ache for being fully yourself. So everybody, you're engaged in looking for yourself through this, that attempting to add more content to the mind, because it's the mental image that does it. It's not the car.

The car is there, but it's the mental image that you have of me and my car. The house is there, but it's the mental image of me and my house. And so you meet someone, you fall in love.

And again, a brief moment of feeling, yes, that's it. I'm free. And a few weeks, months, maybe a year.

Unlikely, but later. The first doubt creeps in, was that the right person? Is he or she going to complete?

It doesn't seem to be working that well anymore. You signed a contract. Why don't you do what you're supposed to do?

Make me feel complete. And no human being can do that. No situation can do that.

Nothing can do that. So the search continues. The compulsion to reach out.

Now, where do you reach when you need to add more to me in the search for finding yourself? You're reaching out to the future continuously, because it's only the little me says, yes, you're not enough yet, haven't arrived yet, but you have future, enough. You have enough future left to make it.

So the overriding concern of that sense of self is now with future. On all levels, the next moment, if you are trapped in that illusory sense of self, which still almost everybody is, the next moment is always regarded as more important. And this one.

So there is a continuous, and this is so normal, nobody even notices it, is that reaching out, must get there, the next, should just, that continuous pull of that mental projection that is future. The whole civilization is built on that. Everybody is rushing towards future in the big cities of the world.

Seeking myself ultimately. Completion, knowing myself fully, through this, that, or that. And then you realize the dissatisfaction.

You're not arriving. And then you become a spiritual seeker. And you begin to seek for completion of your sense of self through adding something in a more subtle realm of spirituality and experience.

You begin to project a state, to be achieved. And this is the danger when you come and listen to talks like this one. Because the speaker might say, speak of the possibility of the transformation of human consciousness, a state that is liberated from conditioning.

And then the little mind, the me, the mind-based self comes in and says, this is what I've been looking for all my life. This is good. Now, just tell me how to get there.

Tell me what steps I need to take to get there. In other words, the little me is asking to be given more future to complete itself. So the same mindset still operates in many spiritual seekers.

They don't realize that they are still under the compulsion to move into the future and grasping at a mental projection that is there. So you need to watch that in yourself, that continuous movement towards the next moment. The psychological need for future to complete me.

This is how the egoic self attempts to arrive to make it so that the story of me becomes complete. So you're looking for that and you're making even spiritual search into an attempt to add something to me. And after 20 years or 30 years, you become frustrated there too and say, I've been engaged in spiritual seeking and still haven't arrived.

Again, many times, perhaps an experience came and it was good and then it was just another experience. And then you're ready to listen. To listen to this message.

Everybody needs time, paradoxically, to listen to this message. And the message is, you do not need time to know yourself, to be free, to enter the transformed state of consciousness. How does that work?

Is that another belief? You can then go home and say, I believe what he said, I'm enlightened already. I don't need time.

And for a little while, that illusion, you can hold that illusion and sooner or later, probably sooner, life will show you that no, suffering arises again. How do we realize this truth directly here and now? You need to look at the main characteristic of the egoic self, how it avoids this truth continuously.

And the main characteristic of that mind-made sense of self is that it lives in a state of continuous denial and resistance of the present moment, of now. Because it is under the delusion that only through future can it fulfill itself and get the more that it needs to add to itself. So it's not interested in this moment ever because this moment is not offering the more.

This moment, in fact, more often than not is a limitation. It's not giving you the more that you think you need for self-completion. So you look to the future and you attempt to get away from this moment because it is regarded as an obstacle to your self-completion.

And this is unconscious, but if you look, you can see how most of the time that mind conditioning is operating, that the present moment is regarded as an obstacle that I need to get beyond. It works on all levels, the smallest level, even when you're just busy doing something. The present moment is always an obstacle because you want to be doing, get ready, get to the end of that doing.

It's on all levels, on all scales. So an essential aspect of that false sense of self is it has a hostile relationship with now. Now, since the now is all there is, which that egoic self doesn't know, it's a conceptualized sense of identity that only lives through past and future.

It ignores the vital fact that all there ever is in your life is now. Your life is never not now. Everything now is inseparable from life or from being.

It never was not now. It will never not be now. And to the mind-made self, the now is an enemy.

It makes life, the only place where life can be, it makes that into something that internally it resists, denies, reduces to a means, to an end, and runs away from continuously. If that is not the essence of dysfunction, what is? And so, of course, when you look at human history, you can see if humans produced this madness that is human history, there must be a deep fundamental dysfunction in the human mind.

There must be a deep current of madness to produce the madness that is human history. And so, all teachings have seen the truth that deep dysfunction of the human mind and called it suffering, Buddha, wherever you go, you find suffering because you're carrying the structure of suffering in your mind. It is the essence of suffering to deny the now, to live not in alignment with all there is, which is now, is the essence of suffering.

You could call it illusion, you can call it sin, you can call it unconsciousness. They've all pointed to that as a fundamental dysfunction and they also all pointed to the way beyond it. Now, the way beyond it, to which all teachings and teachers point, has been incorporated by the dysfunctional mind in order to add to the content and make it into belief structures that I can identify with and make myself feel bigger through the identification.

Instead of using these beautiful signposts, you've identified with the signposts, started to believe in the signposts or worship the signposts or collected signposts, comparative study of signposts. All you need is one. How does this pose, this says Rome and that says Rome.

How does the, hmm, well, and then you have egoic identification with our belief structure and yours because the further madness of the egoic sense of self, it loves to be in conflict with something or someone because conflict defines its limited sense of self, it strengthens the sense of me, which is always looking to enhance itself and protect itself because it's so insubstantial, that illusion. So the illusion not only lives in a state of hostility towards now, it lives in a state of needing conflict in order to make itself feel stronger. If I have an enemy in the form of a situation or a person, I feel more strongly who I am.

And this is, the main enemy of that sense of self is the now. So you can see built into the structure of the human mind is that which it is always trying to run away from, the sense of lack, of not enough, of conflict. It needs that to keep itself going.

So it may be personal or it may be collective. This is how, if you derive your sense from a collective egoic identification such as nation or religion, you can see how they need their enemies to define more strongly who they are through the enemy gives you a stronger sense of us or me. So the little egoic me says, I'm looking for peace, I'm looking for liberation, I'm looking for happiness.

But in reality, it doesn't want that. It couldn't tolerate peace for very long. It's looking for the problem.

It's looking for conflict to enhance itself. It's looking to be right, which requires somebody else to be wrong. It's looking to diminish some other being out there because in its delusion, it feels that if I can diminish that person, I'm all myself.

And so that self that you walk around with is that conceptualized self in the head with emotions that accompany it. That is the essence of limitation of not knowing who you are. How do we step out of so many thousands of years of conditioning?

How do we become free? Now we've said the possibility of the transformation of consciousness is here now. How can that be true?

If every human being carries all that conditioning within. Now the good news is this transformation of human consciousness goes beyond the personal, goes beyond, it is, one could say, a planetary or cosmic event. And it wants to happen.

For the first time, it wants to happen urgently. Because if the old conditioned mind, egoic mind, lives on this planet, controls, dominates this planet for another 100 years, it would be the end of the planet and the human race. All we would see is a increasing acceleration of madness and dysfunction and increasing destruction of the planet and of the environment.

Increasing madness and conflict with ever greater powers of destruction through science and technology, which to a large extent simply amplify the dysfunction that is already there. So for the first time on this planet, that transformed state of consciousness wants to emerge through humans, through the human form. The flowering of human consciousness wants to happen now.

In the past, a few flowers appeared here and there, rare flowers, the Buddha, Jesus, ancient sages of India, here and there. Never on any large scale. Now for the first time, that possibility is there because there's no way out anymore.

We are running out of time, and that's the good news. The fact that the planet and humanity is running out of time. The one thing that the egoic mind wants and needs, the worst thing that could happen to it, to any egoic entity, would you tell them, you have no more time, and it happens to some people when they go to the doctor.

Only half a year, and surely that is not enough to complete myself, this is awful. Only half a year left, some people are told that. And it is dreadful news to the egoic self to be told you have no more time.

And here on the planet now, it is a fact that we are running out of time, and that is not bad news, but good news. Because that transformed state of consciousness does not happen through time or through future. There is now the possibility, because it is already emerging in and through human beings, millions potentially are now able to undergo that transformation of consciousness.

And only one little thing is required for that to happen, and you can't, future is of no use for that. There's one little thing that is required for that to happen within you now. And that little thing is to welcome the now instead of resisting it internally, running away from it, or reducing to a means to an end, to actually make the now the central focus of your life and internally align yourself with it, which is the end of the entire mind-made, fiction-based, story-based, conditioned sense of self, because it can only keep itself going through resistance, through making the now into an enemy, reducing it to a means to an end.

The transformation of consciousness happens the moment you enter into a friendly relationship with the present moment. And that is, again, many egoic entities say, no, this is not what I want to do. This is not good advice.

I have no desire to enter into a friendly relationship with this moment because I don't like it. More often than not, more often than not, this isn't what you want to be happening. Much more often than not, this moment is not what you want.

And you can see in your own life, it's hard to put a percentage to it, how often the moment is not what you wanted, and you say, well, I never wanted this. And this is the egoic self therefore says, okay, I need to get out of here fast, out of this now that limits me so much, that gives me all this that I never asked for. Get me out of here.

And so running towards the future again in the hope that the next moment is going to be better. But when it comes, oh, it's this now again. This isn't what I want.

You run away again internally. And this is such a, every human who is trapped in that madness. But so the little egoic entity is saying, this is not good advice.

You're telling me to become friendly with this place that I don't want to be in. And so when I do that, I will be stuck in this moment that I don't want to be in forever. Of course, that is a delusion.

If you run away internally from now, you get stuck in the unsatisfying now forever. Forever. No matter where you go, you will find some form of limitation very soon.

Some form of dissatisfaction again. And then, oh no, that wasn't it. I'm going to look for a better moment.

Maybe then I can accept and say yes and become friendly. I wait until the story of me has improved. Better conditions, better relationship, better surroundings.

When I make it and when the story of me has completed itself, then I will become friendly with the now. However, the story of me never completes itself. And the time of becoming friendly with now never arrives when you're waiting for that.

Oh, so are we then saying that the very place, the very limitation that appears in front of you in this moment, that you should become friendly with that and not do anything about it or not try to change the situation? No. You do what you have to do.

If you fall into the water, you don't say, okay, this is where I am. I will make no attempt to get out. I accept this now.

Acceptance doesn't mean that action doesn't happen anymore. Action happens, but it doesn't arise out of dissatisfaction anymore. It arises out of a different state of consciousness and very effective action happens when you don't resist the now.

And immediately action arises, but no longer through the conditioned entity of me, no longer conditioned action, but action spontaneous that arises out of the unconditioned intelligence out of which the whole universe has come that expresses itself, manifests as this universe in form. That can then act through you. Very effective action.

But before that can happen, you need to open the portal and you open this portal into now simply by allowing this moment to be as it is. Which the egoic entity cannot do. At that moment, a vastness opens up within yourself through the yes to what is.

And you realize the futility even madness of arguing with is. How can you argue with something that already is? This moment, the suchness of it is as it is.

It always is as it is. So why not align yourself with that suchness instead of resisting it? Yes, but it's limiting me.

I'm in a prison cell, for example. My body isn't doing well. I find it hard to move.

I have so many limitations on my life. And how can I? Of course, not all of you, most of you are not in prison cells, although there may be some who are listening to tapes as they are, who are in prison cells.

But you will have other limitations in your life. There's no human being that does not. To have a body, to be this form is already limitation.

Every form is limited. Every form is limitation. So what we are speaking of when we say to accept internally, completely, the suchness of this moment.

When we speak of that, what we are saying is to accept the form that appears in this moment, the condition of this moment, the person that's in front of you at this moment, the place you find yourself in at this moment, just this moment. Not a conceptual identity that you accept, not to say, okay, here I am working as, in this boring job in a factory for 12 hours a day, I might as well accept, I have to accept it, that I am a poorly paid worker. No, no, that's a condition.

It's a conceptual identity in the head. It's an egoic story. The story that I am such and such is a conceptualized sense of self, the very stuff out of which the egoic entity is made.

All you accept is this moment, not some situation, some storyline in the head. That could be called resignation, which has nothing to do with what we are talking about. Resignation is, I might as well accept that I am poor and I live in this dreadful place.

That's my lot in this life. Okay, no, no, you're just strengthening your mind-made sense of self. It doesn't mind whether it's positive or negative.

If you can have a sense of self that tells you, I'm so miserable, in fact, more miserable than most humans, that works quite well too, to give you an illusory identity, a conceptualized me. We're not talking of this at all, resignation or anything like that. No, acceptance of this moment.

So the same person that said, okay, I might as well accept that I'm in this prison for the next 20 years and there's nothing. No, just here, I'm sitting on this chair, breathing. There are walls, there's a wall there, a wall there, a wall there, and another one there with a little window.

And there's the floor. And there's a little mat on which I sleep. And there's a bucket of water.

And there's a certain feeling of emptiness in my stomach. And this breathing is happening. This is this moment.

This is how it is at this moment. And I say yes to this moment as it is. It is any form that this moment takes.

And more often than not, it is some form of limitation, perceived as some form of limitation on your life because it's form, that you accept the very limitation. I'm not saying you can't take action. We've seen already, action can arise, but in the meantime, it is as it is.

Even while I take action, I've fallen into the water, but I'm in it now. Then action happens and I'm totally in that. No inner resistance.

Enormous power suddenly flows in that couldn't flow in when you were trapped in an egoic little entity. There's no, you've tied yourself into a knot. In the totality of existence, which could be a beautiful part of that, there's this little egoic knot in the fabric of existence.

And the little knot says, me, me. And what is happening here? We untie the knot.

That's all. So you single out this moment. Give it attention.

Look at it. Looking literally, but metaphorically in a wider sense, give this moment in whichever form it appears complete attention without needing to label it because any labeling, which is mentally called attention, calling it this or that, is associated with the story of me. The story of me seeks to somehow find a label for this situation that either it goes well with the story or it doesn't fit into the story.

But in either case, it will label it as great, good, I'll have that. Or in many cases, no, this is not what I wanted, but it's called this, it's called that, it's interpreted, it's labeled. And it's not faced.

You face this moment in whatever form it appears completely by giving it full attention. Looking at it, just looking, not analyzing, not interpreting, not labeling, not making some further storyline out of it or try to figure out how this fits into the story of me. You simply give it your full attention.

Oh, oh, you can only do that if you have said yes to it, that the portal is now open, that yes to the form that this moment takes opens the portal, so to speak. And suddenly, what comes through this portal is unconditioned intelligence itself. And through that, you look, not necessarily through the eyes, you give attention to the form of this moment.

That attention is not thought. Thought may come at some later stage when suddenly a realization arises of what you have to do, and you do it. And often, realizations come, but first, there is the ability to give your complete attention to this now, to this, the form that this now takes.

And that is an enormous thing. That attention that you give has nothing to do with the story of me. It has nothing to do with whether this story of me, my life situation, my life circumstances, regardless of where you are in your life situation, there may be, you may be in an up or in a down because they fluctuate, gain and loss.

You may be in a palace, you may be in prison. You may be sitting in a Mercedes, or you may be sitting on a crowded bus. Regardless, there's nothing to do with this ability to give attention, which a prerequisite for that is to welcome this moment, the form it takes, even if it is a limitation.

And then you realize that the now, that there is more to the now than you could ever have suspected. And you may begin to realize the form that this moment takes changes continuously. But the form that this moment takes, the now, is not the now.

The now is deeper than the form that this moment takes. It is the form as which it appears. Most people don't know that.

They think that each day and each hour consists of many moments. But that's not true because there's only the now. It's always now.

But they think there are many nows because the appearance, the form that it takes changes continuously. So your present now is you're sitting here listening to these words. Then the now, when you're at home, the now will be you're sitting in a different environment, different form, different humans.

But it's still now. It's always now. So by surrendering to the form of now, you go beyond form.

This is the opposite of the way in which the conditioned egoic entity lives. Continuous opposition to now. So you surrender, yes, surrender, to the very limitation that appears in this now.

Surrender simply means you don't offer inner resistance to it. Yes, it is as it is, no arguing with that. If you resist the form that this moment takes internally, through the resistance, you strengthen your own form identity, the psychological form of now.

Me. Every time you resist or deny or run away from now, there's a contraction. And most people live continuously in that state of unease and inner contraction because they are fighting.

They are against it, this now. This, isn't it? So, and that strengthens the illusory sense of self, which is your form identity, the mental psychological form of me.

So you react to a form, a situation, a place, a person, whatever appears in the now. Something goes wrong, it tends to happen a lot, so to speak, what's wrong, the mind says, wrong, wrong. It's not wrong, it is as it is.

And now, through non-resisting this form, that which is beyond form within yourself arises through the simple act of, yes, of surrender, of unconditional acceptance and giving it what flows then through this portal that has just opened up is a field, a current of aware presence. And that current of aware presence looks, is the attention that flows out, is the unconditioned intelligence. And this is the, any situation that you look at in this way and face completely will be immediately dealt with by the unconditioned intelligence.

And it happens that the going mind has struggled against for a lifetime, or a hundred lifetimes, and it didn't change. And suddenly, as the unconditioned intelligence operates, immediately the situation changes. And that change comes about sometimes through spontaneous action that then happens through you, right, totally right action for that moment.

Or it comes through a sudden realization that comes, takes then the form of thought, but it came out of that state, and then it comes in the form of a thought of, oh, this is what I have to do. Or it comes as an external factor coming from you don't know where that suddenly does something to that situation. Because you're now connected with the totality, the one consciousness.

You're no longer a little knot. So it cannot flow very well through a knot. The current of life cannot very easily flow through a knot.

It's trying to, oh, I have to get through. So, of course, there's a little bit of intelligence coming through the human mind, but it's hard work and it's effort because there's an egoic knot there and life is a struggle and you have to somehow make it. And then you untie the knot.

So it's the transformation. The essence of it is of such simplicity that the egoic mind, the story-based entity of me, says, this can't be it. I don't want to listen to this.

Let's think about your problems, how to solve them. It doesn't want to listen to this. If I gave it a complicated series of exercises and practices that in 10 years' time you can become good at and in 20 years' time will take you beyond your conditioning, then the little egoic entity would be very happy and go home from here and say, no, I've really got something.

He even handed out a folder and it lists the 20 steps I need to take, which would take me 20 years, but it's worth it. I can finally complete myself. Great, I've got more time.

But unfortunately, it's not getting there here. To see the simplicity of ending and entering what we could call the surrendered state of consciousness, unconditional, unconditional acceptance of whatever form this moment, the now, takes, then it no longer matters what form it takes. That will change quickly anyway, but you don't need it to change anymore.

So we asked the question initially, the only true question, who am I beyond that conditioned entity that I think of as myself that only consists of accumulated thoughts that I identify with as me? Who am I beyond that accumulation of thoughts? And now, the thought-based entity would like to have an answer that it can add to the accumulated content and take home.

Oh, he told us, he told me who I am. So you can add that, okay, now I've got the one big chunk of content that I've been waiting for and can add that to my mind. But of course, it doesn't work like that because who you are beyond thought, beyond mind, cannot be found in the realm of content.

And it is precisely here, as we surrender to the suchness of this moment, that that which is beyond form, because all thought is also form, that which is beyond form, that which is the essence of who you are, arises as, one could say, but be careful with any word that I give you, only a little pointer, a current of aware presence, which is very still, completely still, and totally alert and conscious.

And now you can look that it is that which then looks, works, flows through this form. Yes, it is a stillness and far more than that Yes, it is alive, vibrantly alive, and very still. It is, as it is sometimes called in teachings that have arisen in this country, they have sometimes called it the self.

Not to be confused, here be words, not to be confused with the false self that the Buddha recognized as an illusion, that is the story-based, mind-based entity, but the deeper, the one self. And it is there where you are one with the one. And it is there where you are one with the source, one with it, the source of all life.

And yes, there is deep peace, but vibrantly alive peace in the record. Of that oneness, and you have always already been it. You have always already been saved.

One could say it has happened already. You just didn't know it. And there was a dream-like state of delusion.

There is nothing that needs to happen to you because it's happened already. And how could you look for that in the future, which doesn't even exist? Looking for yourself in some mental abstraction.

So in that deeper sense, of course, you may have heard certain teachers say, you're already enlightened, you're already free. It's true. It's true.

But not as a belief. Don't make it into mental content, then it's another illusion. So the surrendered state is that state of consciousness that is now arising.

Maybe not all at once. Yes, it can only arise now. The saying yes is the saying yes to now.

But the momentum that is there, that comes from ages and ages of human collective conditioning, the wake-up call, a cell phone, waking up is what this is, of course. It is the awakening in which you realize that you have been immersed in a dream-like state, which is the state of self-identification with the stream of thinking and the emotions that accompany it. Your self was in that.

In every little thought, there's a sense of me, me, me. In other words, continuous rounds of incarnations. Incarnation, I'm using that in a slightly different sense from the conventional sense.

Whenever you identify with any content, thought, you reincarnate into that thought because your sense of self is now in it. So you reincarnate. That means finding your sense of seeking, your sense of self in a form.

And each time you seek your sense of self in a form, you reincarnate into that form. So people ask me, do you believe in reincarnation? Is there such a thing as reincarnation?

And I say, yes, every minute. Every minute you reincarnate. It is definitely a fact.

And that continuous compulsion to reincarnate into identification with form is the essence of delusion, is the essence of that dreamlike, trance-like state that is normal human consciousness or unconsciousness. It's identification with that. And so, and suddenly you hear the wake up call and the portal opens into now.

And now the now is not resisted, interpreted, labeled. It is as it is. The whole compulsion that is behind thought comes to an end with that act of surrender.

Compulsive thinking is connected with resistance, resisting what is that keeps it going. And then thinking is not a problem anymore because your self isn't in it. Your sense of thought still arise occasionally.

And they're recognized as thoughts, mind movement, wave movements. Within that spaciousness that is presence, that is the current of awareness that flows through you, the wonderful, spacious peace and stillness. And within that occasionally waves, wave movements, ripples come, thoughts, emotions.

Fine, not problematic anymore because you don't reincarnate into them anymore. You now know who you are, not as a new label. You know yourself as the awareness, the spaciousness, the stillness.

Of course, you are never not it. No matter how mad a human being looks on the surface, how mad, and mad means, the more you are totally identified with that, the more mad you become. And no matter how mad a human being looks, underneath all that noise and turmoil is always the spaciousness.

And it can sometimes be touched when that flows through you, through the acceptance of what is, that current, sometimes, and quite often, that pierces through layers of mind, and mental conditioning in the other human being, and awakens that stillness and spaciousness. It calls it forth. To some extent, this happens in this gathering, which is more than the words.

It is, one could say, an energy phenomenon. You know? So that spaciousness has this power to awaken it in others, and that is an act of suddenly, and at first you think you're seeing something in this other person, and you don't know what it is.

It feels good to be in the presence of that person, but it's nothing to do with the form of that person. It's because you recognize your own essence there. But that is already the awakening of it, because it's only because it's awakened from underneath layers of conditioning that this recognition can be there.

So you always come to a teacher, not to meet the teacher. Who would want to meet another, what for? You come to a teacher to meet yourself.

Just a reflection of the unconditioned state that you are a teacher just happens to be, have become transparent through complete surrender. The self, the entity has become transparent, and this is happening to you also. This is just one way of putting it.

You become open, transparent to that, and you become an opening. And so suddenly, you know who you are and who you always have been. And you couldn't even call it anything.

I'm attempting to put some words there to use as pointers, but they're all inadequate. Now, this is important to realize. From the point of view of the interpreting, accumulating, labeling mind, from that perspective, as you enter this state of pure aware presence, which is to a large extent free of thought.

Thoughts can drift in and out, but they become insubstantial. And that state of such complete presence through which you look, it is attention itself. To the mind, which only knows labels and judgments, that is a state of ignorance.

It misinterprets that. It doesn't recognize it and says, but I don't know anything anymore. It says, I don't even know who I am anymore.

But it is not a state of ignorance only from the ignorant viewpoint of the limited conditioned mind is that a state of ignorance. It is, in fact, a state of true intelligence. But the limited mind doesn't know that.

This is important to point out because otherwise the mind may trick you by throwing up certain thoughts and saying, don't go there, you become stupid. We can't, you won't know what's going on anymore if you don't interpret it and call it something and categorize it and see where it fits into this or that, the story of me. If you don't figure out what this is, you won't, you'll be lost.

The opposite, of course, is true. You've been lost for lifetimes. So, but be careful with the little thoughts that come up, the mind throws up and suddenly you believe in a thought again that comes up through the mind.

Oh, and the thought might be saying, oh no, don't go there. Here you've worked so hard at judging and interpreting and you've worked hard at it for 50 years. Now to give all that up, don't do that.

I've invested so much. And then you recognize it as a thought. And increasingly, as the aware presence arises, there is the ability in you to recognize thought as thought without getting drawn into each thought and each thought.

And completely believing and thinking that some thought can actually give you the truth. And then you get lost into a little perspective, which every thought is, one tiny perspective on something. And you believe that this tiny little perspective is the truth.

And then you identify with this tiny little perspective and say, this is my, this is how it is. Let me tell you how it is. And then you give your judgments and interpretations.

So you're completely lost, totally reincarnated into a tiny viewpoint of a mental position, not realizing the truth is so vast. You could express the opposite mental position, which would also be true. And then another one, which would also be true.

And the truth is only if you contain, able to contain all mental positions without saying there's the truth. It's not in any one. And even spiritual discourse, there is not one statement that you can make that contains the entire truth.

It's just a perspective on it. And then you have to look at the abilities there then to hold in that vastness, all possible perspectives, allow them to be. And you can say, this is one that's quite nice, this perspective.

And then you look, oh, that one is also true. All thought is just a fragment, it's form, it's limited. So you don't get lost in thought anymore.

So it's no longer a problem, then thought is quite nice. It's no longer a troublemaker. But the thought that you identify with is troublemaking.

You know some people when they, you meet them in the morning at breakfast table, and when they come to you and say, well, you know, I've been thinking. You know there's going to be trouble. It's some problem that they dwelled on during the night.

I've been thinking, oh. So if we make it here, in another day called tomorrow, perhaps we will, we will meet again in this field that is the eternal now. And in the meantime, there will be ample practice, opportunity for you to practice alignment with what is.

For many Western travelers who come to India, that is, some of them learn a deep lesson here, especially in India, if you're not aligned with what is, you'll be very unhappy. It's true anywhere, but especially true here. And maybe that is the simple reason why this country has produced more liberated beings than any other.

Thank you. No session, no talk is complete without the wake up call of cell phones. Have a look inside yourself and see if you're waiting for me to speak.

Perhaps even some impatience arising. Irritation. Or your mind is taking you to some completely different place and time.

Tonight, later, tomorrow. We saw last night that in the normal human state of consciousness or unconsciousness, there is a very deep, deep seated need, psychological need for the next moment, for future that's always there. Everybody is waiting for something.

It's the next moment or some point in the future. That is an intrinsic part of the normal human consciousness, which is identification with the stream of thinking, which is inhabiting a conceptualized reality, a conceptualized sense of self in the head, consisting of thought movement, a conceptualized sense of self, story-based, mind-based, past-based. And that conceptualized sense of self inhabits a conceptual reality because everything is then being perceived through the conditioning of that accumulated, the accumulated conditioning of the mind.

Whatever you perceive is perceived through that and is conceptualized through the compulsive, automatic, mechanical labeling of every experience and sense perception that happens every moment. And through the automatic mechanical labeling process, a veil appears between you and that which is being perceived, between you and the other human being. It becomes deadened through the continuous mental label-making, continuous judgments.

And it's mechanical, it's automatic. Very few people on the planet are even aware of it as yet. Something else is arising powerfully, but as yet, very few human beings are even aware of this mechanical process because they are totally identified with that mechanical, compulsive, automatic process.

And that is the essence of unconsciousness. You are lost in a world of content and your sense of self is in there. Then everything you perceive is perceived through that sense of self that is mental, mentalized, conceptualized.

And then whatever happens to you, every experience, every encounter, every perception, every place that you go to is seen through that filter of that ultimately fictitious, false me, sense of self, that adopts a personalized position, a reactive position towards whatever happens. And it interprets it according to that deep-seated conditioning. And so life becomes very problematic because nothing is seen clearly.

Nothing is simple. Everything is complex, conflict-ridden, and problematic through the labeling process. And that is the self, the mind-made self.

That is the egoic entity, the me, the little me. And as we saw yesterday, never at ease, except very brief moments, for a little while, never sensing a sense of completeness, a true deep aliveness, rootedness, free of fear. Fear is an inevitable companion of that state of unconsciousness.

And so you're always waiting for completion in the next moment to add something to me. We saw that yesterday. The need, the compulsive need to add more content to me.

So we are stepping out of that. This is why we are here tonight, not to add more to all those identifications, to all that content, but to allow a different state of consciousness to arise that is unconditioned. To step out of a conceptualized sense of self, out of the story of me, to see an infinitely deeper and vaster sense of who you are, that is already there underneath all the mind movements, underneath the story of me with my past and suffering, underneath the grievances that the ego loves so much, underneath the reactivity that the egoic entity thrives on, just looking for the next thing or the next problem. The complaints that it loves.

Complaining makes up a large part of many people's mind movement. If you look into it clearly, how much of that incessant stream of thinking is actually complaining, some form of complaint in your head about this person, this situation, this place, and that movement of carrying grievances, the need to be reactive, adopt a reactive relationship to everything that happens, the complaining, the pattern of continuous complaining and looking for the next thing because it strengthens that never enough sense of me.

And people don't realize it's through complaining mentally or verbally. And I'm not saying complaining to tell somebody, please don't step on my foot. Remove your foot from my foot.

You're not complaining. You're telling somebody to do something about it. That's not complaint.

To say we are using it in another sense here, to tell somebody, please, the soup is cold. I ordered a hot soup. Take it back, please.

It's not a complaint. This is telling somebody to do something about this situation. So we're not talking about you becoming a doormat and let everything happen.

We're talking about a mental, useless, pointless, futile, conditioned movement that thrives on complaining. He shouldn't, they shouldn't, why don't they? This dreadful, if you could see the percentage of your mind activity that is some form of complaint, you would be amazed and there's nothing personal in it.

It is not your personal problem. It's not that, oh, I'm not good enough. I'm always complaining.

It's nothing to do with you. It's the collective human mind. It is a collective mind pattern that the egoic mind-based entity loves because the sense of self through any kind of complaint, and a lot of that happens in people's minds.

They're complaining. They may even be complaining about themselves. Not good enough.

You see, you failed again. You see, you always, mad, mad. And people are so immersed in that, they think all the problems that they are complaining about have an actual reality out there.

And don't realize that every situation is very simple if you don't add all that to it. It is simple. So to watch that need to complain so that it is there so that the egoic entity can feel a little bit stronger.

Why does it feel a little bit stronger in that mind movement? Because whenever you complain about something or someone or a place, you adopt a position of rightness. Me, right.

You, wrong. Because that which you are complaining about is obviously wrong. The complainer, the me, the mind-based entity is obviously right.

That is the essence of every complaint, that I am right and the situation or the place or the person or the condition that I am internally complaining about obviously is wrong. So some people move through life complaining about the world, the God. They have an issue with God.

He should know better. Why does he allow that? If I were running the universe, I would do a better job.

If the universe or the earth or the planet, the world, the question arises, if the world were a reflection of your inner state, what kind of a world would it be? So to watch these deep-seated mind movements and even here it may arise, the mind looking for one thing to complain about so that you don't have to listen to the rest. And then the mind can focus on that one thing, I disagree with that statement.

And for the next hour, you have a mind movement around that disagreement and you're hoping that there'll be an opportunity for you to get up and say, I disagree very strongly with you because it's wrong. What you said is wrong. That's very satisfying.

Like, ah. No, this is easy to do here because in spiritual teaching, spiritual teaching, the purpose of it is not to present a philosophy, a consistent view of the universe, a system of thought with an inner consistency that you can then adopt. One more thing I can identify with and say now this mental edifice, all those explanations, this is now what I believe in.

But a spiritual teaching is not like that. The purpose of the words is not to help you understand the universe. The purpose of the words is simply to point to the state of liberation.

So the words may point to bondage so that the awareness arises of the mental prison that you inhabit. Now that awareness is the arising of freedom. The simple fact of seeing the bondage of identification with the mental noise, continuous mind movement and its reactions and its grievances and its complaints, to see that in oneself is already the arising of something that is beyond that which you see.

The seeing which is the aware presence and this is why we're here is unconditioned. It simply sees. It sees the false.

It sees illusion. This is why as this arises here and all the words are only designed to be pointers to the liberated state of consciousness. But if that liberated state of consciousness were not already arising in you, this is the only reason why you've come here.

Well, except for one or two who got dragged here by somebody else and didn't really want to come. But it's unlikely that they will stay unless suddenly something opens up within them. That's possible too.

But for most of you, you came here by your own free will probably. Yes, it is possible that one or two came for the wrong reasons. Perhaps thinking that this was a lecture on philosophy of playing around with thoughts, finding some new interesting thoughts.

And then perhaps after half an hour or an hour, it won't be satisfying here to sit here anymore and then you would go. And that's fine. You need a little bit more time.

The universe is very patient. This time goes on and on. There's a lot of it.

It doesn't matter. But most of you, if you are able to sit here, it's quite a long evening. The physical body may occasionally move a little bit and it's very hard here.

And yet, if you are able to sit here during all this time, this means already a state of consciousness that is unconditioned is arising. And that is what I am addressing here. This is what is being touched, pulled.

All words are limited. One could say almost it is being pulled out of you. And the first step in this process is the recognition of that which is false, which is identification with all the conditioned thought movements as a me, a self, a story-based entity with a little past and a little future.

A past that didn't go quite the way it should have gone. Oh, and you thought that was your personal problem. It's everybody's.

It didn't go quite, it didn't quite work out the way it was meant to. It wasn't the one I married. It was, I must have made a mistake.

It wasn't, he wasn't the prince that I married. I thought I married. He turned out to be a human.

No story-based me has a totally satisfying story. And many story-based identities are actually unhappy ones, very unhappy ones that tell themselves internally almost continuously their unhappy story in order to revive it. What he did to me and the world did to me and my parents did to me.

Unfairly treated, what God did allowed to happen to me. And so some of these identities are very unhappy ones and the egoic entity loves that also because at least you think you know who you are by repeating the story to yourself mentally. It gives you the illusion that you have an identity and you have an identity of sorts.

It's a storyline, an unhappy one. And you can carry the grievances and the complaints associated with the unhappy story of me. And they keep the sense of self going until you finally are on your deathbed.

And maybe your last breath may still be a complaint. Why did life do that to me? That was my incarnation, my life.

It should never have happened. It was one big mistake. And it's amazing how many people carry a very unhappy identity based on their past.

Hoping vaguely that somehow the future is going to free them and somehow make this unhappy story turn around into a happy one. But how could it? Because your sense of self is now totally wedded to the unhappy story.

Your sense of self lies in the unhappy story. How could it ever turn around? You don't even want it to turn around because your sense of self is the unhappy one.

You feel comfortable with that. Of course it's unconscious. If you made it conscious and looked at it and see that you are actually, you love your unhappy story.

And every story has elements of that. Some stories are very unhappy, but every story has strong elements of that. And then you can see how much there is a refusal to let go of that, mind movements, all those mind movements.

And on the surface, those mind movements might say, maybe my life will get better. You might visit clairvoyance to find out if the story of me is going to improve in the next few years. Is there going to be a change?

And the clairvoyant says, yes, I can see a change coming next year. There is somebody coming into your life. And he or she is going to make you happy.

Everything will turn around. But you carry the unhappy me. And even if that wonderful being should come into your life, you will interact and react through your unhappy story.

And you will make that relationship, you will incorporate that into your unhappy story. And so then you try another clairvoyant, because... So it is amazing the presence that people have constructed for themselves that they inhabit and even are addicted to the pain of that.

Because it's better than not knowing who you are. At least you have an unhappy sense of self better than no sense of self. So every story has strong elements of that.

And to see that even if your story is not totally unhappy, maybe it's half, half. But to see it didn't go the way it was meant to go. But of course you still have future.

It can all work out. It won't, of course. Dissatisfaction, unease, problems, fear, anxiety, they're all built into very structure of that mindset.

It's within the structure of the mindset when you identify with mind movements, when you derive your sense of self from a story. You can never get there on that level of complete your sense of self, find yourself fully, the fullness of life. So, and we are here to see it.

And already you may see it is, you might say, you might think, well, it must be, isn't it very depressing? You are telling us a very depressing story of how our lives are. No, you may detect in yourself a certain recognition it's quite nice to listen to this and you recognize something there and you see it and the seeing is already freeing.

And all the words that arise here, and this is the case with every true spiritual teaching are not to explain the universe and are not even going to be consistent. A philosophical system may be consistent, otherwise it's deficient, but a spiritual teaching, be very suspicious of a spiritual teaching that is totally consistent internally where everything makes absolute sense. It is likely that you are mistaking a philosophical system for a spiritual teaching.

Spiritual teaching in its very nature contains contradictions because the truth of who you are and it only points to that, it points to the false, you begin to see the false, and then it points to that which is beyond the false. But seeing the false is already that movement of the real, who you are beyond that conditioning, to see that is already the arising of that. So the spiritual teaching points to that which really is very hard to talk about and no single thought could capture, encapsulate the truth of who you are and the truth of spiritual liberation.

And it is very tempting for the mind to get hold of one statement and say, this is the truth, and the other statement is not true. But in spiritual teaching, you may hear two contradictory statements and they're both true. For example, last night I said, nothing needs to happen.

Freedom is already here. Underneath the movement of the conditioned mind, there is already in you the vast spaciousness, stillness and depths of the unconditioned. So there's nothing that needs to happen as such and yet in the course of this evening, I may point out certain things that look as if you could do something about it.

For example, I might say, enter the state of surrender to what is this moment. So you want me to do something. What I thought you said, it's not an happening.

There's nothing you need to do. Well, maybe surrender is not a doing at all. It's an allowing.

But it looks, when one speaks of it, as if it were as if you could do something. Many statements, the timeless, we are entering the timeless state of consciousness. It arises because the conditioned state is totally linked to time.

It operates, this conditioned entity, the mind made self operates entirely through past and future. It knows only past and future and the future is a repetition of the past. The redemptive power of now is totally obscured.

The only place of freedom is obscured by that mind movement that is only interested in past and future. But that basically means it is only interested in repeating the past and that is what usually happens. So we are here to step out of that.

All the words only point to the state that is timeless, the state of consciousness that is timeless and we are entering that together. At the moment, I've mostly been speaking of the bad news, but that is important. The bad news, the illusory entity and the suffering that is created by that, we need to see that fully.

That is already the beginning of liberation, but it looks on the surface as if I were talking only about bad news. And if you don't listen from the depths of your being, if you only listen through the story entity, I'm not addressing the story-based entity, but there may be one or two of you here who listen to these words only through the mind-made story-based entity and it will feel insulted by these words. How dare you suggest that my grievances and my complaints are not justified and real?

How dare you say that I have no right to do that? To complain, to suggest it's an illusion. My problems are so, my complaints are so real and I have a right.

This is the entity. And so one or two of you go through this reaction. Who is reacting?

When I point to illusion within yourself and there is a reaction, who is it that is reacting? The illusion. It doesn't like to hear that.

It's a great insult to suggest that perhaps the unhappiness that you carry as part of your sense of self could perhaps be an illusion, an illusory identity that you cling to. But many of you are still sitting here. One or two are going to walk out.

Maybe three or four or five or six, small percentage. That means those words are not reaching the deeper level of your being, are not being received by that. They only hit the conditioned and the conditioned doesn't like what it's hearing because I'm threatening its very survival.

So let's get out of here. And perhaps even shout something as the last triumph of the conditioned entity. It's happened once or twice in meetings.

Absolute nonsense. And the door slams. So the words, perhaps something within you, if you're still here, recognizes, recognizes the truth.

And it actually feels good to see the false as false. You're already no longer totally identified with those mind movements through that seeing. So the pointing to the false and the pointing to the real, which are both part of this teaching, may very well use contradict, seemingly contradictory perspectives.

The timeless state of consciousness. We are entering the unconditioned or timeless state of consciousness is emerging here so that you don't derive your sense of self anymore from the conditioned mind movements, but from that which is beyond time, the still, alert, vibrantly alive presence vast, intelligent, that is there underneath all that. But we have another contradiction here because as we are entering the timeless state of consciousness and we are spending three hours on this time.

And yes, there's a little paradox here, but it's fine. You could say, well, why don't we only need one moment? And we travel deeper into that state, which is another paradox, because to say deeper implies time.

But let's, instead of resolving the paradox, just leave it because it's not an explanation. They're simply pointers. So to see the false in oneself, to observe those mind movements, to recognize that your story, your identity, your sense of self is not the only one that didn't quite work out.

This, you can, sometimes people are under that illusion that other people's stories have worked. None of them works for long. Meet famous people, rich people, go beyond the glossy surface that you see in magazines, talk to them, meet them and see enormous sense of dissatisfaction, black fear, not enough.

So they need more, even more. You could become a great leader, a leader of this country. And then you might think, oh, I finally made it.

My life has now become free of limitation. I'm all powerful. And two years later, you find yourself in prison, if you're lucky, and you have another limitation.

So there's the movement of thought. There's identification with the movement of thought. And there's the arising of the awareness of those thought movements.

And then as the awareness arises, you see a very, we've already pointed to grievances, we've pointed to complaints, we've pointed to repeating the story in your head to reinforce it, we've pointed to perhaps, or maybe we didn't, it's also to repeat your story to other people to reinforce it. Please confirm to me that my problems and my story are real. Listen, and you, oh, yes.

You truly have been treated unfairly by life. You are right that you're feeling sorry for yourself. You're fully sorry for myself, that self feels bigger in that too.

So we've seen many of those very predominant movements associated with living in and through a false sense of self. And now there's one more fundamental one that we need to address. I pointed to it last night, that it needs to obscure the now because it can only function through past and future.

So as we saw last night, if you live through that false sense of self, your relationship with now, which is all there ever is, which means with life, life itself, life and now are inseparable, your relationship with now is predominantly a hostile one, a resisting one, one that denies the now, tries to get away from it, resists it internally, complains about it mentally, or makes it into a stepping stone to the next moment, which the little me in the head says is a more important one because there, it's going to be a little bit better when I arrive there. So the relationship that you have with now, which is the relationship with life, is then one that is problematic of conflict, basically. You are in conflict with now.

You deny now, you resist now, you complain about now, you protect yourself away from now, and now is life. And so you're condemned to living in this abstract reality, never knowing the depths of now, the depths of life, the fullness of life that can only be here in the space of now. The only place where life is, is now.

So you can see the mind movement that seeks to deny that, a very fundamental one. In seeing it, freedom arises. And seeing it is the arising of presence, a state in which the now is not resisted.

And that is the beginning of the collapse of the conditioned egoic entity and the story-based identity. The now is not resisted anymore. You are able, as presence arises, to welcome this moment as it is.

We saw that yesterday as the primordial spiritual practice that requires no time to align yourself with now, to make it your friend, unconditionally say yes, because you see the madness and the futility of saying no to the is-ness of now. To deny is, is to deny the universe, because the form that this now takes could never be otherwise. Because whatever form arises at this moment is totally interconnected with the whole.

It's only through our limited perspective that we think there is an isolated event here that shouldn't have happened. But that seemingly isolated event is simply, there's a web of interconnectedness with the totality of this seeming isolated event. There isn't even an event.

So whatever appears in the now is as it is and could not be otherwise, which doesn't mean that action cannot arise through you to respond to the need or the challenge of now. But the now, the is-ness of now is as it is, the totality has brought it about. So to be not aligned with that is to, you tie yourself into a little knot in the fabric of existence and that little knot says no.

And it claims a separate identity for itself. Me, and here's the rest of this threatening and dreadful universe that seems to conspire against me and put obstacles in my path continuously. But I am going to make it.

Just, I'll show them. And now, here we come now to the essence and then we go even deeper. We saw last night that more often than not, the form that this now takes as an event, a seeming event, a person, a situation, a place, a challenge is only the form of now.

It is not the now. The now is eternal, timeless, spacious, pure consciousness, and it is you. Nothing that takes form is you.

The essence of unconsciousness, the essence of bondage, the essence of suffering is to mistake who you are for some form, thought movements, identification with this and that. But ultimately, it all goes down to identification with thought and emotions that arise together with thought, which are energy forms. And you have to seek yourself in it and seek completion through adding more forms to the content of your mind.

What else can I identify with to make my story better? Or if you're deeply trapped in an unhappy story identity, unconsciously, you're saying, what else can I identify with to add to my bad story? In other words, you're looking for the next bad thing because only a bad thing will fit into a bad storyline.

A good thing doesn't fit into my story anymore if I'm identified with a bad mind-based identity and story. I'm looking for the next bad thing. I don't know that, of course.

I'm saying, I'm looking for happiness. And then you seek exactly the thing that gives you more unhappiness. So form, so it's a search through some added form to find a bit more of myself.

And that is the essence of delusion and bondage and suffering. Because suffering is, whenever you're identified with form, suffering arises because every form is limited. And the limitation of that form, and it's short-lived.

So the two factors that every form is limited, every thought, every physical form, everything in form is limited and, as the Buddha put it, impermanent. In other words, fleeting. And as the Buddha also put it, unsatisfactory.

Beautiful, he saw it, he saw it so clearly. And what did people do? Constructed a huge edifice of philosophy, Buddhist philosophy, the simplicity.

So identification with form is, in the Pali language, I very rarely quote strange foreign words, but it's so beautiful in the Pali language. The essence of human existence in the deluded state is dukkha, anicca, and anatta, suffering, impermanence, not self. You're seeking a self where you cannot find a self.

In form, suffering, it's impermanent, it's not self. Whatever condition you encounter, try to identify with, it brings you suffering, it's not self, it's fleeting. And so you move looking.

It is not only the essence of suffering, this identification with form, it is also the essence of what we could call evil, people doing dreadful things to other human beings or to other life forms on the planet or to the planet itself. And it's identification with form, how does that work? What happened two days ago, not far from here, people burned a train, 58 people were killed, burned to death traveling on a train.

How does that connect with what we are talking about? These people, they belong to two different religions. And each group of people derives their sense of self of me or us, which is a mind-based sense of self from a conceptualized accumulation of certain beliefs that they identify with as me or us.

There are mind movements, belief systems, this gives us our sense of who we are. It's a conceptualized collective identity. And the others have a different conceptualized set.

So they need their enemies to strengthen this very tenuous sense of identity that's never feel strong enough. So they love having enemies to feel more strongly who they are through being able to fight someone else. Strengthens to be able to in a position of rightness because both factions believe that they are right.

They are totally identified with one mental position. Their sense of self is in this form of that mental position. A total inability to see another position and not recognize it is only a position, a mental position, there's no self in it.

But there's the delusion of this, the identity is in it. And so it's easy to kill somebody because you have desensitized yourself to the aliveness of another human being by labeling it. You put a few mental concepts on another human being or group of human beings, whatever that concept may be, you could say, unbeliever.

That label can be enough to justify killing a person. Unbeliever, unbeliever is no longer human being, it's conceptualized. You inhabit a conceptualized universe and as a concept, you can no longer sense what you are doing or you can say American, you no longer, you can say, or the others say Muslim or this or that.

Communists, capitalists, this, that, these are labels you put them on and they've deadened the universe, conceptualized it and then any act of violence is possible because there's only a concept there. This is the essence of prejudice also. In addition, the enormous amount of pain that humans carry inside flows into that delusion and this accounts for the collective human pain.

We may address that this evening also. That accounts for violence, warfare. So this is thousands, thousands, thousands of years of conditioning humanity.

Not knowing who they are, seeking a form identity which is never enough and always reveals itself to be not it, not me. So identification with form, deriving your sense of self from form which means basically mind forms is delusion. Deriving your sense of self from mind movement is delusion.

Now those mind movements and the entity that is based on mind identification continuously reacts. It's part of its complaining. It reacts to the form that this moment takes as not enough, not fulfilling me.

This moment is not fulfilling me. Maybe the next one will. This moment is actually limiting me.

I'm trying to get away from it. The form that arises in this moment is resisted because it's never enough for me. It even is trying to obstruct me.

It limits me and this is how people go through life. Seeking a better now in the future. Seeking a completion of themselves in the future, ignoring this because this seems, looks like an obstacle to completely myself and that is the core of the delusion.

The thing that looks like the greatest obstacle to finding myself is the only doorway into the liberated state. The very thing that people try to deny and get away from and we're complaining about and resisting is actually the doorway into the unconditioned, God, self, the deepest self. How can that be?

How can that be that this seemingly, perhaps in the best of cases, uninteresting now, this now that is an obstacle to where I want to get to, this now that limits me so much because more often than not, it is the case. How could it be that this is the doorway? It looks like a wall.

It looks as if I had to run away from that. And so the secret of human existence is, and for some peculiar reason, it's to a large extent still a secret. Almost nobody talks about it.

Liberation and where to find it. Conspiracy of don't mention it. Liberation, look for it somewhere else.

That's okay, but not where it can be found. How can it be that this seemingly very often unsatisfying present moment now, the form of it, how can that be the doorway and how does it work? The egoic entity loves resisting the form that this now takes because it's never enough.

It doesn't fit into its story and the resisting itself strengthens it. In other words, you resist to a form that arises in the now and strengthen your own mental form of me. You disagree with now, you have an issue with now, you're hostile towards now, so it puts you in a position of rightness and the now in a position of wrongness.

So you have strengthened your mind-created sense of self. That's why it's so satisfying to deny the now. And you can see how mad it is.

When you recognize it, the possibility of freedom comes in. When you recognize that deep-seated, non-personal, collective human mind pattern, when you see it in yourself, in others, there's suddenly the arising of freedom and the unconscious movement collapses because anything that is unconscious when it comes to the light of consciousness and is seen, there's an awareness now of that movement, the compulsive nature of it. When it rises into awareness, or awareness looks at it, so to speak, the unconscious movement loses its power and begins to dissolve.

Unconsciousness, all those automatic processes require your unconsciousness. The complainer, all the things we've been talking about, it's only when you're totally identified with it and you're trapped, when you see it, you're no longer trapped. And now you see this.

And now the possibility comes of reversing and it happens by itself. It's not that you have to do it. A reversal happens so that instead of resisting the now and having a hostile relationship with it, you open yourself to now and welcome it, no matter what form it takes, even if it is a form of limitation, which often it is, even if it looks not very satisfying.

And suddenly, when you not resist the form that appears in this now, that which is beyond form arises within yourself. The form identity is not strengthened anymore through resistance. That which is beyond form within you, the unconditioned consciousness, the light of the divine, whatever point arises in the moment of relinquishing resistance to a form.

How does it arise? Anything that you accept completely, internally, unconditionally, embrace it, no matter what that condition is, takes you into deep peace, vitally alive peace. And you can try it out.

The next thing that irritates you, that you complain about, but suddenly you're aware of that automatic movement and you say, okay, I'll welcome it instead. I've been complaining about the now for 48 years, 50 years. I'm now ready to welcome this, even this.

And all internal resistance drops and you're simply that form of this moment, the condition. And you will notice enormous peace arising, a stillness arises that is not of the mind. And for the first time, that unconditioned intelligence can move through you as a channel which before was obstructed by continuous resistance.

And now the ability arises because you've opened the door, which is the act of surrender to what is, the suchness of this moment. You open the door. That which seemed a limitation is not internally resisted.

And so suddenly the unconditioned intelligence moves through you and is able to simply be, there's a flow of a current of awareness that flows through you, so to speak, and moves into that situation that looked like a limitation, a problematic situation, because most situations are problematic when you are trapped in a reactive mode. And you can simply, suddenly, and it's not you anymore, not the little conditioned entity, but a deeper intelligence can look at the form of this moment, allow it to be totally, and that is the movement of the true intelligence that suddenly flows into that situation. There's no mental labeling or judging anymore.

The allowing, you allow it to be so the mind relinquishes its need to label. The egoic entity that lives in and through labeling subsides at that moment. It may come back, but at this moment it subsides and you allow this, the allowing is the key.

Allowing this moment that opens the portal, then vast intelligence flows through and looks at whatever form this moment takes. But that look is not so much a concentrated beam. It's a vast spaciousness that penetrates that situation and surrounds that situation, a spacious field.

You can sense surrounding the little limitation and that spaciousness around that situation that before the little entity contracted and complained about it and suddenly you allow and you become vast as you sense a space around that seemingly limited situation. And that is the, one could say, I don't use that expression usually, but occasionally new pointers come. Space consciousness arises, not, most humans, all they are ever aware of is objects that arise in their consciousness.

They're aware never of another dimension. All they are aware of is thoughts and not aware of, identified with. They are in a position of, they want to attract or have aversion to objects that arise in their consciousness.

Sense objects, perceptions, so they know nothing else beyond the arising objects, thoughts, emotions, sense perceptions. And now it is all form. And as you allow this moment to be as it is internally, no matter what form it takes, a vast peace and spaciousness opens up.

And for the first time, you know the meaning and not through the labeling mind, know directly what the meaning of the space and the meaning is of consciousness. Because before, you only knew consciousness in its various disguises, appearing as form. But you never knew consciousness itself.

You were looking for yourself in some form of consciousness, thought movements, emotions, experiences. Where am I? Well, how can I have more forms?

And now for the first time, through the act of allowing the form of consciousness of this moment to be as it is internally, that which is beyond form, which is consciousness itself, is known. But it is not known in the same way that you can know an object in consciousness. There you have a subject-object relationship.

I know this flower. Well, I think I do because I have a label for it. And I repeat this label in my mind, and then I think I know what this is.

That's mind knowledge, subject-object knowledge. And so it's not true knowledge. It has its place in this phenomenal world.

But it's useful for certain things, this knowledge which is labeled knowledge, concept knowledge. But there is a deeper knowing. But the essence of that knowing is to know consciousness directly, not as I know it, but knowing it as I am it.

A knowing that is not dualistic, a knowing that is being, knowing yourself as that. Conscious, let me put it in another way. You become conscious of the fact that you are conscious of consciousness itself.

And now when I say that in words, that limits it and distorts it because it immediately creates again a dualistic relationship. Knowing that, the limitation of words, I'll say it again, this is not the truth because the words are limited. But they are a pointer.

They can work as a pointer, not as an explanation. You are conscious of consciousness as an underlying field of presence which is also peace, which is also stillness, which is also vast intelligence, which is also deep aliveness and joy. Very subtle, not what the mind knows as joy, which is some short-lived pleasure.

It is, of course, being itself before it becomes something. Consciousness itself before it becomes a form. Life itself before it becomes a form of life.

So you know yourself as life, not some form that life takes, the one unconditioned, unmanifested life that out of which the entire universe comes, which, of course, is God. If God means anything at its deepest level, that is God, of course. And again, people have been looking for God as a mind object, as if God could appear as an object in consciousness.

Whereas God is the essence of all that appears. Not, it is in, it inhabits it as its essence. Yes.

So you know yourself as that vast spaciousness with the simple act of allowing this moment to be as it is. And that is suddenly, oh. It's the very limitation has become a doorway into the divine.

The very thing that looked like almost the devil putting obstacles in my path becomes an opening. So the form becomes no longer an obstacle to God, but a doorway into God if resistance is relinquished. And of course, that fundamental truth of human existence is expressed and contained beautifully in the Christian image of the cross, which most Christians don't understand in its depths.

They have a superficial interpretation of it. But in its depths, you have Christ on the cross, nailed to the cross, an image of total limitation, the absolute of limitation to be nailed to a cross. And the cross, of course, is the form that limits.

And it is a form that this moment takes. And suddenly, and this is contained in the words of Jesus on the cross, not my will, but thy will be done. Jesus aligns his will with the will of the one.

In other words, resistance to what is is relinquished totally. And now, that dreadful thing, the cross, the torture instrument, the ultimate in limitation becomes a symbol for the divine. Because the cross is both.

It is the symbol of limitation, and it has a dual nature. Symbol of torture, of limitation, and a symbol of the divine. So there is an image here, and you don't need to be a Christian to see it.

In fact, if you are a Christian, you probably don't see it. There is an image here of great depths and enormous wisdom. It tells you that the secret is contained in that image of human life and the possibility of human life.

Because you are the one on the cross. Each human being is that, is Christ on the cross. Facing the limitations, sometimes not away from it.

And then the form and the formless are actually recognized as one. God and the world are also seen as one. God is hiding in each form, in each limitation.

Expressed beautifully in the Buddhist, famous Buddhist sutra, which says, form is emptiness, emptiness is form. Of course, in Buddhist terms, emptiness is the unconditioned, the vastness. Form is emptiness, emptiness is form.

Expressed also, I'm now told to just point to one or two things. What I'm now putting in relatively neutral language as an immediate possibility that, of course, the beautiful ancient scriptures, they point to it. My favorite Upanishad, I can't even remember what it's called, starts with these lines.

Not that which the eye sees, but that whereby the eye can see. Know that alone to be Brahman, the eternal, not what people here adore. Not that which the ear hears, but that whereby the ear can hear.

Know that alone to be Brahman, the eternal, and not what people here adore. Not that which the mind thinks, but that whereby the mind can think. Know that alone to be Brahman, the eternal, and not what people here adore.

What people here adore is an object in consciousness. What the eye sees, sense perception. What the ear hears, what the mind thinks, a thought.

But it's the consciousness that makes all seeing possible, all sense perception possible, the one consciousness that makes all full. They don't know that. Why don't they know it?

Because they are trapped in identification with form. They react continuously to the forms that arise. And now the way out is so simple.

It is so simple, and that's the reason why so few people got it. They tried, they surrendered to state of consciousness. It's here, you don't need time to surrender to the now.

But if you do need time, which means also you need more suffering, it's there for you because the universe will allow you more time and more suffering. I'm not quite ready yet to surrender. A little bit more time, please.

Okay, please, as much as you like. Infinite, vast stretches of time and suffering. Or you see it, and this is an insult also to some spiritual seekers who are strongly identified with the thought movement that you need time for liberation.

And perhaps you've already invested 30 years in that. Great, it got you to this moment. And suddenly you hear, yes, but it doesn't agree with the teaching that I believe in that says you need many lifetimes.

Perhaps this is true, I'm not denying that you may need lifetimes or plenty of time, but you need it until you realize that you don't need time anymore. You needed time to get to that point of realization. And for many of you, that realization is now.

You needed time to hear it, otherwise you would have heard it a long time ago. So you hear it, and even if it's not yet operating in your life, you have heard it. And perhaps you need just a little bit more suffering for you to finally say, ah, I say yes to what is.

Unconditionally embrace this, the form of this moment, the limitation of this moment. Or you've had enough, you've had enough suffering. Humanity as a whole has had so much suffering.

All, of course, produced through the egoic condition. If you are trapped in a false sense of self, you are going to create suffering for yourself and others. And so humanity has been suffering, so much suffering.

Look at human history. You can, you weep when you go beyond the words that you read, when you see what humans did to other humans throughout history. What for?

Well, it is the dysfunction of the egoic condition. And so humans have suffered so much that there is a readiness now in many human beings to embrace this truth. And many human beings are coming to the end of suffering, which means to the end of time.

Psychological time is no longer important. Clock time still works okay. Tomorrow at eight o'clock, I'm going to see you, whatever.

That works. But when I say coming to the end of time is the end of the psychological need for future. So as you enter the surrendered state, the present moment, the now becomes primary in your life, what you give attention to, what you honor.

That becomes the primary focus of your life now. On the periphery of your life, yes, there is still past. You remember what you did last year, 10 years ago.

There is still a future in the realm of practicality. You can still embark on new projects, learn new things, even make money perhaps, but not because you're seeking your self-fulfillment through that, simply because it happens through you and it'll be an expression of the unconditioned consciousness. It is not a passive state, the state of surrender.

This could be a misperception. The state of surrender has a very dynamic quality to it also and this is very important. The action that arises out of the state of surrender is enormously empowered.

It is intelligent action. It is not action that seeks some future result for completion. It arises out of a state of joyous aliveness and that is infinitely more effective than action in which is still normal in you and in human life.

Most of human action arises out of dissatisfaction, out of fear and out of desire, all to do with the egoic condition. And that can look powerful on the surface. You could create a huge business empire out of the state of great dissatisfaction, not feeling enough, not feeling that others give you enough recognition.

Your sense of self needs that and so you're out of that dissatisfaction, even anger with the world. I'm going to show them. I can make it.

I can get there. And then 30, 40 years later, you've built up a huge empire corporation. And you'll be very unhappy and the body will be very unhappy.

And the thousands of people that are working in it are unhappy. Perhaps they're all making money, but they're stressed, diseased through stress, continuous infighting and intrigue and until finally you die in the state of dissatisfaction. And the seemingly solid structures that are created by those egoic entities, which is most of the world, are not that solid either.

Many of them are going to crumble as the old consciousness gives way to the new consciousness, the free, the liberated consciousness on this planet, the transformation of human consciousness on this planet, which is now a necessity, not a luxury anymore for humanity to survive, the planet to survive. God doesn't mind whether the human form survives or not. Wherever there's non-resistance, wherever there's transparency, the divine moves through.

It doesn't ask, are you worthy? Are you good enough? Have you accumulated enough credits?

It sometimes moves to the seemingly most unworthy forms because that unworthy form had created so much suffering for itself that something self-destructed and surrender happened and then it can move, the divine can move through the criminal. It may not move through the monk after 50 years of meditation because the monk may be, it may do, but it may not. The monk may have an image of himself as pure.

The last mind image of me as pure is the one last obstacle, me. So you are in the midst of, this event is part of, goes far beyond the personal. It is part of the transformation of human consciousness on the planet.

It will go unreported in the news tonight. It happened once that they did report it on the news, but mostly not yet because there are more important news the mind says, the budget and the violence, much more important. It's just what matters.

I hope I'm not offending anybody who is interested in the budget. If there's no self in it, it's fine. Anything is fine.

The world of phenomenal forms becomes a beautiful place to be enjoyed as the play of form when you no longer resist the forms or are looking for yourself in them. Then it's quite pleasant to see how the forms come into your life, situations, places, gain and loss, people, recognition, non-recognition, victory, defeat, how this continuous flux of forms moves in and out of the space of now. Quite beautiful, even beautiful to see the fleeting nature of all the forms that come.

Whew, nothing lasts for that long. Even solid structures could go before you know it. It's dissolved.

In India, to see the insubstantial nature of the material world is easier. In the West, the delusion that the mind created man-made, egoically mind created world, the illusion that those structures are solid and lasting is greater because they look more solid. And so you people there might say, well, my life is totally, I've got all my shares there and I've got my house there and this is the corporation where I work and this is the big car and everything is looked after, my pension scheme and my investments with Enron Corporation.

And it's all so solid and suddenly, before you know it, it crumbles. It falls. Where has it gone?

So, the doorway is now through the form of now, acceptance of that, and the end of time as a psychological need, future especially as a psychological need, past also as a psychological need to continuously refer to it to enhance and strengthen your sense of self. Don't need that. So there's past you can let go with much greater ease.

Remember what you need to remember, but no self-seeking. Future, psychological need for it goes. So one could say the end of psychological time.

This is part of the transformation of consciousness. The primary focus of your life is now, not a story in your head, not a conceptual sense of self. Now, as you allow this moment to be, the ability arises in and through you to relinquish the otherwise compulsive and automatic labeling and interpreting process of the human mind.

That is an unbelievable liberation. And many of you already finding that this is coming into their lives, and some of you from now on will find that as you move through the world, you find that as you allow the form of this moment to be, which is a beautiful, gentle embrace, whereas before there was a resisting little spiky entity, now there's a gentle compassion comes with that. Let's leave that aside for a moment.

There is no compassion unless you allow what is to be. With that also great compassion arises. But for the time being, let us address a different aspect of that state of consciousness.

It is the ability to move through life free or to a large extent, free of the compulsion to interpret and label everything and comment mentally on what you are seeing, which is a conceptualized reality. Through allowing, you can, let's take, as you sit here, you can sit here where you are and allow this moment to be so completely that the compulsion to call it anything isn't there. So what does that mean?

It means you perceive, see, hear, feel perhaps a little bit, sense perhaps your body as you sit here, but it is not, it does not become words in your head. So there's the ability to perceive through stillness in a state of great alertness, but still alertness. And for the first time then, you perceive the world no longer through the conditioning of the mind, but through the unconditioned consciousness.

And suddenly, that which you perceive, it could be here, perceiving this form, perceiving the sounds, and you just allow it to be. There's no additional mind movement. So the perception happens within a field of spaciousness, of stillness, of peace, and everything is suddenly seen as so much more alive than it had been when you deadened it through the compulsive labeling process.

To become free of that is an essential part, of course, of this transformation of consciousness. And it is so beautiful to be able, let's say, sitting on a bus, or, well, if you're lucky, you're sitting, you may be standing, or hanging, or riding on the roof. It doesn't matter.

Just an example. You're on a bus, human beings all around you. It's moving other human forms, streets, houses, and you're simply looking.

No entity is saying, this is awful, whatever, or whatever it is saying, I wish I were home. He looks dreadful, I wish he wasn't standing next to me. Continuous.

You simply allow it, and it is as it is, and there's a peace around the sense perception. What a change. There's also a depth to that which you are perceiving.

It's alive, and it is as it is. And you could sit somewhere, on a bench, in a park, and you watch, and to the mind, it looks an insignificant event. The mind even says, sitting there, this isn't solving my problems.

The mind will try to come in and remind you of what your problems are, sometimes. The old movement tries to come back in, and you see that, and you come back to the freedom of being free of the conditioned. Now, you may sometimes, especially as this state begins to arise in you, it may be short-lived at first, before mind comes in again, or as you sit there, in that state, certain thoughts may drift in and out, and they are recognized as thoughts, perhaps labels again, but you are no longer totally in it.

You allow it to be. You recognize it as just thought. It's no longer a problem.

And then there's a space again between the next thought, between that thought and the next thought. And so we are talking about this right now in the context of a neutral, non-problematic situation. You're in a park, or you're sitting at home in your familiar room, and you're sitting in a chair, and you simply look around in the state of clear, innocent, non-labeling perception.

And then something else happens. You suddenly realize two dimensions. One is the objects that are appearing in your consciousness, the sense objects, perception.

And then you sense still, but awake, highly awake, the field of aware presence in which those sense perceptions appear. You're aware of that and that which appears. In other words, you're aware, conscious of awareness, conscious of consciousness, and that which appears in consciousness.

Knowing that none of that which appears in consciousness is the essence of who you are, but consciousness itself is who you are. But in every form, that essence is also concealed, so the other statement, the seemingly contradictory statement that everything you see is you is also true. This is how it works, holds that they are both true.

None of that which appears in consciousness is you, and everything is you. But the essence of you, of I, is the field. Of aware presence.

And you are free. You know yourself as that. Then the world is not threatening anymore, the world of form.

Nor is it that attractive anymore. It's just as beautiful as it is. But it doesn't threaten your sense of self, nor does it promise to enhance your sense of self anymore.

And now you can actually, you can relax with the world, because you don't feel threatened by it or enhanced by it, because you are beyond it. And this is why, funny story to illustrate this, the spiritual teacher, J. Krishnamurti, who taught for many, many, many years, once in the middle of a talk, he stopped talking and said, do you want to know what my secret is?

And everybody listened up. Some people had already gone to sleep because they'd been coming to see him for 30 years. Yes, that's what we've been waiting for.

What is your secret? Okay, I will tell you what my secret is. And he said, I don't mind what happens.

Yes, and that was his secret. But now you can see, I don't know how many people got it when he said that. And he didn't explain, as far as I know, further.

But in the context of this, you can see the depth of what that means. I don't mind what happens, because what happens is a form that arises in consciousness. And when you know yourself as consciousness, it doesn't matter that much.

And the strange thing is, you might think, okay, then your attitude then towards the world will be one of not caring anymore. It sometimes happens that people who, in whom this transformed state arises, suddenly they go through a period when they don't pay attention to any of these forms anymore. They lose interest in the world of form entirely.

They get so drawn, so identified with the formless, with being, that existence becomes uninteresting. Because being is unmanifested life. Existence is form, because the very word means, ex means out, systems, it stands out as a form.

This happened to me also, total lack of interest for several years in anything in this world. And then a balance establishes itself. This doesn't need to happen to you.

It tends to happen to people who, without any teaching, stumble upon this truth within themselves, seemingly, accidentally, nothing is accidental, but seemingly, accidentally, they stumble upon this, and suddenly, the unconditioned is there fully, all at once, and then sometimes the world kind of becomes totally peripheral, until finally you learn to live in the world of form again. With most of you, a different process happens. It is a more gradual realization.

Not that surrender takes time, but to dwell in the state of surrender as a continuous state can take time. Not the surrender itself, because you can only surrender to now. But what happens is that the resistance movement, which is conditioned collectively, will reassert itself in waves.

And so you fall back into the state of egoic identification with mind, and back in the state of resistance and denial of now, and then suddenly you see it, and then you reenter. So it's a gradual entering of that, so that until it becomes the place where you dwell that state. So you don't need to lose yourself in it, because it is gradual.

You can learn to incorporate it into your life, not that you have to do it. It happens by itself. And the misperception could arise that then don't you become careless towards the world, the things in this world?

And strangely, the opposite is true. Once the balance is there, everything that you look upon is actually great care flows into that, to which you give attention, which that attention is the unconditioned. And in that movement of the unconditioned, that looks upon the conditioned, whether it looks upon a thought or an emotion, or a sense object, external, there is a gentleness, a care, and compassion, and love with which you perceive things and allow things.

That's the beauty of it. You don't misuse the world of form in the service of self. You don't misuse the form that this moment takes in the service of some mentally projected future moment.

If you make this moment into a means to an end, you're using it in the service of a false sense of self that seeks to complete itself through future. And whatever comes into the now is self-serving. And often it's a human being, and you meet a human being, and somehow you're just using that human being because you are using the present moment as a means to an end.

So anything that appears in the now becomes a means to an end. If the now is a means to an end, to arrive at some future, which is the egoic state. So in the egoic state, love is not possible because in the egoic state, you always want something from the other person, or you fear something from the other person.

And what you want from the other person is sometimes called love. I want you to complete me. And I want you to sign this contract.

Don't you dare leave me. So, love, compassion, gentleness, those qualities that are really not so much human, but divine, because human, in the way I use the word, I'm sorry if I offend anybody, human means mad, in the old sense. It's been mad for a long time.

But there are divine qualities that flow through a human being, but not when the conditioned mind operates. So at first, now, we become free of the movement of the conditioned in simple situations that you're just allowed to be. Not particularly challenging situations.

Simply sitting somewhere in a restaurant in a cafe, drinking a cup of tea, and an alert presence arises, and you simply watch, see, in a field of stillness. That is the arising. And then, the challenges come.

Because as you know, you can't go through life for very long, perhaps not even a single day, without some challenge appearing, some situation that doesn't seem to go the way it should have gone, something going wrong, some kind of loss. And particularly in India, one can experience things don't go the way you expect them to go. This is a great lesson for many people who come here.

It's easier to learn surrender here. I said that last night. And this could be the reason why the great sages, far greater numbers than any other country, liberated beings lived here, produced by India so that it seeded the entire world became through the enormous wisdom that arose here, the insight into the human condition.

It's a miracle. So the challenges come, and then the temptation is for the old reactive pattern to flow back in. So you get drawn back the moment you're faced with the slightest challenge.

Before you sat on this park bench, beautiful, occasional thoughts that you're perceiving in the field of stillness. And then the first challenge comes, and then either that unconditioned stillness presence deepens, or you get drawn into the old reactive pattern and the unconditioned becomes obscured again through identification with the conditioned. The little me is back reacting, fighting, complaining, shouting, whatever it does, it does its thing, the reactive pattern.

Once a certain level of presence, which is another word I use to describe the unconditioned consciousness that arises, once a certain degree of presence has been reached, what happens is that a challenge simply intensifies presence instead of the old reactive pattern coming back. So a challenge comes and it is faced completely without resistance in a field of intense alertness. That is the movement of incredible intelligence that goes into that situation that is challenging.

It is not mentally analyzed. At some point, mind movement may come in, but it could be more likely to be an inspired thought of what is needed, unless what is needed comes as spontaneous action, which also happens in that state. The challenge is faced completely in a state of alert attention.

And there's the movement of the unconditioned intelligence, which the Chinese call the Tao, is suddenly operating through this form. So what is now dealing with the challenge is not the limited conditioned mind with its conditioning, what is dealing with this situation is the one universal intelligence. And you will be amazed how quickly situations resolve themselves through the simple act of giving full and complete non-interpreting, non-judgmental attention, clear space.

Of course, that is only possible if the portal that is the act of surrender is open, if you have accepted unconditionally whatever this challenge is, this form of this moment. And so, that is how greater intelligence comes in and resolves it through action that then arises through you or another spontaneous event that seems to come from elsewhere, because intelligence is everywhere, the one intelligence, and it will operate beautifully. So that's the creative human beings, those few human beings who are very creative in artists, musicians, composers, painters, sculptors, some of the creative scientists or any creative endeavor, those human beings have the ability in the limited field of their endeavor to enter that state of total looking, clear, unconditioned attention.

And then, a movement happens and the creative act begins and they know that they are not doing it as the form, it moves through them. And when you look at some of the great creations, the redeeming feature of humanity, it has enormous madness there, but also some very great things. The greatest, of course, is the teachers of truth.

They are the sublime achievement of humanity is to see beyond delusion. But then, come also those that created incredible depths and beauty through some form and use music or even through words. But there's an essence there that is beyond mind and you say, how could a human being create such a sublime work?

And the answer is, it's the little human being didn't create it. It was, there was an opening into universal intelligence. And so, those creative humans in their limited field enter that state and it happens.

And in most cases, those humans, when they move back into ordinary life, away from their creative field, are possessed again by the normal human unconsciousness. And so, it's mostly with those people only in that moment, that act of creation in their particular field are able to enter that state. Einstein was able to enter that state and this is where the great insights came that no mind could have worked out.

There's a leap here, that sudden insight that is not the result of thought activity. It is the result of cessation of thought activity. And then, suddenly the insight came.

So, that is, but here we are going, we are not attempting to become great artists, although it may happen. This arises in humanity now as a continuous state of being. So, your whole life becomes a work of art, even if you create nothing externally.

So, the challenges are extremely important that come, which is, again, the limitations that appears in this moment. And not to turn away from it, to walk through it, face it fully, say yes to it, and then see what happens. So, there is one more seeming apparent obstacle that many human beings encounter as the new state, even as the new state of consciousness arises.

And that obstacle is due to the fact that, collectively, humanity has created vast suffering for itself on this planet. And there is, within the energy field of the planet, there is a residue of pain, human, the collective, in the collective consciousness of humanity, or unconsciousness of humanity, there is an enormous amount of human pain. And every human being has a share of accumulated human pain that they carry inside.

Almost something, it's an energy field, residue of pain from the human body. From your personal life, in this lifetime, children, very few children don't suffer great pain. After all, you live in a relatively mad world.

But more than that, human pain accumulated over thousands of years that is passed on in many ways, even genetically. And so, if you're not aware of that, it can happen easily that you are overwhelmed, taken over, periodically, by the movement of human pain in you. And it can easily obscure the arising presence, the unconditioned, when the pain comes.

I call that the pain body that human beings carry inside. And that pain body needs to be seen for what it is. It can only continue to operate in you if you remain unconscious of it and mistake it for who you are.

This pain body, and many of you know this already, I spoke of it in the book, many of you are already working with your pain body, bringing presence to it, but we need to point out that this pain body which we look upon as if it were an almost independent entity that lives in you, and again, don't take this to be the absolute truth. It is a pointer, a helpful, very helpful perspective. It's quite close to the truth, but not the truth.

So let's be aware of the limitations of any perspective, and yet we use that perspective because it's helpful. So we say that it is like an entity that lives in you. It is a residue, an emotional field, which is energy that has become stuck, cannot flow freely, constricted, tight.

It lives in humans, although most humans, it is in most human beings, it is not continuously active. It is sporadically active. The pain body has a dormant period when all you have to face in life is your mind and the mad egoic mind structures, which is problematic enough.

But then, periodically, the pain body awakens out of its dormant state because being almost an independent entity, it needs to take in some food, renew itself. It needs further experience of pain. And it usually happens when, you can notice it, when a relatively minor, often, not always, but very often, a relatively minor situation, event, even thought, can suddenly bring about an enormous influx of emotional pain, be it anxiety, fear, extreme fear, be it extreme anger, often totally out of proportion to the triggering event.

You suddenly, whoa, or the fear, or deep sadness and heaviness. The makeup of pain body differs from person to person. Some are predominantly angry.

Some are predominantly heavy with deep sadness. Others are predominantly fearful and anxious. And many others are a combination of these.

And so, suddenly, there's an enormous movement of emotion and painful emotion. And the first thing that the pain body does when it awakens, it is seeking food. It seeks food in two places.

One is in your mind, and it will attempt to use your thought processes. So the emotion is so strong that it overpowers your thought processes. And every thought process then reflects the painful emotion that you feel.

So you begin to think thoughts that reflect the pain that you feel in here. And with every thought, you feed the pain body. That means, at that moment, you are identified with the pain body.

And this is an important aspect of the egoic sense of self. This is what makes the egoic sense of self. So far, we've only spoken of the egoic sense of self as mind movements.

But now we see there is an additional factor to the egoic sense of self, which makes it even more mad and even heavier than it already is as simply mind movements, conditioned that you identify with. So we have an influx of human pain that flows into those mind movements that are egoic and are bad enough, even without the pain body, problematic enough. And yet now, as the pain body moves into, it amplifies enormously the egoic mind movements.

What that means is, when the story of me, which is what most people derive their identity from, becomes amplified by the pain body, the story becomes huge drama, heavy drama, angry drama, fearful drama of enormous proportions. And the mind is working overtime. It's active anyway all the time, but now it's doubly, 10 times, 50 times more active thinking all those thoughts, angry, depressed, fearful, fearful, what's happening to me?

Angry, oh, what I'm going to do? I'm going to kill him, I'm going to, what, you know, I don't need to. And every thought feeds the pain body.

And you love it because at that moment you have become the pain body. That is the addiction to pain that every human being carries inside. Pain bodies love pain.

And when you're identified with that movement, identified means your sense of self is in it during and while it's active, at that moment, you, because you have become the pain body, you love the pain. And you will do everything to keep it going. But your mind is only one level on which one of where the pain body feeds, it feeds on other people.

So it will attempt to provoke or make other people equally unhappy. The pain body is very, very unhappy. And when it becomes through mind movement and identification with it, it becomes a self, the delusory self amplified now by thousands of years of human pain that are genetically and in other ways passed on.

And the delusion is that, that is me, my problem, my pain, my story. You don't realize that we, my identity. So, and then this unhappy identity seeks to make others equally unhappy to feed on their unhappiness, their emotional reaction of unhappiness.

In other words, it's looking for drama and for trouble from someone. And usually gets it, it succeeds in drawing, in awakening the other person's pain body. This is particularly prevalent in partnerships, husband, wife.

It can be seen in the periodic need to act out their drama. And it repeats itself. You might have noticed every week, every few days, you go through the motions.

In many cases, it's almost exactly the same as last week's. And in other many cases, it is the same as 20 years ago. It's amazing.

As if they were forced to act something out like somebody has put something in there, a script programmed you and you're forced. Same again. But every time it actually works because through that, the pain body renews itself.

And after a while, a few hours, maybe a whole day, in some cases, two days, or in more chronic pain bodies, longer periods of time. And then it'll go to sleep for a while. And the relationship is a bit more harmonious again.

And sooner or later, it's back. And it looks for an opportunity, especially as more consciousness arises in you, presence. It looks for moments when you are less conscious.

It will attempt to come in then. When it's ready to awaken, it is clever, it is cunning. It's lying in wait.

It's looking for the best moment in which to suddenly jump in and rise up into your mind before you know it. And immediately, you start. And suddenly, 10 minutes later, you might realize you're feeding the pain body with extremely negative thought processes.

When did it start? Oh my gosh, been in that for 10, 15 minutes, half an hour. It may be even too late by then.

You're so identified that if somebody pointed out to you that you are possessed by the pain body, you would say, you would shout something. Don't give me that nonsense about pain body. This is very real.

The pain body, sometimes, if the pain body is active and you have to step outside, you're going shopping, you're going to your workplace, but you have, the pain body is active. Of course, it's not being expressed at that moment, but you're walking there, you're a walking pain body. And you're then at far greater risk of being attacked verbally, even physically there's a greater risk, but more likely verbally by some other walking pain body.

So you go into a shop to buy a loaf of bread and suddenly the shopkeeper is extremely rude and there's an enormous amount of negativity flowing. What did I do? Because his pain body recognized yours.

And many pain bodies these days are sitting behind wheels. And so there are people, they are driving pain bodies. And often accidents happen in that way.

All that is required for a very high likelihood of an accident is two driving pain bodies getting close to each other. Because the pain body wants the drama. The pain body wants the pain.

The pain body wants the accident because the accident will give it more pain. That is totally unconscious, of course, but it's a bit frightening to realize that there are many drivers out there who are looking for the accident through the pain body. Totally unconscious, of course.

So it's amazing that I have met people, spiritual seekers, who already the state of presence arises in them beautifully, but they have not been aware of the movement of pain body. And each time they lose it completely, totally identified with the pain movement. And then wake up again, okay, it's time to meditate again.

And when the pain body is ready to awaken, it could happen in the middle of a meditation. And then it'll wait for the slightest provocation. A little, the door opening.

Leave me alone, can't you see I'm doing my meta meditation? For God's sake, get out of here. So there is a cycle here of human pain becoming a self, the delusion of self.

And through becoming a self, identification with it, it renews itself. So the simple, how do you get out of it? So simple, see it for what it is, when it arises as the movement of human pain.

Almost physical, halfway between emotion and you can almost feel it has a physical aspect to it. Fear, for example, my pain body, which was extremely dense, was composed predominantly of fear energy. So I would wake up in the middle of the night, shivering with fear and mind movements to accompany that.

And all the dreadful things that are going to happen to me. See the movement of pain for what it is, human pain. Watch it as it arises.

So as it arises, and it may arise quickly, particularly if it's anger, that is a predominant energy field, it can be as quick as an explosion. Not easy to watch it, if it goes, vroom. You have to be there as it goes, vroom.

So what, and then it's there. So what do you do with it? Say, go away.

No. It is the form that this moment takes, human pain. This moment then takes the form of that pain, fear, anger, heaviness, depression.

And what do you do with the now? You allow it to be. And you, allowing implies that there is an awareness because the awareness and the allowing are really one.

You allow it to be. So you see it and you allow the movement of pain, then it cannot use your mind because you're watching it directly. If, when it cannot use your mind, it cannot renew itself.

So it will simply be the expression of old pain, but it's not, you're not adding to it by unconsciously identifying with it and making it into a self. And so that is the beginning of a gradual transmutation of the pain. Gradually, the trapped energy that was there becomes freed.

And it is strange fact that in those human beings, very often, who have the densest pain bodies, the heaviest pain bodies, liberation can happen very quickly because the suffering becomes almost unbearable. And so you recognize what you then do is, this was the case with me. I could not live with myself any longer.

That night, when the pain reached a climax, I just, this thought came into, I talk about it briefly in the book, I cannot live with myself any longer. And that thought became a koan in Zen. Koan, as many of you know, is a kind of riddle that has no logical answer that you could work out.

So the koan that spontaneously arose was that sentence, that phrase, I cannot live with myself. And suddenly, I saw self and the pain of self. And I said, I, there are two here.

I and the self that I cannot live with. What's that self? It's painful self.

It's a story. It's a painful story. That's what I can't live with.

Who am I? Who is I? I, at its deepest level, is the unconditioned consciousness, the one, I.

The superficial I, in the way the word I is normally used in everyday usage, and it's probably the most frequently used word in the language, because, of course, everybody is the center of the universe. I usually refers to I and my story, my story self. My painful self, my pain-body-story-self.

This is when people say I, they refer to the illusory identity of self. That was the self that I could not live with. I was identified with self.

And suddenly, I separated from self. There was a consciousness moved out of identification with a form of self, and the psychological form of self collapsed, all at once, and what was left was I. It had moved out of identification with a form, the psychological form, and that moving out, in this case, was so complete that the form of self popped like a soap bubble.

And what was left was what had always been there, but had become intertwined with a form, I. I had always been the essence even of the story, but it became mixed up with form. So it moved out of form because the pain of form identification became unbearable.

And every one of you is close to that point or has already reached that point. That's why you're here. Some of you, yes, need a little bit more time.

That's okay. So, and that is the miracle of transformation is when that happens. And fortunately, the pain that is created by that delusion is also that which makes you realize who you are beyond the form.

One could almost say that self-created pain drives you out finally of the form. That's one way of putting it. And then by the grace of God, the divine, the one, a spiritual teaching or teacher comes in and points to the fact that you don't need further pain.

You've come to the end to awaken out of identification with form, you don't need more pain. The one, the pain that you have had, and really I'm talking not so much to you as an individual person, I could say that to humanity because you are humanity. The pain that you have had has been enough.

And that was already 2,600 years ago. That was already the message of the Buddha because he summarized the entire teaching which is sublime, of sublime simplicity and power. Summarized it as, I show you suffering at the end of suffering.

And this is exactly what we have been engaged in here this evening. I showed you suffering at the end of suffering. The same teaching, the same teacher.

There's only one spiritual teaching and there's only one spiritual teacher. And that one teaching, one teacher comes in many forms. But it's only one.

And here that appears again with an added, one could almost say urgency or intensity to it because at the time of the Buddha, human madness had not yet developed to the point where it threatened survival of the very planet. It's taken 2,600 years since then for the human mind to become that powerful and increase through science, through technology, increase, amplify the madness that was already there. And not that there's anything wrong with that.

Ultimately, that also is part of what has to be and had to be. And put beautifully, expressed beautifully by the Buddhist saying, if there were no delusion, there would be no enlightenment. So all is as it is and it is right.

Everything from the highest or deepest perspective, even though I have been speaking of human madness, even that is a fragmentary perspective. Nothing, I pointed out before, nothing that thought can think or words can speak is the entire truth. So even to say that humans are mad, there's dysfunction on the planet, yes, it's true, but it's not the entire truth.

There is a larger picture within which that also is as it should be, totally right. So this is the message of the Buddha salvation, liberation from that prison. But it's been beautiful.

It worked, the madness worked, the suffering worked. It is all right. From the highest perspective, there's nothing that is amiss.

So you all go away from here, greatly diminished in your sense of self story. This has not been a personal growth seminar, the opposite. That which is true is emerging.

If it were not, you wouldn't be sitting here anymore. And now that presence, the unconditioned, transmits itself fortunately. Your practice is, of course, the practice of surrender to now.

Now, the old movements of resistance will come back periodically, and you then recognize them. You will not get lost for too long in the old egoic, reactive, resistant movements. Occasionally you get back in and then, oh, there it was again.

And it's never a personal problem. Thought processes, yes, you may get drawn back into identification with mind streams. And you become absent in dream world.

And then you awaken again out of it. And then you realize, oh, I was in a dream world of mind identification again for the past three hours. That's all right, you're awake now, that's all that matters.

It's not a personal problem. The whole movement of thought is not a personal matter, just as the pain body is not a personal matter. The pain, it is human pain, and mind movement is the human mind.

It's nobody's personal problem. So, the old comes, the new, and slowly the new arises. And that, one could say, takes some time.

But the one decisive act of surrender never takes time, because it can only be now. That is the message, ever the same, since the first human being realized the truth. But more intense now, more urgent.

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Talk Titled Everlasting Happiness

[Speaker 1] (0:12 - 1:14:38)

The pursuit of happiness, that's usually regarded as something desirable and positive. But that may be a dangerous thing, the pursuit of happiness. You may be missing something in that pursuit.

That's already here. Pursuit implies, of course, that you are seeking it. Why is it?

It implies that you are looking for a state, a desirable state, that lies somewhere in the future. And that becomes a pattern built into the very structure of the human mind. The seeking pattern.

The mindset, the collective mindset, that is always looking to the next thing, the next moment, in the hope that happiness will be found there, or that I will find a more complete version of myself there. That's a very normal thing to be doing. The bank robber does that, because he's not interested in the money, but what promise the money holds, he may believe that it will liberate him, provide freedom, freedom of movement, enhance his sense of self, happiness.

And it could be there in the spiritual seeker too, who is looking for the answer. Some state that one has read about, enlightenment perhaps, that will finally provide lasting happiness. So both the bank robber, to take one extreme, on the evolutionary scale, and the spiritual seeker, are still manifesting the human seeking mode.

And that is so normal for most human beings to be in the seeking mode, that to many it hasn't even occurred that they are in the seeking mode, or that a different state of consciousness is possible. And wherever you watch, television, the media, films, almost everybody you watch is in that seeking mode. The news reader, they are not at ease with the present moment, because the present moment is regarded as insufficient.

Underlying that is the belief that I am not yet enough. That's a very deep seated thing. I am not yet enough, and so I am not happy.

I can only be happy if I have finally arrived at that sense of completion within myself, where I feel I am now fully myself. Surely nothing else will bring me lasting happiness than finding myself fully, being myself fully. So the bank robber seeks that through the money.

And all throughout civilization people are seeking this, that, or the other, ultimately in a search for a more complete version of themselves, an enhanced sense of who I am, because that sense of who I am in most humans is deficient. You can notice that, that it is deficient, if you only even imagine that somebody tells you you haven't got much longer to live, would be the most dreadful shock, because you would feel, but I haven't arrived yet, but I'm not complete yet. Surely I need more time.

The most precious thing, the one thing that I need to complete myself, find myself, find that deep lasting happiness and peace, to find that, the one thing I need is more time. And so you are then trapped in a state of consciousness that we could call time bound, where whatever you do is governed by the notion of time. And unless you are very old, it will usually be future that is of the greatest importance to you, the time ahead of you.

As you get older, the time behind you, as the time ahead of you shrinks, the time behind you, there seems to be more of that, more past, and then in older people the past assumes a greater importance, they remember it. They are looking for themselves through memory of me and my past, what happened to me, and think about it and talk about it. That is quite normal, because future has shrunk.

But some old people, they don't seem to have realized yet that there may not be that much future left, so they are still looking to enhance themselves through more. This little word more is so vital if we want to discover the inner pattern, the inner pattern that is perhaps one of the most pronounced characteristics of that state of consciousness that I believe is now coming to an end on the planet, the state in which you are identified, which means you derive your sense of self, your sense of identity, from a mentally constructed image, a conceptualized me. Memories, conditioned patterns, experiences, all kinds of identifications, which become thoughts, make up a bundle of thoughts and emotions that accompany those thoughts, and that mentally created bundle becomes a sense of self, a me, and it is that mind made me, a story, my story, my history, it is that that most humans derive your sense of self from.

I am my story. And that sense of self is always seeking. It is a characteristic of that sense of self that it is in the seeking mode and it exists in a state of not enough.

And that's an amazing realization that most humans, although many are now moving beyond that state of consciousness, but on the planet most humans are still trapped in that state of consciousness where their sense of identity feels incomplete. I am not fully myself. So the belief then, to a large extent unconscious, is if I could only be more, then I finally will arrive at self-completion.

Myself will be complete. So the need for more becomes overriding in one's daily existence. More to add to who I think I am, to me.

What does that mean? To a child where this is already starting, this mind movement, the formation of a mind made sense of self, to a child, it begins when a child claims possession of something. And every young child does that.

And this child will scream if you take away the toy. In very deep pain already. Nothing much, and it's not probably even taken away.

Somebody just picked it up to look at it. And it's enough for the child to scream, It's mine! And that scream remains in most humans.

It may not be when they reach adulthood, the scream may not be, you can't hear it anymore, but it's often inside. And this is only where it begins. This is one thing where the child already feels, I have been diminished in my sense of self.

Because that toy has been taken away. What has happened? The simple thing that has happened is, the toy, of course, became a thought form.

It's not the toy out there, it's the thought form of my toy. And the little word my is essential here. Because then I have invested the thought form of toy with a sense of self.

And that's a collective, we are all collectively conditioned to do that. So this is just the early beginning of a huge development of mind movements, where the I seeks to add more thought forms, that it can invest with a sense of self. So it is looking out for more of me.

So to a child then, that's one thing. And then the child identifies with whatever it can incorporate into its sense of self. So this is the growing egoic entity.

And it seems that needs to happen to every human being. We cannot tell a child, No, this is not your toy, there is no such thing as possession. Let go of that thought.

It doesn't work. You have to allow the child compassionately to go through that. It's the beginning of delusion, we could say, yes.

And then it goes on and then you can see how the child begins to suffer. Through identifying more and more with that self. And fearing that something that I regard as me will be removed from me.

And then the child grows and the toy becomes the car, mine. And other possessions may come, this is one level. Then other levels of identifications come, what other people think of me.

Other people's opinion of me can become more valuable than a possession. It's only just a thought form, but I can hang on to that. And it can then cling to the bundle of thought forms and reactive patterns that go with it.

And emotions that accompany it, this me. Oh, they think I'm great. So many people think they will find themselves through enhanced recognition by others.

Maybe when others will recognize how great I am, then I will have found myself. So the striving for self being fully myself can take the form of that needing the recognition. And this could take you to the end of your life, especially if you don't get it.

Or striving to have wealth, it could take you to the end of your life, especially if you don't get it. If you get it, then you discover the strange thing, that it doesn't complete you. I still feel I'm not enough.

That wasn't it. I've got all the things that I thought would complete me, and then comes the critical stage. The suffering that is there whenever you have not really found yourself, the suffering that is built into the very structure of that mind made identity, because suffering is that sense of lack, that sense of not enough, that sense of fear, that underlies that state of consciousness.

And so you've made it in the eyes of the world, and yet it doesn't seem to have worked. If you haven't made it, you can be stuck in the illusion for longer, until the very end, and then create an identity, your story then changes into somebody who hasn't made it. And then the story will seek explanations why the world is so unfair, has treated you so badly, that it prevented you from being fully yourself.

They did something to me. Whether you identify them individually, or whether they are the collective, or whether they are a political party, or whatever, they... And that is another thought form that will then supply you with a sense of self, and that's quite satisfying too, temporarily.

At least now you think you know who you are. You are the one who has been treated unfairly by life. Okay.

So you are trapped, one way or another, in a conceptualized sense of self, a me, and it's not enough. And if you make it, everybody tells you you should be happy now, and you feel that pain, that sense of lack, and some start drinking then, or take drugs, just to dull the pain that they feel. There are famous people, we all have read about them, who were very unhappy, very deeply unhappy.

The illusion has been removed from them that the future will complete them, because surely they have everything already. How can the future complete me? I can't think of anything else.

And when you arrive there, you can go into despair and drugs, and so just to dull the pain, or you suddenly see the fiction of the self, that the entire culture is immersed in, and tells you this is how it is. And you suddenly see this is not, and then you might become interested in going beyond that. Going beyond a conceptualized me in the head.

And you realize that happiness on that level cannot be found. The illusion of happiness, yes, many times you will think, there it is, I have it now. I'm complete.

I'm getting married tomorrow. All my shares have gone up by 100%. I'm complete.

Or I've become a master at this or that, playing the violin, the computer, the greatest computer wizard in the world. I have abilities that nobody else has. I can throw a ball better than anybody else.

And so they pay me millions just to throw this ball once a week. And everybody thinks I'm the greatest. I'm the great example to everybody.

They construct an identity for me out of the ability to throw this ball. And I buy into that for a while. I actually believe that I am the greatest ball thrower.

And it's myself. And then after a while that wears off because it's a fiction. It's a conceptualized entity in the head.

And the fact that it is in millions of other heads doesn't change the fact that it's a delusion. A fiction. So the pursuit of happiness is undertaken by the conceptualized entity, the me.

It is seeking more of me. Amazing. That is one level of consciousness.

That is the level of consciousness that has dominated the planet for as long as humans can remember. Since recorded history and far beyond that. And it is a dangerously dysfunctional state in many ways.

Because that neediness expresses itself in many ways that create enormous amount of suffering. To others around you and to yourself. The need for more is the need for having an enhanced sense of self.

And that is not only personal, it's collective too. When that same mindset becomes a collective mindset, the me becomes an us. That's even more mad than the personal.

And it creates dreadful suffering. It has done so throughout history. The need of nations and religions and tribes to enhance their sense of identity through, strangely enough, being in conflict with others.

They are actually seeking conflict. You can see it whether you look at this on a personal level or whether you look at it on the level of the collective. There seems to be the need to be in conflict with something or someone.

If there were not this need, why would human history look the way it is? Look at the 20th century. Hell.

Created on a planet that potentially is a paradise. Humans create their own hell. And they do it collectively and they do it on a personal level.

There are many humans, not just in places where there is a shortage of food. They create hell in many different ways, even in so-called prosperous countries. If you look into the individual human being, many of them carry their own heaviness, their own hell inside.

Their relationships at work. And they might look happy on the surface. So much suffering.

So much suffering on the planet. Human created suffering. So the entity, the conceptualized me, is condemned to seeking more.

It's condemned not to be happy, not to be at ease. The structure of that mind-made self does not allow it. So unhappiness is actually built into the structure of the egoic mindset.

It is not ultimately to do with the content of your life, the reasons why I am unhappy. They are interchangeable. So there is the need for more to enhance me.

The me that is never complete. The story of me that hasn't quite worked the way it was supposed to work. Up till now.

There are not many humans who feel that the story has gone very well indeed. The story of me. And if there are some, all you have to do is wait a little.

And then the incompleteness returns. The sense of incompleteness. And people believe this is their personal problem.

Everybody else seems to be okay except me. This is built into the very structure of that conceptualized identity. It's need for more.

It's need for conflict in order to enhance its separate sense of existence. This is the me and this is the other. Now I need to get a strong sense of me if I can be in conflict with something or someone.

It enhances my sense of self. Or if I can take something away from another, in my delusion I believe that that will also enhance my sense of self. That could be just a thought form that I am trying to take away from somebody through making a remark that diminishes the sense of self of another person.

I question anything that that person identifies with as not good. Your car is no good. This dress would look good on your sister.

Little remarks. They are unconsciously designed to diminish another person's sense of self. They don't know what they are doing.

And they believe if they can diminish somebody else's sense of self, they have enhanced their own sense of self a little bit. All that it means is the illusion of me has grown a little. So all you have enhanced is the illusion.

But to the illusion it feels great for a little while. And so it can become extremely greedy.

The need for more is incessant.

We see that the same egoic entity becomes collective in a corporation. We've read about these things recently. And we were surprised to see how greedy these big corporations are.

Their whole reason for being seems to be to accumulate more. Perhaps in some cases the people at the top didn't even forgot what they manufactured. And it didn't matter anymore what, except we need more, more.

So there is the need for more to enhance me. The me that is never complete. The story of me that hasn't quite worked the way it was supposed to work up till now.

There are not many humans who feel that the story has gone very well indeed. The story of me. And if there are some, all you have to do is wait a little.

And then the incompleteness returns. The sense of incompleteness. And people believe this is their personal problem.

Everybody else seems to be okay except me. This is built into the very structure of that conceptualized identity. It's need for more.

It's need for conflict in order to enhance its separate sense of existence. This is the me and this is the other. Now I need to get a strong sense of me if I can be in conflict with something or someone.

It enhances my sense of self. Or if I can take something away from another, in my delusion I believe that that will also enhance my sense of self. And that could be just a thought form that I'm trying to take away from somebody through making a remark that diminishes the sense of self of another person.

By saying, I question anything that that person identifies with as not good. Your car is no good. This dress would look good on your sister.

Little remarks. All these, they are unconsciously designed to diminish another person's sense of self. They don't know what they are doing.

And they believe if they can diminish somebody else's sense of self, they have enhanced their own sense of self a little bit. All that it means is the illusion of me has grown a little. So all you have enhanced is the illusion.

But to the illusion it feels great for a little while. And so it can become extremely greedy. The need for more is incessant.

We see that the same egoic entity becomes collective in a corporation. We've read about these things recently. And we were surprised to see how greedy these big corporations are.

Their whole reason for being seems to be to accumulate more. Perhaps in some cases the people at the top didn't even forgot what they manufactured. And it didn't matter anymore what, except we need more, more.

So a greedy entity is simply a magnification of that mind pattern. So let's not fall into the trap of saying there are a few, all these directors, they are evil. No, they are just in a position to be more greedy than others.

And so the same mind pattern operates on all levels. It becomes the terrorist. What does he do?

How can somebody kill hundreds or thousands of people, even himself or herself? What is going on in here? And people are at a loss to understand what are they doing?

Well, it's very simple. They live in and through a conceptualized entity which to a large extent is in their case collective. It's a collective me based on their conditioning, their religion, their upbringing, their belief systems, their story, the collective story of us.

And they don't know it's a story the way they interpret reality. It is the truth to them. They are totally identified with those thoughts that make up the self.

Complete identification with thinking. Self-identification with thinking. So you have a collective conceptualized entity and us.

And that entity has its own version of reality which isn't recognized as a version of reality. It is reality to that entity. And that entity then, you've already deadened yourself to the deeper aliveness that is there underneath all those mind movements.

Underneath the conceptualized me. The deeper consciousness that is not conditioned. The dimension that is in every human being underneath the conceptualized sense of self that is conditioned form, thought forms.

Underneath that, this is the redemptive factor in human existence. Underneath that is a dimension of consciousness that we could describe as unconditioned, vast. But they don't know that.

The terrorist certainly doesn't know it. And as yet, most humans don't know it, but more and more are waking up to it now. The terrorist is so deeply identified, and that's only an extreme manifestation of the same that's everywhere.

So deeply identified with the conceptualized that the entire identity is derived from those mind movements. He's already dead to the deeper aliveness within him or her. And then when you live through a conceptualized sense of self, you manufacture a conceptualized identity for everybody else.

You impose mental labels on other people and groups of people. You call them something. A word, a set of words.

And to you that is the reality of those human beings. There are mental labels. There are thought forms that you impose on another.

You can do it to an individual or to a group. And once you have deadened yourself, you are no longer relating to another human being. You don't even see them anymore as human beings.

You are totally trapped in mind. Totally trapped in thought. And thought is an abstraction.

You impose an abstraction on the sacredness and aliveness of another human being. And that is what you relate to. And then you've basically already killed them.

Their aliveness is not there anymore. You don't know it. The next step can easily be physical violence.

And you will not know what you are doing. You are operating in the realm of mental abstraction. And you are reducing the world to that.

And you are making... You love your enemies, not in the sense of Jesus. You love your enemies.

You love having enemies in that mindset. The terrorist loves having enemies. He doesn't love his enemies, but he loves having enemies.

Because they enhance his sense of self. The us. So all these remove America.

And in many countries, collective identity would suddenly dissolve. Who are we now? Without those on whom we can project something.

The enemy is gone. Within America, because the same structure operates in everyone, when Russia ceased to be the enemy, one could sense a little bit of sense of loss in certain circles. What are we doing now?

We've lost our main enemy. They even made a humorous film about that. Where the president of the United States gets together.

He's seeking re-election. And he gets together with an advisor and says, We need an enemy. Come on.

And since it's a humorous film, they come up with Canada as the enemy. The most unlikely enemy. They manufacture it and it works.

So the need for an enemy to enhance one's sense of self is very great in the collective. It happens in Germany, National Socialism. The same egoic entity which became collective.

It's a very dangerous entity on all levels. And they ended up with the whole world became their enemy. Great.

Now we know who we are. Who are you? Well, Germans.

That's who we are. A concept in the head. A conceptual entity.

It's a dangerous thing. Very dangerous thing. And on a personal level, it operates in the same way.

And that's been going on for so long. How does it operate on a personal? Who is your enemy?

It doesn't have to be a person. Or a group of people. The enemy can be a place.

A situation. Wherever you are. Something you complain about in your head.

And you might have noticed that that entity loves complaining too. Reacting against something and complaining about it. Because in every complaint, it strengthens itself a little.

Because if I complain about a place or situation or another person, I've put myself in the mental position of rightness. I am right. But the complaint, the assumption underneath the complaint is that I'm right.

And what I'm complaining about is wrong. Obviously. That's the underlying assumption behind every complaint.

I'm not talking here about complaint that in order to change a situation, you go and call somebody up and say, you delivered the wrong thing. I ordered a TV and you delivered a washing machine. These are perfectly fine.

Or you tell the waiter, I ordered a salad, not the soup. On that level, complaint is fine. It's purely functional.

But that is very little. But the other complaining that goes on is the self-talk in the head. Which sometimes also becomes verbal, of course.

Where you complain and you can't do anything about it, nor are you even trying to do anything about it. You just want to be right. And that's an unconscious need to feel a slightly stronger sense of self.

So every complaint is an attempt to be a little bit more of me. And then it wears off after a few minutes and you need something else to complain about. And you can see people, how sometimes they look for the one thing that's not right in a situation.

They look for this little stain in this beautiful carpet and then their focus is on the stain. But this really bothers me. Why didn't they do anything about that stain?

But that stain is 2% of the carpet. Yeah, but they shouldn't have. Why don't they...

Drop the complaining and that already diminishes your sense of self. I don't know who I am anymore. And then come the problems, my problems, that I need to think about day and night.

Problematic situations, they've been going on for years. Complex, very complex. And you can wake up in the middle of the night and suddenly you get this overwhelming mind stream of your complex problems.

And they've been going on for years. But it's vital that you think about it now. Oh, think.

And underlying all that thinking is what's going to happen to me. So that sense of identity loves its problems, loves its enemies, loves conflict, but it never tells you that openly. It needs to remain unconscious, because if you make it conscious, you even start to laugh.

And that's very liberating. If you laugh at patterns that you discover within yourself and you see them, that's even sitting here is liberating when you suddenly see conditioned mind patterns. There's nothing personal in it, just human conditioned mind patterns.

And you see them. Seeing is the beginning of being free of them. Seeing means you're no longer totally identified with the pattern.

The main enemy really, it all boils down to the main enemy of the mind made self, the one thing that it doesn't like, it wants to get away from, it's not happy with, and often complains about, just really, it's this moment. It doesn't like it. Or it ignores it completely because the next moment is so much more important.

This is why I have to think and think about what's going to happen. This, just this moment at the most, it's a stepping stone that gets me to the next one that's more important than this, that's for sure. And what is the next moment?

It's future. And where is the future? Has anybody ever encountered it?

No. I've been waiting for it a long time. But all I could ever find was this moment.

But one day it's going to come. Just a little bit longer. And so you see what seems so overriding, so overwhelmingly real, time.

Past and future. Seems to dominate everything. You can't get out of time.

It just drags you along until finally you collapse and die. It seems so overwhelmingly real, this time thing, and yet nobody has ever encountered it. All you can ever experience, find, is this moment.

So if you go more deeply, you actually discover that time and thought are so intrinsically related as to be virtually one. And you discover all that future is, ultimately, is a thought form in the head, in the human mind. It's not here now.

Is the future here? Only this. Only now.

And then we can check again in five minutes' time. You can see the paradox. Five minutes later, it's still now.

Now, if we try to work this out intellectually, it won't take us anywhere. We might write a PhD about it. Whether time is real or not.

But all we need to see at first hand, that your life is always now. Of course it is. It's always this, just this.

The rest is thought forms. Now, because people are so trapped in thought forms with their sense of self, that they give that greater importance than this. And that's a delusion.

And so they are cut off from the deeper levels of their being, that can only be encountered when the movement away from this comes to an end. In other words, your attention, instead of being absorbed by thinking, moves into the immediacy of now. That is the meaning of waking up.

Of spiritual awakening. What do you awaken from? What do you awaken out of?

You awaken out of thought. Self-identification with thought. Into now.

And then the mind comes back and says, And now what? You may notice when your attention moves into now, a certain alertness comes with that. You may become more aware of your sense perceptions.

And you may also notice, when you are present in this moment, the compulsion to label all your sense perceptions and experiences drops away. And you are able to look at something, or more importantly someone, a human, but let's just stay with non-human for a while. You are able to look upon something, or listen to something, or touch something, without compulsively, immediately, mentally putting a label on it, calling it something, or arriving at some conclusion about it, or comparing it to something.

You can be with something like a tree or a flower, and simply look, without labeling. That is a new state of consciousness arising, where you are moving out of the trap, the prison of compulsive conceptualized thinking. And above all, where your sense of identity or your sense of self shifts from being the thinker or the thought, to being the awareness that is prior to thought.

That's an amazing thing to happen to a human being. It begins with such a simple thing as being able to look at something, or touch it, and it's being perceived within a field of spaciousness, or we could say stillness. Have you become unconscious?

No. There is consciousness, but not the labels, not thinking. There are many of you, because I know this is happening on the planet to more and more people now, there are many of you who already experience that in your daily life from time to time.

And you may not even notice that this is what's happening, that you are simply able to be with something, without calling it anything. And you may perceive that only as a peace in the background. There is a certain sense of peace in the background, and through that you are perceiving the world.

You can then walk through the city, or drive through the city mostly, here, without being there as a conceptualized entity and perceiving the world through the conditioned mind structures. So you are there behind the wheel of your car, a driving story of me. And whatever you perceive, only just enough to not be involved in an accident, but you're thinking about important things.

My life situation, which involves past and future, the future matters so much, I'm on my way, where to? The future. And you continuously miss this, this.

So the arising of spaciousness inside yourself is really what it is. And until you find some space within yourself, which even that is not quite right, because that space is the essence of who you are, without that space you can look for happiness for a hundred lifetimes. Where is it?

Because you're only looking to objects in your consciousness, believing that when I've accumulated enough objects in my consciousness, I'll be full and complete. Object in consciousness means thoughts. Object in consciousness means whatever happens to you becomes an object in consciousness.

You don't experience the world out there. Whatever you experience as the world, happens inside you. Who knows whether there's anything out there at all?

Everything that the speaker hears on the chair, where is that happening to you? The words, where are they? They are inside you.

They are arising in consciousness. So humans are looking for themselves through what I call sometimes object consciousness. They are obsessed with the world of objects, the world of things.

Not just material things around them, that of course they're also obsessed with. Situations, events, the next thing and another thing, and the world of things impinges upon you continuously, saying, this matters, everything matters. Oh, what's the next thing I need to deal with?

And you can never catch up, so many things. And your life becomes a burden of things, and then they're the things inside really. Every thought is an object that arises in consciousness.

And there's this stream of thinking, one thought after another. This is what Thoreau referred to when he said, our life is frittered away by details. Simplify, simplify.

Details are the worlds of things, objects in consciousness. So you get like a room full of furniture and you can't move in it anymore. And you think you need more.

No sense of spaciousness within. And potentially, the dimension of space consciousness as opposed to object consciousness, which is thought, is in everyone. Underneath the movement of thought, there's the vast spaciousness, which is already fully developed, fully complete in every human being.

And the essence of who you are is that not anything that arises in object consciousness, but you are the very spaciousness that is beyond objects, things. So really, all that is required is to discover in oneself that dimension of consciousness and thus realizing the fullness of being and of yourself that is already here. That's the end of seeking.

Not the end of doing, but the end of self-seeking through doing. Then doing becomes quite nice. It's a play.

You participate in the game of the universe. You cannot not do, so you might as well participate. You do.

It's a dance. But self-seeking goes out of the doing because you've already found yourself, not as a conceptual entity, as the depth, the still, spacious field within yourself. The future cannot help you to get there.

It can only prevent you from finding it. And what is the quickest way to realizing the truth of this? Is there a shortcut?

Your life becomes a burden of things and then there are the things inside, really. Every thought is an object that arises in consciousness. And there's a stream of thinking, one thought after another.

This is what Thoreau referred to when he said, our life is frittered away by details. Simplify, simplify. Details are the worlds of things, objects in consciousness.

So you get like a room full of furniture and you can't move in it anymore. And you think you need more. No sense of spaciousness within.

And potentially, the dimension of space consciousness as opposed to object consciousness, which is thought, is in everyone. Underneath the movement of thought, there's the vast spaciousness, already fully developed, fully complete in every human being. And the essence of who you are is that not anything that arises in object consciousness, but you are the very spaciousness that is beyond objects, things.

So really, all that is required is to discover in oneself that dimension of consciousness and thus realizing the fullness of being and of yourself that is already here. That's the end of seeking. Not the end of doing, but the end of self-seeking through doing.

Then doing becomes quite nice. It's a play. You participate in the game of the universe.

You cannot not do, so you might as well participate. You do. It's a dance.

But self-seeking goes out of the doing because you've already found yourself, not as a conceptual entity, as the depth, the still spacious field within yourself. You can't, the future cannot help you to get there. It can only prevent you from finding it.

And what is the quickest way to realizing the truth of this? Is there a shortcut? Is there something that does not give me time?

Because time is the illusion. If I think I need time to find that inner space, I'm deluded again. So how can I know this without making it into a future state that I want to achieve?

Which is another concept. How? And this is so simple.

That's the secret of the universe, as far as humans are concerned in their present evolutionary stage. The secret lies in simply no longer internally resisting, denying, or running away from what is at this moment. It's whatever is at this moment.

To find an inner alignment with the form that this moment takes. And the conceptualized egoic entity can't do that. But you can do that.

When you see the truth of it, there's the possibility of living in a state of yes to what is, an inner yes. The conceptualized egoic entity lives in the state of no to what is. And that is the greatest transformation happens when there's a shift in you internally from denying the present moment, because it's not yet enough, it's not really what I wanted, this shouldn't be happening, I want something else, I definitely don't want this, I want the next moment.

It's going to be much more complete. But you always have only this. And then the strange thing happens, at first sight it seems that the form that this moment takes, because that's all it is, there are not many moments in your life, there's only this moment ever.

But the form that this moment takes changes continuously, different forms come into that space of now, which is that inner space. Forms appear in the space of now, in your life. A situation, a person, an event, a place.

And very often, the form that this moment takes seems to be a limitation, it seems to limit me. I want to be limitless, I want to know myself as limitless. Many people feel that the form that this moment takes, how could I accept that, because this form limits me so much.

And this could be where you live, it could be relationships, it could be your physical body. You cannot not encounter limitations in the world of form. You can change, you can have slightly more pleasant limitations.

You could be sitting in a tiny little room and saying, I'm so limited here, I want to expand, I want to live in a mansion. And you might succeed. Ten years later, five years later, you live in a mansion, you seem to have expanded.

And then you sit in your mansion. What now? For a while it feels great, you have expanded because you have identified with the thought form of mansion, you have expanded.

But sooner or later, the mansion will limit you in other ways. Your new life situation will suddenly show you there are other limitations. You may become famous and suddenly discover that great limitations come with fame.

You are free of the limitations that came with poverty, and now you encounter other limitations that come with that. So, it's yes, you can play around with different forms in your life and experiment and expand into other forms, not expecting to find the limitless in the world of form and realizing in one way or another the form that this moment takes will be some form of limitation, that it is in the nature of form to be limited. And that's a deep realization.

And then the running away from the form that this moment takes, the reactive relationship to the form that this moment takes isn't there anymore. When you see the truth of this and are able to say yes to the form that this moment takes instead of resisting the form that this moment takes internally, which keeps you trapped in your own mental form. So, what does that mean?

It means, quite simply, you become friendly with what is. It doesn't mean now you are condemned to non-action. Out of that state of yes, intelligent action arises when it's needed, not when it's not needed.

You embrace what is, even if it seems very limited or limiting, because it already is. You can't remove is out of existence. You become internally aligned with that.

So when you say yes to what is, space arises, so to speak, around what is. This is a way of speaking, but that's all we can do here. A sense of space or spaciousness arises around the form that this moment takes.

And that liberates you from the limitations of form. And you cannot find the spaciousness by always running away from the forms that arise. But being with them, surrendering to the form that this moment takes is the key.

The inner surrender, whatever is, is part of the totality, the web of interconnectedness that is the universe. This event is part of that. There is a certain inevitability to the form that this moment takes.

Yes, then perhaps action arises and it changes. You're actually amazed how quickly the form that this moment changes when you don't resist it anymore internally. Because a greater intelligence comes into play now.

And miraculous things can happen even on the level of form. But they didn't happen when you lived in non-alignment with is. They only happen when you live in alignment with is.

And to some people that means yes to the most dreadful limitation. And that is why traditionally people who reached that realization found the most dreadful limitation in their life and surrendered to that. The archetype of that is Jesus on the cross.

This is the human archetype. This is true for each human being. The most unacceptable form of limitation that a human, and you don't need to be a Christian to believe this or to see the truth of it.

In fact if you're a Christian you may not see it. Because they tend to have a narrow interpretation of something that is very deep. So you have somebody on the, a human being in a situation that is a manifestation of the most extreme limitation.

Totally. And symbolically the words that came out of his mouth were at first, Why hast thou abandoned me, God? The last no.

The next words that came were Not my will but thy will be done. Which means thy will is the will of the one. Not to make it into a mental concept.

The will of the one is whatever is now. Not my will but thy will be done. A complete yes.

And at that moment the cross which is the symbol of the ultimate limitation becomes the symbol of the divine. It's the dual symbolism of the cross. It's a torture instrument.

And it's a symbol of the divine. And that is whatever may be happening in your life and be the greatest limitation in your life, it is not only the limitation, it's also the opening. When it's not internally resisted, the opening into space.

Because space comes with a yes to what is. You are no longer bound to what is. You are no longer bound to the form.

You know yourself as the formless, one life, one consciousness. That's the true happiness that lasts. The heart of happiness, the core of happiness, not the superficial happiness that goes hu hu hu hu hu and the next moment hu hu hu hu.

That's... So nothing needs to change for this to happen in your life, this transition. Whatever is, is the best that is for you at this moment.

You work with that. Say yes to that. Don't believe the mind when it says OK, I'll say yes when I get this out of the way.

And enormous power moves into your life. The very intelligence of the universe manifests through this form which then becomes an opening. And it's the end of suffering.

The end of the suffering entity. You may still get a toothache from time to time, but that is how it is too. Surrender to that also.

Surrender. That's all. No time is required for the shift in consciousness.

You can only do it now. Yes to now. And find yourself through that.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Talk Titled Give This Moment a Chance

[Speaker 1] (0:02 - 46:06)

Welcome to our gathering this afternoon. This is always the part that I like best, the silent beginning. I'm sure you know a statement, perhaps one of the most powerful statements in the Bible.

It's to be found, I believe, in the Old Testament. And it says, be still and know that I am God. And we presume that is God speaking.

Be still and know that I am God. This afternoon, let's explore what that means. Not just through the mind, not just through thinking.

Because, after all, thinking is not still. So we can exploit from the perspective of thought, but we cannot find it through thought. Thought is always some form of inner noise.

The noise can point to the stillness, as it does when these words are spoken. Be still and know that I am God. But that's only the pointer, that's not the stillness.

It's the signpost, it's not that to which it points. And yet signposts are helpful. We might be lost without a few signposts.

But not mistaking the signposts for the truth. So we will explore what that means to be still. From the point of view of the mind, yes.

But also from a deeper level of actually knowing that dimension of consciousness, because that's what it is, to know that dimension of consciousness directly in yourself. Now that word stillness is a very beautiful pointer. Be still and know that I am God.

But this implies that perhaps there is more to stillness than we had realised. Because to the mind, the continuous stream of thinking, stillness cannot hold enough interest for very long. And after a minute or two, the thinking mind might say, okay, I've understood stillness now, yes, it's important, and now let's move on to the next thing.

Because the thinking mind, the stream of thought, is always very interested in the next thing. It's always looking over there. It tends to miss this, because it's looking for something else.

It quickly loses interest in this. And it certainly would quickly lose interest in stillness, because it doesn't sound that exciting. Stillness, okay.

There must be more than stillness to God. And so the mind moves again into more, which is also what the mind is very interested in, the next thing, because it's interested in the next thing, because there's more that I can absorb into myself, grasping the next stimulating idea to hang on to or incorporate into your store of knowledge. And then the mind, the mind made sense of self, hopes that by adding more and more, it will eventually become complete and find itself fully, find that fulfillment, become completely yourself.

Who believes that you're already as complete as you could be? And certainly on the level of form, you're not. There's always more that you could do and learn and explore, and there's nothing wrong with that.

But being on a deeper level, the more essential level of who you are, perhaps that search for more is misleading you, believing that you can find yourself through adding more and you miss what's already here. Be still and know that I'm God. So still and know.

Now that is interesting because that implies there is within that realm of stillness a knowing. Usually we associate knowing or knowledge with thinking and thought activity and having labels for things, putting labels onto things, knowing through concepts, through mental labels. And this is what in our civilization we call intelligence, that ability, the ability to use your mind in that way.

Then if you can do that well, if you have many concepts, a complex structure of mental concepts and many labels, then you are an intelligent person as defined by our civilization. And those people who cannot handle that well, perhaps are not quick enough with attaching labels to things and analyzing and they are called non-intelligent, people who are no good at solving IQ tests, then you have a low IQ. My IQ is very low.

The mind just doesn't work in that way. But fortunately I'm lucky because I know there's more to intelligence than that and there is another way of knowing that is not knowing through labels and concepts, but knowing directly. Knowing through stillness.

Every great artist creates out of that stillness. Even the great scientific discoveries, the breakthroughs come when the searching comes to an end through mind and a stillness arises. And out of that suddenly the one creative, the one thought that makes all the difference, the insight, the realization, suddenly comes out of that.

For an artist the creative flow comes out of that state. There's the canvas or whatever the artist uses and then he or she sits and enters that state of stillness. Then the creative flow happens and then perhaps even words may be spoken or written but they arise from there, out of that deeper level.

Many people have reported a shift in consciousness from being trapped in the mental noise like almost everybody else to entering a state of great peace, serenity and aliveness which is that state of stillness. And many people have reported finding that when they thought they were going to die any moment in a situation of great danger. And I'm sure you've all read accounts of people who reported that in the last few moments an inner shift happened, fear dissolved completely and suddenly they said, I felt this great serenity and peace in which I knew something beyond words and beyond concept.

I knew something that is very hard to put into words. Some people said, I knew that all is well and there's nothing to fear. Through that stillness, through that peace, there was a knowing and that knowing is the knowing of essence, not the knowledge of things.

All we know in our civilization is we explore forms, things through the mind which is thought forms. We cultivate that knowing, that knowledge and accumulate more and more. At universities there are places where knowledge is accumulated and more and more, there's a huge increase in scientific journals.

Even the specialists become more and more specialized in tiny areas of knowledge which you dissect more and more into tinier and tinier bits of knowledge. So the mind moves into that outward movement, scientific inquiry, and there's fine, there's nothing wrong with that, that's the outward movement of the mind. But we've gone that way for a long time.

When we've gone that way for so long that for most people, the deeper dimension within themselves, they don't even know it exists. All they know, all they know is the continuous stream of thinking in their heads with which they're completely identified. Every thought matters and they're drawn, dragged along by that never-ending stream of mental noise.

One thought leading to the next and the next and the next. Just as you can observe in people who talk a lot, they do that verbally, what happens within everybody in the head anyway. But when you observe a person who cannot stop speaking, then you can learn something about the human mind.

And when you see how there's not the tiniest gap in that stream, one thing leads to another and another and another, and it's all one stream, and you've been trying to get up and get out of that situation, get away from that person, and there wasn't even a gap long enough to say, I need to go now. And sometimes after half an hour, you finally, that person is catching his or her breath, and then you can get that in and say, okay, it's actually quite late now, I need to go. But that is the human mind.

And within almost everybody, and it's so normal, nobody questions that the inner, the noise in the head never stops. Well, nobody finds that strange. And yet it's the only species on the planet that lives within that continuous noise.

If you observe an animal, you observe that an animal is, a lot of the time, even although some animals make noises, but a lot of the time the animal is actually quite still and watches, just there, moves, rests completely, never trying to get somewhere, trying to rest, just resting, or trying to be something that it is not. It is what every animal is itself completely, because it doesn't live through mental noise. What is created through continuous identification with mental noise is a mentalized, mental conceptualized sense of self.

Then your whole identity is arrived from whatever stream of thoughts are going through your head. The thoughts are telling you and repeating to you the story of me, me. And it is problematic always.

It cannot not be problematic. There is the belief of the mind made self that it can arrive at a point, at some point in the future, when my life ceases to be problematic. But that's an illusion, because problematic is built into the very structure of that sense of self that is based on mental noise.

If it weren't problematic, the noise would cease. It's the problems that keep the noise going. And so it's the problems that keep the sense of self going.

It needs its problems. It doesn't know that. It says, no, I'm looking for an end to my problems, my suffering, and my dilemmas, and my conflicts.

I'm looking to get out of it. But the structure doesn't want that. The self needs conflict, problems.

The mind made noise-based sense of me never at ease with what is, this moment. It doesn't actually like this now. It's on its way somewhere more important.

Where it perceives an end to its problems. And that movement away from now is what creates the problems. The very search for an end perpetuates the problem making.

And amazingly, humans have gotten themselves into a very strange knot. Mental knot tied into some, and can't get out. That explains when you look at human history, why it looks so mad.

What is going, what are they doing? Read the 20th century history. What is going on here?

Are they insane? They must be. And it's always easy to say, no, they are insane, but we are not.

But of course, a truer perspective to look at humanity from a deeper perspective, then you can say humanity, you can look at it as one organism. And within that one organism of humanity, of which every human being is a cell, in that organism of humanity, now when you look at what humanity is doing to itself, then you can see that this one organism lives in a condition of disease. It's attacking itself.

Continuously. Not only on a large scale, through the collective conflict that we have seen and still continue to see in the world between nations and religions, tribes, but also the conflict between individuals, the continuous conflict in companies, in businesses where people work, and the continuous conflict within each individual, as if there were two or three or four of you. Mind made two voices.

One arguing with the other. One accusing you of something, but it's all in the head. And that's what happens when you get trapped in a conceptualized, noise-based sense of self, when you are completely identified with a stream of thinking.

So what arises is an egoic entity. Egoic means completely identified with a conditioned mind. Believing it to be yourself.

So you have this little egoic me, looking to somehow make itself more secure, enhance its sense of self, somehow, through something or other. And it's looking out for the next thing that it can add. But it's also looking out in fear for the next thing that might take something away from me, the accumulated mental content of me and my identifications, with this and that, with possessions, with status, with knowledge, with external appearance, with perhaps even spiritual attainment, me.

So we can see that the human condition, how do we get out of this dilemma of being trapped in that? All teachings, ancient, present, all true spiritual teachings point to the possibility of living in a different state from the usual state. All spiritual teachings recognize the usual state as dysfunctional.

Suffering, the Buddha calls it. Sin, Jesus calls it. Illusion, the Hindu teachings call it.

And then you have more recent fringe beliefs that point to the similar thing. It's just another perspective. There are fringe beliefs that say extraterrestrials experimented on humanity and something went wrong, or something like that, which is possible.

So they all point, I'm not saying you should believe in this perspective or in that perspective, but simply to see that they all point, they've all recognized a basic dysfunction in humans, and then they all also recognize that there is a way beyond that. Until recently, until very recently, not many human beings were able to live that liberated way of existing in this world. Most humans, the teachings of the ancient masters were made into, to a large extent, were made into mind stuff.

Mental identified. They repeated certain words and began to identify with those words of the teachings, not realizing that those words were only signposts. Be still and know that I am God.

You could even, there you could, this is a statement that's not easy to make into a mental belief structure, but the mind could manage even that. And you could build a whole system of belief around stillness. I believe in stillness.

We believe in stillness. What do you believe? You better believe the same, because we are right.

And that's where the egoic sense of self again, you identify with thought forms, and then you get your sense of identity from being right about something on your personal level or collective level. Either me, I am right, or we, the collective egos are even more mad than the individual egos. And if you look at the evils perpetrated, the suffering inflicted by humans and other humans, the greatest amount of suffering has always been inflicted by, not by the criminals.

The criminals contribute to a tiny fraction of human suffering. No, respectable people who became part of a collective egoic identity, a religious group, a political group, a political movement, an ideology, mental, and derived their sense of self from that. And to keep it going, they needed to have their enemies.

And the enemies are those who don't believe what we believe, because that's the truth. And then you can, having an enemy then strengthens that sense of identity. So they love their enemies, not in the sense of Jesus.

They love them, because they need their enemies. They love to have enemies, rather. Because through having enemies you define your sense of self collectively, but individuals do it also.

The enemies of the individual egoic self is their problems, and they're in their family. The situations that they are in, but they're antagonistic towards whatever situation they're here in now is never enough. In fact, they don't like it, trying to get away from it.

The now is made into the archenemy of the ego. Never embracing the is-ness of this moment, which is after all there ever is, never fully embracing it, saying yes to this moment because that's all you ever have. You might as well say yes to it.

No, the ego doesn't. It loves to make the now into an enemy, and thereby strengthens its problematic sense of me. So to see that those things are built into the structure of an identity that is built on mental noise.

If you can never get out of your mental noise, then that's how you are going to live. So we believe in stillness, and then you look for those who don't believe because they will make your identity stronger, and then you start even killing them because you can call them the unbelievers. You attach a mental label to a person or group of people.

The label immediately obscures to you the reality of who they are because all you're relating to is the moment you attach a mental label to a person, mental noise, thought, and you completely believe in that label that you attach to that person. You call that person something, this, that, or the other, or that group of people. And then you've deadened already, this is the first act of violence against another human being, is to attach a mental label and completely identify with that mental label even though it may show you that mental label may contain a perspective of the truth, a tiny perspective, but not the totality, a tiny fraction, but you believe that to be the totality.

And so you've committed the first act of violence. Any further violence now is easier because the aliveness of that human being has already been covered up by that mental label that you've put on. It could be racial, it could be religious, it could be political, it could be anything.

So some of the militant Muslims, they call all those who don't agree with their beliefs the unbelievers, and Christians used to do the same until very recently, a few hundred years ago. They would kill you if you didn't believe exactly what they believed. And so I read an interview with the militant Muslims and they said, of course we'll kill, they're unbelievers, we'll kill them, we'll have to kill them, they're unbelievers.

The label obscures to you what you no longer know what you're doing. It deadens everything through the abstraction because every thought is an abstraction, every thought is a concept and it deadens the sense of aliveness. You can then inflict any horror on the world and you don't know it anymore because you no longer sense its aliveness and you no longer sense your own aliveness because you've done the same to yourself.

You have then identified with an ideology, derived your sense of self from certain streams of thoughts in your head. And so that's who you are. Always uneasy, always needing conflict, needing problems.

Me, with my little past that I identify with, my personal past or the past of our group, our collective, whatever it is. And then living in that sense of non-fulfillment which it always is, the deep lack, something like, and then looking to the future to complete itself. And it will do anything in the now to get to that point of completion in the future.

It will kill in the now for a better world. That was, communism was a beautiful experiment. One day perhaps true communism will arrive on the planet.

But that was an experiment made by people who were not, were totally identified still with their minds. Equality for everybody, no more possessions, personal possessions, wonderful ideas. We need to create that world.

We envisage that better world. And what do they do? China, Russia, in their own countries, almost as many as 10 million people had to be killed to arrive at that point of creating a better world.

So this is what happens on a large scale if you make the now into a means to an end that you need to arrive at in order to complete yourself, collectively or individually. Now you can see how mad it is when you look at the collective manifestation of this. But in people's personal lives, they do the same.

They kill the aliveness of this moment, the aliveness of life, the depths of aliveness that is here now. They don't really kill it, but it's totally obscured. And then they're looking for it in a mental abstraction called future and they're going to that.

So everybody lives in that way. Now when you see an extreme manifestation of it in the form of an ideological or political movement that kills people in the now in order to arrive at a better world, then you see so obvious how mad it is. And it's not so easy sometimes to see in one's own lives how you continuously kill the aliveness of this moment or rather obscure it through living identified with mental noise all the time and looking for an enhanced version of yourself, mind made, in the future.

Where am I? Oh, it's there, I'm there, I need to arrive there. Because that contains that which will fulfill me, that relationship, that job, that possession, that status, or that spiritual attainment.

And that's the, we need to point out the transformation of human consciousness away from the madness to sanity that all the ancient teachings have pointed to. They've seen the dysfunction, as we saw, and then they said, yes, but a way beyond is possible. A different state is possible.

A different state, a transformed state of consciousness is possible for humans. Buddha calls it the end of suffering. The normal state is suffering.

Jesus calls it salvation or the kingdom of heaven. In Hinduist teachings it's called liberation although Jesus also uses that term, freedom. And so they all point to that.

But there's a danger in that pointing because the mind made self immediately creates a new image of a perfect version of myself called enlightened or liberated, the spiritual attainment, spiritually perfect, which I need to arrive at. So the same movement, mental movement that seeks to enhance itself through adding more, more future, more knowledge, more spiritual experience is still operating even in those people who have left behind more rudimentary identifications such as possessions. Perhaps you've been through that.

You accumulated possessions. Then perhaps you lost them again. Then you accumulated some more and you could see it did not fulfill you.

Even the big car only fulfilled you for a little while and then it was just another car. And the relationship didn't really fulfill you. You thought it did for a while.

So humans have been seeking that fulfillment in situations, through situations, through places, through people and never found it. But the mind, the search of the mind made self continues. It says, OK, I haven't found it yet, but I will find it.

I will find, complete myself. Because that strange sense in everybody, I haven't arrived yet. It's not, there is something that I have not, I'm not fully myself yet.

And so the search continues and you become a spiritual seeker. And so you, a spiritual seeker seeks more spiritual knowledge perhaps, more spiritual experiences and perhaps the ultimate experience of liberation, in the future of course. And so you miss something that is already here, the fullness of life that is already the essence of your being.

And that is inseparable from this moment. If you miss this moment, you miss everything because there is never anything else. But the mind made self says, this moment is just not interesting enough.

Let's move on to the next one. And it looks sometimes from just, if you look at the external form of this moment, it may not look that great. You're stuck in a car, traffic going from here to there.

What's so great about this moment? And then you're sitting in an office answering the phone. What's so great about this moment?

But you need to give this moment a chance. If you immediately move on to a mental projection of next moment, you never give this moment a chance. So that's what we'll do here.

Many of you are already engaged in that deepening process, which is what it is, where you give this moment a chance. You allow this moment to be as it is, because it already is. And you no longer demand that this moment, which is the form life takes right now, which has come out of the totality of the universe, the totality of the universe has appeared here and now in the form of this moment.

And so you can be antagonistic towards that totality of the universe and say, no, that's not what I wanted. It doesn't fit into the story of me. I didn't want this situation.

I never asked for it. It's not in the script in my head, how my life should have developed. This partner shouldn't be here, my wife.

That was the wrong choice. It all went wrong at some point. And my job wasn't the one that it was supposed to be.

It wasn't in the script. Something went wrong here. My children were supposed to turn out and achieve all the things that I couldn't achieve, and they didn't.

They did the opposite. They became hippies or whatever they did. It all went wrong somewhere, that whole script of my life.

But you still believe in it somehow, so you think through more future, you can put it right. I don't want to say everything is bad, but to see that on the level of storyline and mental arranging your life in a certain way, and seeking to complete your identity through something that is mind-made, a conceptualized, a better conceptualized sense of self, a better self, a more complete self, a more secure self, you never get there. Because that is the one thing that future cannot give you.

Everything else, future is great. You need it. You need future to learn a language.

You need future to make money. You need future, if you're looking for a partner, you have to spend some time looking. You need future to explore a new country.

You have to plan and then you go there. You need time, future, fine. The only thing that you don't need future for is finding yourself, who you are at the deepest level.

Who you are on the level of form, that of course there you can add things, learn new skills, it's fine. But if you're seeking an enhanced sense of self through that new skill, it will take you again into frustration and suffering. Because nothing out there can give you that fulfilled sense of self except the momentary illusion of a fulfilled sense of self, an enhanced sense of self.

And you have all been through that. You have experienced the momentary illusion of an enhanced and fulfilled sense of self, perhaps at the moment of your wedding. Wedding is a very happy moment.

And you say, my life is finally working. And then many of you experienced a kind of letdown after a while. Some moved into the opposite of a wedding, which is divorce.

And that's painful. And others thought, well maybe I made a mistake here in my choice of partner. But well, should I get out now or should I?

But then what do I do then? Maybe I'll, so you compromise with that. And you see how, and then the illusion comes many other times that now myself is fully grown.

Even you might graduate from college and you suddenly feel I made it. You don't realize that the problems are only starting now. And so to see on, if you're looking for completion on that level of time, conceptualized self through time, can't get there.

And then the miracle is you don't need time for the one essential realization in your life. The one thing that truly matters, you don't need more time. In fact, you don't need more of anything to make yourself complete.

To realize that that completeness of who you are, which has nothing to do with the mental story of me, my little past and my little future, at the end of which is the gravestone, all that problematic story, in the end, it bursts like a soap bubble.

[Speaker 2] (46:07 - 46:07)

Pop!

Oh, what was all that about? In the words of Shakespeare, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. And you missed the one thing that matters absolutely.

Finding yourself, finding the essence of your being beyond the form which is temporary. So we've seen how the delusion operates and how that delusion continuously creates suffering in your life. Always you have to go back to the unhappiness resurfaces again and again.

Even when you sort out something here, suddenly something goes wrong there. Everybody who has lived long enough knows that life doesn't leave you alone for that long. Some people live in such a way that they almost feel that life has become their enemy.

Or God, if they say, God has become my enemy, why does God do that to me again? Just another thing and another. As a friend of mine said, when she came to an end of her partnership after a few years and said goodbye to him on the train, he was leaving on a train, and after he left she shouted out aloud, God, this time you have gone too far.

And often you get to that point. Why does God or life put so many obstacles in my path? I know where I want to get to, but always something happens to spoil it.

Even the great house, I got it, and something happened to spoil it. That's in the nature of life, phenomenal existence, that things never stay around for very long, and they're not that fulfilling if you're looking for fulfillment. They're quite nice when you don't look for self-fulfillment through the things of this world.

They are very pleasant and they come and go. But when you're looking for self-fulfillment through the things of this world, through situations, through people, through conditions, through attainments, then that's very frustrating because no place and no person and no situation is going to make you happy for long. And when you see that, the first truly spiritual thing happens, and that is you give up the demand that the world should make you happy.

You give up the demand that a person, a place, a situation, a condition, or a possession should make you happy. Oh, well, that's a burden that's lifted off my shoulders. That demand, make me happy, make me fulfilled, complete, complete me, if you don't demand that anymore from the world.

Oh, okay. So here, I no longer demand that self-fulfillment. It all comes down to self, self with a false sense of self that the Buddha pointed to as the one great illusion, the self.

Jesus pointed to when he said, deny thyself. All the ancient Hindu teachings point to the illusory nature of people's sense of identity, personalized sense of identity, and nothing beyond that. Just a little uneasy me as the center of the universe seeking to get bigger somehow through their demands.

But the world never obliges. That's the, so, okay, how do we get out of this dilemma? There is a, I sometimes use the expression portals.

How do we get into that new state of consciousness that all the teachings, the ancient teachings point to, but not many people got it. They made it into belief structures. The signposts were made into belief structures.

Then they enhanced their sense of self through identifying with collective belief structures. So the ego grew. This is why religions have also created as much suffering as political ideologies because they became only belief structures, although at the essence of all the great religions there shines the truth.

Somewhere there is the pearl of, the truth is there, but you have to look through many layers of dense mental belief structures to see the essence that lies there at the core of the great religions. It's there and it's beautiful. And of course it's, but the essence really is in you because that's what the essence of the great religions point to.

It points to the essence of your very being and the possibility of knowing that, but what the mind has done, it has said, okay, it's possible. Salvation is possible. The end of suffering is possible.

Enlightenment is possible. All I need is more future before I can add that to myself. And that's the spiritual seeker that is then born.

The spiritual seeker says, I just need a bit more time to add that to myself. And that's the last delusion. And that is a quite a radical realization that you cannot find yourself through time, through more future, or through more of anything.

And the portal, the one portal that takes you out of being trapped in the world of mental noise, which always lives through past and future, sustains itself through past and future, the portal is this moment. The whole mind movement, the whole conceptualized sense of self, or the false self, the fictitious sense of me, is seen as an illusion when you go through the portal of now. And how do you go through this portal, the spiritual portal of now?

Now means now, this now, there's only this now. It takes different forms, but your life has always been, always will be now. Nothing ever happens in your life.

Nothing is ever experienced, felt, that is not now. It is, life is now. So you acknowledge the now, and then the little thing that you do as your spiritual practice, most spiritual practices have an element of future to them, because you need to arrive at a state of perfection, mentally projected state of perfection.

And that's the drawback with many spiritual practices. Some spiritual practices are fine, they're actually designed to remove future, but then there's still the practitioner who's going to add more future, because he wants to get somewhere through the practice. So, the one spiritual practice that has no time to it, and that you cannot really become good at through time, is to allow this moment to be as it is, instead of internally resisting it, through the mental judgment, complaining, so that you know how often the mind is complaining, and the emotional contraction of, I don't want, where's the next moment, show me the next one.

Denying this always, never embracing this. The only place where life can ever be, and you never embrace life, and you're always running towards a pseudo-life which is a mental abstraction in the head, a thought form called future, a future me, an enhanced version of me. It's like the cars, you think each model gets better, but in the end they run out of, and now the cars look the same as the old ones.

So here we have the most powerful spiritual practice, is to embrace this moment, no matter what form it takes, it can take many forms, some look good, some don't look good, but they all have something in common, they are the suchness of this moment, and the mind-made egoic entity can only survive through non-acceptance of now, at the basis for this contracted, uneasy, problem-making sense of self, basis for that sense of self, is a denial of now, which ultimately is a denial of life, because life and now are one, which ultimately is a denial of God.

So the little egoic mental entity is at war with the universe, with God, me against the world, me against God, that's not conscious, but it's the unconscious underlying attitude of the ego. So what happens now, something opens up in you as you align yourself with life, by aligning yourself with now, no matter what form this now takes, there is an acceptance of this, because it is. Oh, you allow this moment to be as it is.

Now the mind says, don't do that, nothing will ever change again. And the mind says, you will be stuck in this now for the rest of your life. And it's the very now that you don't want to be in.

The mind says, if I say yes, I will be stuck in this relationship that I don't want to be in, I'll be stuck in my job that I don't want to be in, I'll be stuck in the place where I live, I don't want to be, I'll be stuck in my body, which is not well enough, I don't want to be in that state of health that is not good enough, my financial circumstances, whatever it may be, I'll be stuck with my state of dissatisfaction with who I am, and I'll be stuck with this little incomplete self that hasn't made it.

This is what the mind will tell you. The strange thing is, when you allow this moment to be, you align yourself with the incredible aliveness and intelligence that operates in this now, that cannot operate anywhere else. The one intelligence, the one consciousness that underlies all forms of life, the one life, the one intelligence of which every form of life is only a temporary expression which comes and then evaporates.

A temporary expression of that one that is the essence of your being, that is you prior to form. The one consciousness, that's the place where you and God merge. So that is what you align yourself with when you say yes to what is.

Now a strange thing happens. It's a miracle. We started with this beautiful statement about stillness.

Now stillness can be made into another problem by the mind and the mind-made self because when the mind-made self hears about stillness, it says, okay, I would like to get there, but obviously I'm not there. So I have a new problem. I'm trying to reach the state of I just can't get there.

This is awful. I know it must exist. They talk about it.

I can't get there for more than a little moment and then it's gone. You see? And then the little voice in the head, you see, you can't do it.

It's no good. You might as well give up. You've been doing all that spiritual stuff for so long and you see, you can't do it.

You still can't be still. So when the mind hears the message, the signpost pointing to the truth, it'll make a problem out of it. So many spiritual seekers have added a big problem to themselves because they are spiritual seekers, desperately seeking.

So, stillness? How do I get from the state of mental noise to the stillness without making it into future, a state to be achieved and thus creating another problem? And the miracle is when you allow this moment to be as it is, not only do you align yourself with that great intelligence that operates in stillness.

Intelligence is so much vaster than the little mind, the noisy mind, which is a small expression of the one intelligence that runs the entire universe, most of which functions in complete stillness. So that stillness is primordial intelligence itself. And that is already within you.

The wonderful thing is that stillness is not something that you need to achieve or add to yourself because it's there under the mental noise. It's already there as the essence of your being. So you cannot possibly need time to get it because the pool of stillness, I'm using a kind of image here, which is the place where you and God meet, merge, is already there, simply covered up by mental noise.

But most of the mental noise, the compulsion to think and be identified with thinking is to do with seeking an enhanced sense of self through future. That's why, and to keep the story of me going by thinking and talking about me and my story and my problems, that creates the compulsion, the compulsive thinker. When you allow this moment to be, a stillness arises.

You suddenly, it's there. It was the denial of now that obscured to you the dimension of stillness, which is the dimension of true intelligence, but also the dimension out of which love and joy arise. And that was obscured by the mental noise.

Now, here is a now. Something happens in it, in this field of now, let's say, well, let's take this instead of thinking of a possible now, let's take this now. If you say yes to it, completely, it has a certain form.

What you say yes to, first of all, is the form that this now takes. Even if it looks boring, uninteresting, not stimulating enough, okay, I say yes anyway. Here I am, sitting here.

The mind says, you shouldn't have come here, you have so many problems to solve. This isn't solving your problems, is it? And so you're just here.

Okay. I allow this moment to be, whatever form it takes. It happens to take this form.

Alright. The stillness suddenly, and what I'm talking about now, one cannot really talk about. It goes beyond words.

But since I'm sitting up here, I'll use words anyway. Just know that the words are only approximations to the truth. They only point a little bit.

Any moment, any form that this moment takes, as you know, there's only one moment ever. It's the one moment, your life is always now. The form it takes changes.

But you accept whatever form it takes, because it is the suchness of this moment. This acceptance, this allowing, suddenly makes you aware of a, and this is only an approximation, a spaciousness around the form of this moment. The allowing creates a sense of, you become aware of a sense of space, spaciousness around the form of this moment.

And that is a stillness. It's always there. But the stillness cannot be grasped.

You can't say, okay, here's the stillness and I've got it now. The stillness is the essence of your very being. The unconditioned, pure awareness, pure consciousness, out of which all forms come, into which all forms dissolve.

So the yes to what is, in a very subtle way, no matter what happens, if you accept it fully, there's a stillness or a spaciousness around it suddenly. And you sense that within and without. This allowing, a sense of space.

And there you have the same event, somebody shouting at you, the car breaking down, and you simply say, oh, well, that's the form this moment takes. That's what is.

Something goes wrong, so to speak.

Life always does that, as you know. In the now, it can only go wrong in the now. Something breaks down, you lose something, and it is.

Oh, okay. That's the is-ness of this moment. I might as well say yes to it, because it already is.

What can I do? You cannot fight what is. You can take a step then to remedy something, but in the meantime, it is.

This is a very subtle... At first, you may not immediately sense that spaciousness as stillness, but it is stillness arising. And the more you live in the yes, the more you will sense an undercurrent of peace, which is another way of speaking of the stillness.

You sense an undercurrent of alive, vibrantly alive peace, or spaciousness in your life, no matter what happens. That undercurrent is there, because what happens is allowed to happen. And through allowing, you become deeper than the mind-made self, which cannot allow, which is a form identity, a psychological form of me.

And the psychological form of me perpetuates itself through reactivity to other forms of life that arise in the now. The psychological form of me exists in a personalized, reactive relationship to life. A personalized, reactive relationship to forms that arise, people, situations, places.

It reacts, and in most cases, it's in disagreement with this form, this situation, this person. It tries to get away from it. And so it strengthens through its reactivity, it strengthens itself.

The form identity needs to react, be in a reactive relationship to other forms, people, situations, places. That's how it keeps itself going. The reactive relationship comes to an end when you allow this moment to be, then the psychological form of me also ceases to operate.

And who you are, suddenly, beyond that form which still exists, because you have a past, and undeniably you have a certain past, but your self is no longer, your sense of identity isn't derived from it. You realize, that's the story, that's what happened to me. Through the allowing, a deepening happens.

Through the non-allowing of what is, you remain shallow and identified with the mental psychological form of me. A very shallow human being, just living up here on the surface, always no depth. There is a depth, but you don't know it.

Always reactive. And that's how people live. Always reaching out for this or fearing that.

And the world is a, they're looking to the world and the future for ultimate fulfillment, and fear it because it might take something away. So, grasping here, fearing there, shallow. Allowing deepens you.

The yes brings about a deepening where you, something opens up through the yes to what is. Isn't that too simple? This can't be right.

Spiritual attainment is supposed to be difficult. It's supposed to take time. Arduous.

Well, this is the narrow gate that leads to life. Just this. The now is quite narrow.

The narrow gate that leads to life, or as Jesus puts it, abundant life. In other translations, called the fullness of life. Jesus talks about that.

I want you to have the fullness of life. I want you to have abundant life. He's not talking about the forms that life can take.

He's not predicting the arrival of consumer goods and shopping malls. Because if he had been predicting shopping malls, we would now have arrived at the kingdom of heaven. So when he talks about abundant life, it's not the abundance of forms, it's the depths and the intensity of aliveness.

It's not the formal, the forms that life can take. And seeking yourself through a proliferation of forms, that's why there's such fascination for shopping. This is one of the many ways in which the self, the egoic self, attempts to add something to itself.

To make itself a little bit bigger. Not that there's anything wrong with shopping, but the compulsion to add is often there. We don't really need that many things, but we need an enhanced identity.

That's why there's the grasping. Abundance of life, the fullness of life, that is already here, that you do not need future for. And through the yes to what is, that suddenly reveals itself as a deep sense of aliveness and peace that's already here.

So the yes deepens you, the non-reaction. Now, again, be careful. The mind will create a new thing that says I must not be reactive anymore.

Many times reactivity will still come in. What do you do with it when it comes? You just, the reaction comes and then you detect it.

That's enough. You detect it. And what do you do once you detect it?

Do you say, go away, I don't want to react. Oh, I'm reacting again. That's another reaction on top of the reaction.

The moment you detect a reaction, oh, there it is, another reaction. What do you do with it? You allow it to be.

Then the reaction exists within the spaciousness of allowing. Then you are no longer in the reaction and you realize you are not that which reacts. You are the spacious, the space around the reaction.

You are not that which happens. You are the space in which it happens. That's how deep you are.

That's how vast you are. And never again are you going to look for yourself in something that happens. But by allowing what happens to be, realize the depth within your very being.

And that is the alignment with, and I use that word with great care, the alignment with God through this yes. Another way of putting that, of course, is surrender, spiritual surrender. Not surrender in the negative sense of I just don't care anymore.

Okay, do what you like, I don't care anymore. God, do what you like. Okay, don't care.

That's not surrender because something in you is still strongly resisting. You're just pretending not to care. I don't care anymore.

That person is in strong resistance. That's not it. Surrender is the yes to now.

Surrender to God is the yes to now. And surrender is alignment. It doesn't mean you become weak in surrender.

You become weak in non-surrender. The one power that operates throughout the universe is there, can flow through you fully in the state of surrender. The only power there is, you can find in the state of surrender.

The alignment with the one so that you become a beautiful, temporary but beautiful expression of that one consciousness through the human form. And then everything changes when you're connected with that. Even the form that your life takes that before was so dreadfully important to get it right, suddenly a greater ease comes into the way in which your external life unfolds.

Oh, it's quite nice. Not that nothing will ever leave you. Things come, things go.

There's gain, there's loss. That's how phenomenal existence operates. That's part of the dance of forms in your life.

And that's accepted. And you can then enjoy the dance of form because you don't need any particular form to add to who you are, to add to the self, the sense of self. So I'm pointing to what in some traditions is called no self, the state of being the spaciousness, being the stillness through allowing.

In Buddhism, it would be called the state of no self. And that's a way of putting it. That's why one Buddhist master when asked to define the essence of Buddhism simply said, that's very simple, the essence of Buddhism, no self, no problem, Buddhism.

Oh, is that it? Yeah, okay. And other traditions call it the self, finding the self.

In India, it's called the self, the Atman, the God within you. It doesn't matter what word you use. They all point to the same.

Be that which allows. Then you are like God because God is like space. Everything is allowed to be.

Forms come and go. The egoic entity says, death is the worst thing that can happen in this life. Because what is death?

Death is the end of a form. A form of life dissolves. But the egoic entity is a form identity so it fears the end of any form.

It fears death. It doesn't know itself beyond form. So death is the most dreadful thing for the mind-made sense of self and you can see why our civilization almost completely denies death.

Don't mention it. Don't talk about it. Just pretend that all is well.

Nobody is going to die. Nobody can ever see a dead body. It would be hard if you demanded to see a dead body.

They would put you in prison or say, what's wrong with you? In other cultures it's still, you see dead bodies everywhere and you get a much truer vision of human existence because there are dead bodies everywhere except that we hide them. So continuously death is there as forms dissolving and that in itself has incredible beauty and sacredness to it.

A form dissolves when you can truly accept that moment can only happen this moment, death. You can truly accept any kind of death that happens now. It could be as simple as the loss of a possession that you had identified with so there is a little death inside you.

Or it could be the death, the actual death of somebody close to you and you sit with that person totally allowing this moment. No denying. Not even saying you are dying.

Just, who knows? They may not at that moment. Just allowing this moment totally and then there is that suddenly the peace and depth that you are surrounded by that is within and without.

And if that person also allows that moment of death to be then at that moment of death you can see shining through the form an incredible aliveness. If you have sat with a dying person occasionally it can happen. If that dying person surrenders totally to that moment and flowering happens and something shines through that is not of this form and is like a light, a last.

And so death is very sacred to the egoic mind it's dreadful, dreadful and yet it's beautiful. Whenever a form dissolves God shines through that opening. That's why many people have realized who they are have realized God not because things were added unto them not because things were they got more of something but they realized it through loss through death of something in their lives.

Great loss which is a form of death or they realized it through feeling I have very little future left death is approaching wonderful opportunities any kind of death so there are many accounts of people realizing the depths of their being not through wonderful things being given to them oh now I've got it all but through things being taken away life tears something away from you and there's a hole suddenly where before there was something you've lost your possessions and your wife whatever, suddenly it's gone it leaves a hole that the ego fears dreadfully because it's a hole in the ego itself and if you bring surrender to it enormous stillness comes suddenly through that opening and that's a miracle and you can't explain that what is this? Peace you can't understand it the peace that passes all understanding the essence of who you are and here the beauty about true spiritual teaching is that you can have access to that be that without having to face death or huge disaster in your life just as you sit here you've had enough death already you've had enough loss already in your life otherwise you wouldn't be here that's why you've realized there is something beyond that many of you have already recognized the truth that is being spoken here you already are in the process of that deepening of going beyond mind made images so as you sit here without needing some great disaster or suffering that dimension is opening up and you hear it and as you hear it you recognize the truth of it and it becomes the living truth in you not a mentalized the living realization in you and you have suffered to reach that point where you can sense the depth of this message within your being recognize the truth of it within your being means you've suffered enough you've suffered enough to recognize the truth now that's enough you don't need more suffering now me, me my problems, my suffering you don't need that anymore you might still get physical pain occasionally that's pain not suffering suffering is a story of me poor me angry me so the primordial spiritual practice yes allowing the now to be acknowledging the now no matter what form it takes and as you go through life many times you will detect that you're in a state of not allowing and then oh, there goes another no to this moment ok and this ok that's how it is again, there's the spaciousness even there alright here goes another contraction don't want to be here alright let there be another contraction oh, and then something happens to the contraction that's the strange thing when you bring the yes into the no it does something to the no you can't fail in this practice that's the beauty about this spiritual practice no matter what you do you cannot fail in other spiritual practices you can fail miserably part of the aliveness of this moment is the aliveness that you can feel in your body as you sit here very subtle at first in your hands, your feet, your legs every cell is alive and that comes naturally when you say yes to now you naturally begin to sense not only the aliveness within what appears to be a physical body but also an aliveness all around you which before got deadened by continuous mental labels the flowers, the nature, the sky, the sea everything alive everything sacred the now is always sacred but you have to be there to know that the only place of sacredness is now and now is always sacred even when it looks dreadful even the moment of death is sacred perhaps the most sacred our physical bodies have certain needs some bodies may want to go to the washroom we will meet again here in 15 minutes in the now thank you awakening is a spiritual word been used for a long time since the Buddha awakening is of course to awaken out of the mental noise into now and then you can fall back to sleep and you go back into mental noise and then you hear a bell or something happens oh there is actually nothing wrong and I was walking around with this burden of problems to see, to test the reality of any problem that you think you have the reality test is where that problem is at this moment and the reality test is what problem do you have at this moment since this moment is all there ever is that surely is the one test to show whether the problem is mind created or whether it is an actual if it's this moment, it's a challenge that needs to be faced at this moment and then it's real and then what do you do with the challenge that needs to be faced at this moment you face it in this moment oh, ok action is required and you face it with a yes and then the action that is required arises out of the yes whereas before the action would have come out of the no a very different kind of action and a qualitatively very different kind of action the no action is motivated by fear discontent anger and so it's very limited and it will express the conditioning of your mind and the egoic me entity the yes action comes out of the state of alignment with this moment in which you face this moment completely and you look at the situation and you just look and there's an alertness when you face this moment completely an alertness arises that is intelligence and it is possible that at that moment of facing it completely in the state of alertness there may be little or no thought in your head in that alertness there's a pure looking at that situation in that field of alertness and then that is the power of now operating, you're not denying the now, you're facing the now completely, that alertness is that greater intelligence that is beyond the mind manifesting itself through you and then you find yourself taking action or a realization suddenly comes from what it is that you need to do and then it happens, you do and it will be appropriate just right for that moment and that situation the amazing thing is when you face each moment there's always enough power, enough resources to deal with that moment no matter what the situation is what you can never deal with what you never have enough resources to deal with is if you project mentally into future and create problems through mental projections of what might happen or might go wrong you can't deal with situations like that and usually it's one on top of the other it has no reality so bring the test of now to the problem all these problems that I have my life situation is so complex, so full of problems and that's how you move through life with that heaviness that's the unawakened state and then something happens and you suddenly you awaken again out of identification with thinking out of time out of past and future into the fullness of now not only the fullness, also the simplicity of now the aliveness of now that you didn't know before when the now is covered up by thought you cannot sense the aliveness that is now the intelligence that is in the very field of now as the one intelligence the presence that is now your presence and the presence of God not as two, but as one this is what life can be like this is the arising the state in which humanity is destined to live this is the transitional period of the species moving from one state of consciousness that now has reached its end and therefore become very dysfunctional to a new state of consciousness and our gathering here is the transition from one state of consciousness of humanity to another state of consciousness almost a new species evolving a species that lives in a very different way, creates a very different world from what we know as the world now from what is the world now because that world that we inhabit now has been created by the egoic mind that state of consciousness so this is, you are in the midst of the greatest adventure that is possible and that is to be there one could almost say at the birth of a new species and that species is being born from within you and that species no longer creates suffering for itself and others no longer you don't make yourself suffer anymore and when you don't create pain for yourself anymore you don't create pain for others the message is not entirely new, ancient teachings already pointed to it they were the earliest flowerings of human consciousness not until now has the planet been ready for this collective flowering there are certain questions that may arise in your mind that I cannot answer are all human beings going to go through this now or how long will it take it's not necessary for us to know the answers to these questions our responsibility is to embody that transformation here and now and on a personal level it looks suddenly as if your life were becoming so much easier, so much less heaviness to your life so much greater harmony also in your interactions with other people and you hold the whole way in which you experience life becoming very much more peaceful so that's how it looks on the personal but what is really happening is the arising of a new consciousness so to speak, through you and so when you live in alignment, suddenly life becomes helpful because you are now connected with the one, the totality so it can move through and you will find things happening that seem to be just right coincidences helpful coincidences chance events things coming into your life without effort without effort does not mean that you are no longer going to put out energy in fact when you are aligned with now the energy flow that moves through you becomes increased enormously the energy that was before absorbed by useless thinking absorbs an enormous amount of energy to be continuously engaged in problem making and it burns up energy continuously and gradually that compulsive thinking slows down you don't have to make that happen it is part of the natural process as you live more and more in alignment with now, the compulsion to think continuously becomes less and less and thought still operates however without the compulsive element and of course thought is needed for certain things and then it can operate beautifully as a helpful tool in alignment with the greater consciousness not self-serving little me thoughts little problematic me thoughts problem continuous future projections no thought that is aligned with that but you will also find that there will be periods when the mind is not thinking in many of you those periods are already occurring when you are just there perhaps even as you sit here you can experience what it means to be conscious fully conscious without thought wow and of course the next moment the mind comes in and says, I am not thinking and some of you may find it as you walk in nature somewhere there is suddenly this simple looking listening, perceiving all that aliveness and beauty around you but the perception no longer happens filtered through the labeling of the mind but in a field of clarity and stillness perception through stillness this is all intimately connected with of course allowing this moment to be that's what happens as you allow this moment to be fully everything, the way in which you perceive the world changes one could say there is no longer a me perceiving there is no longer a self perceiving there is simply perceiving within the field of consciousness which is what you are and you see the beauty all around you and you see that every form that you see is an expression of the one formless consciousness stillness and that one formless consciousness, that stillness is looking ultimately, and this is the deepest mystical truth is looking ultimately at its own creation and sees that it is good

oh

I did that I created that, but you don't have to say that there is a way of knowing things that is unitive knowing, not through mental concepts and labels, through the simple perceiving within the field of stillness and the moment is totally fresh and new, and so the strange paradox is you know what you are looking at without labelling it but from the point of view of the labelling mind you no longer know anything it's a deeper knowing not through mental noise mental noise can still operate when you need it, you could be looking at a tree and there is a depth of perception and there is an enormous sensing the aliveness of that miracle that the mind labels tree and a deep sense of oneness with that, which is there whenever you are not labelling already where do I start and where does the tree start one could almost say that the entire world that you perceive is perceived as being within yourself nothing outside you nothing is outside everything is within that field of consciousness that you are beautiful way of being in the world and again, it all comes back to the simple portal of allowing this moment to be that's through that that happens and then what flows into your perceptions and interactions when this happens is a sense of non-separateness, of oneness that nothing is really other than you it is an aspect of that one essence and that recognition is love the true meaning of love is to recognize the other as yourself and that's what everybody is looking for one could say whatever humans do is a search for that and yet it's so easy it's already here now occasionally you may find dark clouds coming over you in your life even as you already live this in this new way saying yes to this moment allowing what is to be that means you are no longer creating pain because the creation of pain, of suffering is to be not aligned with this, whatever this is that is the origin of human suffering the no and that creates this entity, the mind made me that is always in opposition so the end of suffering, of creating pain for yourself, emotional pain ultimately also physical pain but physical pain has its certain momentum still in the human species you are no longer creating pain for yourself by being aligned with this, however there may still be some pain operating in you that is left over from the past humanity has created so much pain and suffering for itself and for the planet over thousands of years that it has left behind residue an energy field of negativity and pain on the planet it's like the equivalent on the physical level is the pollution of the planet that is the physical expression of that there is a vast energy field on the planet of negativity of suffering, of pain of anger, bitterness residues of collective human pain that lives on the planet and it is within every human being also past pain an accumulation of past pain from your childhood on a personal level and from genetically passed on collective human pain residues of pain emotional pain that live in each human being which I've called the pain body pain body that lives in you that sometimes you don't notice and at other times it's very much on the surface and it takes you over completely it has a dormant period and an active period when it's dormant you hardly know it's there and then you still have the mad egoic mind but you can live with that if you've lived with it for so long and then at times that mad egoic mind is energized by emotional pain of enormous intensity the slightest trigger when the pain body is ready to wake up out of its dormant state is enough and there's an enormous reaction and you move into enormous fear or anger or deep sadness whatever the pain body's energy field is and the pain body is an entity almost a separate entity one could say that lives in you a little parasitic entity consisting of past emotion a heaviness in there or a turbulence and it does not like to be looked at directly it's ultimately not separate from who you are I'm using this as a useful perspective and getting you a little bit closer to the truth of how it operates it needs periodically to feed on more pain and this explains in human beings what one could call the addiction to pain and drama in their lives the need periodically to experience drama and pain and you can see it in relationships that how often you need to go through that acting out of drama of great emotional pain which means pain body is needing to feed on further experience of pain, that is the frequency at which it vibrates and so it will feed on your mind on your thinking when it's active, when you don't know what's happening, it rises up into your mind and will use your control your thinking totally then all your thought processes are aligned with the energy field of that emotional pain in other words very painful thoughts destructive thoughts and the pain body loves that it gobbles up every painful thought and adds to its energy field that's called the addiction to pain addiction because at that moment you don't want to let go because you're now possessed by it completely identified with it is another way of putting it possessed sounds a bit old archaic when I re-read the Old Testament I was amazed on almost every page they talk about Jesus was driving out demons out of people and I said, there must have been at his time the world must have been full of people possessed by demons they must have been everywhere but of course that's only it's one way of looking at it pain bodies cannot stand intense conscious presence the light of consciousness they like to be in the dark, they can only use feed on you if they remain if you remain unconscious of their existence so you identify with it each time they come up to feed on your thinking and to feed on people around you, if there are people around you provoking a reaction so that the drama can happen and then they can feed on the other people's reaction your partner so many partnerships marriages, whatever two people living together they the purpose of many relationships is to feed their pain bodies periodically and some humans are actually attracted to each other because their pain bodies are compatible sometimes it's called falling in love and some people attract the same kind of pain bodies into their lives again and again and after the third or fourth marriage why every time I think this time he or she is completely different and it's happened again now the first truth of course is you are not likely to find yet anybody who is free of pain body but it is possible that you attract a particular type of pain body into your life or a particularly heavy one, depending of course on your own pain body how do we get out of this cycle of pain body taking you over and renewing itself every time how do we get out of that simply by watching it as it happens when it comes up it doesn't like to be watched it happens occasionally when I talk about pain body to a group of people at gatherings it happens occasionally that people suddenly run out of the room and that is usually means the pain body happens to be active at that moment and it cannot stand being looked at directly I can't listen to this anymore it doesn't like to be looked at now all the pain body is is trapped emotion when I say it is like an entity it is no more than saying that every thought you think is a temporary entity, it is a form a life form, it has a life span it is a form and then it dissolves again as that form so there is nothing spooky about saying there is this entity that lives in you ultimately it is not separate from you, there is nothing separate from you, it is simply contracted stuck emotion it cannot flow anymore, it cannot move anymore, so there is pressure behind it just as there would be behind water or any energy field that cannot move anymore so there is enormous pressure behind it at times it becomes it becomes fear is an element in almost every pain body, some pain bodies are mostly consist of fear and others have a strong element of anger or extreme heaviness that was my pain body so I know it well and then of course when it uses your mind then your mind is telling you how dreadful your life is and it can only get worse and how unfair it's all been life has treated you so unfairly and whenever something bad happened to me, even when I was a child I already had that pain body I remember the thought went through my head, of course bad things always happen to you it's bound to happen to me it's bad so it will happen to me only bad things happen to me a walking pain body so some pain bodies only come up occasionally maybe once a month if you are very lucky others experience every few days a pain body episode so the frequency at which pain bodies need to feed on the further experience of pain varies from person to person also the length of time during which pain bodies feed varies from person to person it could be an hour or two it could be several days and you can see in your relationships how that works, how you feed each other's pain bodies how long the episodes of drama last and then they subside pain bodies have a collective aspect as you may know certain people who live in certain countries tend to have a heavier pain body part of that is collective in addition to their personal pain body certain countries where there's been a lot of violence they have heavier collective pain bodies and when you visit those countries you can sense it the moment you step off the plane there's a heaviness in the air a very depressed place and everybody you look at is unsmiling what do you want? and so these countries however there's enormous longing both in individuals and countries where there's heavy pain bodies there's enormous longing for freedom sometimes greater than those where the pain body is less dense so how do we get beyond?

simply by bringing attention to it as it comes up and allow it of course to be it is, pain comes up there it is the fear is suddenly there very intensely and to sense it there it is ok or the anger goes through you like fire and you watch actually watch that movement of fire through your body and you might still be screaming and you but you watch that and you say oh stream of anger ok and even there there's suddenly a little bit of spaciousness around it because you allow it to be but when you allow it to be it's not using your thinking anymore so it's not feeding on your thoughts you're watching it directly your attention is on it

hmm

[Speaker 1] (2:10:10 - 2:26:01)

oh and this is how gradually the energy that was trapped in there becomes freed and you feel more and more alive and the strange thing that happens that energy actually becomes alertness, consciousness it seems the light of your consciousness on it transforms that into more consciousness so I've seen many times people with very dense pain bodies certainly in relatively short space of time became free and enormously conscious and present or their pain body became light transformed into that that's the miracle of that alchemical process we are all I know I wouldn't be here without, if it hadn't been for my pain body that I couldn't live with anymore I can't live with I didn't of course know it was the pain body at the time all I knew was I cannot live with myself anymore my pain body was myself and the story of me in the head energized by this incredibly painful emotion that was me and suddenly I can't live with myself oh self, who is self, who am I this is quite rare but sometimes in the case of people with very heavy pain bodies it can happen that you can become free in an instant that happened to me, for most people it takes, it's a more gradual process of gradually becoming free so it it doesn't really matter you can enjoy the adventure, pain body becomes your teacher because it teaches you to be present with it in the now that pain can be like act like this bell as an awakener oops, I lost the now whenever you feel pain or suffering in your life a good sign is I lost the now suffering means I lost the now pain to be more accurate here, pain means pain can still happen even if you are totally present in the now and that's the old pain and you allow it to be and that is the transmutation of it that happens I cannot tell you how long you are going to live with your pain body, nor does it matter it's in use it in your practice of allowing of presence oh ok it's nothing personal in it human pain, that's all it's the human race that's created there's no me in it anger is human anger why should it be your anger there's nothing personal any anger is like any other anger it's fire sadness is sadness fear is fear it's not personal, it's human that makes it easier so that the pain body no longer flows into your mind and energizes this fiction of me that becomes very unhappy very heavy and unhappy little me and of course you make many others unhappy because that's what the pain bodies want I want more pain and very unconscious pain bodies create violence inflict violence in the search for more pain so your responsibility is simply not to create new pain by being aligned with now and then dissolve the pain that is still there and you don't really need to do anything, simply bring presence to it, allow it and that's the spaciousness around it and there comes the pain body and often you will find as you bring more presence to it pain body attacks, as I sometimes call them happen much more quickly they pass through anger that before would have lingered for 2 or 3 days can pass through in 10 minutes 5 minutes even 1 minute or just a flash and it's gone you're getting then close to the beginning of the end of the pain body it's good to know that humans carry that, otherwise you can be taken over if you don't recognize it you get totally immersed in it again and all your thinking is aligned with it you sometimes meet people whose pain body is almost permanently active maybe each one of you knows 1 or 2 people like that I know some of you might now think oh it's my wife or it's my husband and it may be true but you chose them somehow and then those are people who are just looking for the next excuse to be angry or to be sad or to be in drama and when you look into their eyes you can see the emotion of the pain body looking through the eyes wanting some reaction and the slightest wrong anything you say would probably be wrong and they'll get in there in the presence of another pain body it's a wonderful practice to stay to allow that not easy at first it seems because the pain body wants you to react it wants a reaction it knows your weakest points so to stay in non-reaction seems strange almost impossible at first but after a while you notice wow and there it tries this button and it pushes that button but non-reaction doesn't mean you cut yourself off nothing touches me anymore you're not present you're not allowing it's a state of openness and it's a state of compassion in which you don't mistake the pain body for who that person is if you make an identity out of a person's pain body then you react and you for yourself also realizing that's not who you are so it's a manifestation of human unconsciousness the pain body and all what it inflicts on yourself and on other humans is the manifestation of human unconsciousness humanity at it's present stage of evolution but fortunately we are moving out of that nothing personal in it human pain and then forgiveness happens naturally because you realize the non-personal nature of unconsciousness including your parents or whoever it is that did something to you or failed to do something to you out of not knowing or you yourself before you were when you were still completely identified with your conditioning you might have done things in the past that you would certainly not do now and you think how could I have done that that was so stupid that was so unconscious and there's a tendency for the egoic mind which wants always looking out for an identity to add even that to it's sense of identity and say I did that I did that that was me that's called guilt and the ego loves to hang on to that sense of something very wrong that I did and continuously play with that thought it gives you an enormous sense of self the bad self bad selves are very heavy selves guilty sense of self is a very heavy sense of self but the self doesn't mind what kind of self it is as long as it's a big self a guilty self will work just as well as a great victorious self a miserable self works very well too surely nobody is as miserable as I am that works it's an enormous sense of self so always the self wants to strengthen itself and it will use anything guilt, it loves guilt so guilt means you make an identity for yourself a sense of self out of human unconsciousness it doesn't mean nobody is responsible in the sense they are responsible because they suffer their action makes them suffer in that sense they are responsible the suffering eventually gets them to the point of waking up and only then can you really be responsible when there is presence until that happens the waking up out of the conditioned mind into now then you can be responsible before that you are a conditioned entity you are an expression of human unconsciousness all this is contained in the words of Jesus forgive them for they know not what they do in other words don't make an identity out of what they are doing for them this is forgiving not making a self out of it either for others or for yourself so we are moving beyond that massive unconsciousness but humans had to move through it it seems so we are caterpillars about to become butterflies and this is why our existence as caterpillars has become so uncomfortable enough enough suffering enough self created pain I've had enough I'm not going to make myself suffer anymore no more this is it are you fed up enough with suffering?

I believe you are otherwise you wouldn't have come here and certainly you would no longer be here you wouldn't have been sitting here for 3 hours listening to this if you still had a very strong investment in suffering and a suffering sense of self this would be unbearable to sit here and listen to this because it's talking about the end of you as a suffering self so if you were totally identified with a suffering self you would either stand up and shout something obscene and run out of the room or you would perhaps totally fall unconscious as you sit there and say must not listen to this so the beauty of it is there is nothing much for you to do because allowing this moment to be isn't really a doing and then whatever needs doing happens through you so what I'm saying there is nothing for you to do it's not that the egoic entity says please give me a program give me steps, give me this there is a time for this too but this is a more direct a very direct way there is nothing for you to do or to achieve a future state don't try to achieve a future state you won't this is enough the depth of this moment the depth of your being no wonder Jesus talked so often about give no thought to tomorrow don't be worried and anxious about tomorrow tomorrow will be anxious for itself or something whatever way translated look at the flowers they make no effort they are not anxious and look how beautiful they are how they live how unproblematic how an unproblematic expression of that one in form if they can live like that you can live like that Jesus pointed to nature and see how that is still aligned with the totality with one, with God a temporary limited to its form yes, a temporary expression of the one beautiful unproblematic peaceful still have you noticed the stillness in and around a flower or a tree and it grows in stillness so Jesus said when he was teaching look, look, look

this is the way to live not that we are going to go back to the flower stage or the vegetable stage vegetables are fine for vegetables we are moving beyond the stage of thought nature still lives below thought we have moved through thought it's been a necessary cycle for humanity and then we are moving out of that and then we are one again the oneness that we seem to have lost never really lost because you can't fall out of oneness you can't fall out but you don't know it anymore the flower in a very obscure sense or the animal has that connectedness with the source so it doesn't have the fear of death, the psychological fear that humans have it can have immediate fear but not psychological fear and now humans find it again in this new state of consciousness with enormous knowing added to that almost one could say waking up knowing yourself as the one consciousness as your essence that's your identity the stillness and so it's a journey into that no effort is required for that energy, yes it's an enormous energy movement so enjoy that adventure that transformation through you and see how it also affects the outer forms of your life so you're only concerned with that get this moment right then the future will look after itself because it's only an extension of this just this how do you get it right? realize the rightness of it it is already right because whatever appears in this now is part of the totality so it must have its place somehow, even if you cannot understand why this should happen here and now to you it is if you had a fragment of a painting you wouldn't be able to understand it, where does it fit into the totality, you would have to see the total picture to see that it fits in somewhere so to accept this moment there's no need to understand why before you can accept it some people go to past life do past life regression trying to figure out how this makes sense within the totality it can be comforting if somebody tells you well, you are in this situation now because that happened in the past and now you are connected that's fine, it can finally take you to, get you to a point of surrendering to what is but you can do that just like this you don't need to try to figure out you could understand it anyway the vastness of it be aligned with it and then the intelligence expresses itself and enjoy the adventure be still and know that I am God

Eckhart Tolle Talk Titled Lasting Happiness

[Speaker 1] (0:12 - 1:14:38)

The pursuit of happiness, that's usually regarded as something desirable and positive. But that may be a dangerous thing, the pursuit of happiness. You may be missing something in that pursuit.

That's already here. Pursuit implies, of course, that you are seeking it. Why is it?

It implies that you are looking for a state, a desirable state, that lies somewhere in the future. And that becomes a pattern built into the very structure of the human mind. The seeking pattern.

The mindset, the collective mindset, that is always looking to the next thing, the next moment, in the hope that happiness will be found there, or that I will find a more complete version of myself there. That's a very normal thing to be doing. The bank robber does that, because he's not interested in the money, but what promise the money holds, he may believe that it will liberate him, provide freedom, freedom of movement, enhance his sense of self, happiness.

And it could be there in the spiritual seeker too, who is looking for the answer. Some state that one has read about, enlightenment perhaps, that will finally provide lasting happiness. So both the bank robber, to take one extreme, on the evolutionary scale, and the spiritual seeker, are still manifesting the human seeking mode.

And that is so normal for most human beings to be in the seeking mode, that to many it hasn't even occurred that they are in the seeking mode, or that a different state of consciousness is possible. And wherever you watch, television, the media, films, almost everybody you watch is in that seeking mode. The news reader, they are not at ease with the present moment, because the present moment is regarded as insufficient.

Underlying that is the belief that I am not yet enough. That's a very deep seated thing. I am not yet enough, and so I am not happy.

I can only be happy if I have finally arrived at that sense of completion within myself, where I feel I am now fully myself. Surely nothing else will bring me lasting happiness than finding myself fully, being myself fully. So the bank robber seeks that through the money.

And all throughout civilization people are seeking this, that, or the other, ultimately in a search for a more complete version of themselves, an enhanced sense of who I am, because that sense of who I am in most humans is deficient. You can notice that, that it is deficient, if you only even imagine that somebody tells you you haven't got much longer to live, would be the most dreadful shock, because you would feel, but I haven't arrived yet, but I'm not complete yet. Surely I need more time.

The most precious thing, the one thing that I need to complete myself, find myself, find that deep lasting happiness and peace, to find that, the one thing I need is more time. And so you are then trapped in a state of consciousness that we could call time bound, where whatever you do is governed by the notion of time. And unless you are very old, it will usually be future that is of the greatest importance to you, the time ahead of you.

As you get older, the time behind you, as the time ahead of you shrinks, the time behind you, there seems to be more of that, more past, and then in older people the past assumes a greater importance, they remember it. They are looking for themselves through memory of me and my past, what happened to me, and think about it and talk about it. That is quite normal, because future has shrunk.

But some old people, they don't seem to have realized yet that there may not be that much future left, so they are still looking to enhance themselves through more. This little word more is so vital if we want to discover the inner pattern, the inner pattern that is perhaps one of the most pronounced characteristics of that state of consciousness that I believe is now coming to an end on the planet, the state in which you are identified, which means you derive your sense of self, your sense of identity, from a mentally constructed image, a conceptualized me. Memories, conditioned patterns, experiences, all kinds of identifications, which become thoughts, make up a bundle of thoughts and emotions that accompany those thoughts, and that mentally created bundle becomes a sense of self, a me, and it is that mind made me, a story, my story, my history, it is that that most humans derive your sense of self from.

I am my story. And that sense of self is always seeking. It is a characteristic of that sense of self that it is in the seeking mode and it exists in a state of not enough.

And that's an amazing realization that most humans, although many are now moving beyond that state of consciousness, but on the planet most humans are still trapped in that state of consciousness where their sense of identity feels incomplete. I am not fully myself. So the belief then, to a large extent unconscious, is if I could only be more, then I finally will arrive at self-completion.

Myself will be complete. So the need for more becomes overriding in one's daily existence. More to add to who I think I am, to me.

What does that mean? To a child where this is already starting, this mind movement, the formation of a mind made sense of self, to a child, it begins when a child claims possession of something. And every young child does that.

And this child will scream if you take away the toy. In very deep pain already. Nothing much, and it's not probably even taken away.

Somebody just picked it up to look at it. And it's enough for the child to scream, It's mine! And that scream remains in most humans.

It may not be when they reach adulthood, the scream may not be, you can't hear it anymore, but it's often inside. And this is only where it begins. This is one thing where the child already feels, I have been diminished in my sense of self.

Because that toy has been taken away. What has happened? The simple thing that has happened is, the toy, of course, became a thought form.

It's not the toy out there, it's the thought form of my toy. And the little word my is essential here. Because then I have invested the thought form of toy with a sense of self.

And that's a collective, we are all collectively conditioned to do that. So this is just the early beginning of a huge development of mind movements, where the I seeks to add more thought forms, that it can invest with a sense of self. So it is looking out for more of me.

So to a child then, that's one thing. And then the child identifies with whatever it can incorporate into its sense of self. So this is the growing egoic entity.

And it seems that needs to happen to every human being. We cannot tell a child, No, this is not your toy, there is no such thing as possession. Let go of that thought.

It doesn't work. You have to allow the child compassionately to go through that. It's the beginning of delusion, we could say, yes.

And then it goes on and then you can see how the child begins to suffer. Through identifying more and more with that self. And fearing that something that I regard as me will be removed from me.

And then the child grows and the toy becomes the car, mine. And other possessions may come, this is one level. Then other levels of identifications come, what other people think of me.

Other people's opinion of me can become more valuable than a possession. It's only just a thought form, but I can hang on to that. And it can then cling to the bundle of thought forms and reactive patterns that go with it.

And emotions that accompany it, this me. Oh, they think I'm great. So many people think they will find themselves through enhanced recognition by others.

Maybe when others will recognize how great I am, then I will have found myself. So the striving for self being fully myself can take the form of that needing the recognition. And this could take you to the end of your life, especially if you don't get it.

Or striving to have wealth, it could take you to the end of your life, especially if you don't get it. If you get it, then you discover the strange thing, that it doesn't complete you. I still feel I'm not enough.

That wasn't it. I've got all the things that I thought would complete me, and then comes the critical stage. The suffering that is there whenever you have not really found yourself, the suffering that is built into the very structure of that mind made identity, because suffering is that sense of lack, that sense of not enough, that sense of fear, that underlies that state of consciousness.

And so you've made it in the eyes of the world, and yet it doesn't seem to have worked. If you haven't made it, you can be stuck in the illusion for longer, until the very end, and then create an identity, your story then changes into somebody who hasn't made it. And then the story will seek explanations why the world is so unfair, has treated you so badly, that it prevented you from being fully yourself.

They did something to me. Whether you identify them individually, or whether they are the collective, or whether they are a political party, or whatever, they... And that is another thought form that will then supply you with a sense of self, and that's quite satisfying too, temporarily.

At least now you think you know who you are. You are the one who has been treated unfairly by life. Okay.

So you are trapped, one way or another, in a conceptualized sense of self, a me, and it's not enough. And if you make it, everybody tells you you should be happy now, and you feel that pain, that sense of lack, and some start drinking then, or take drugs, just to dull the pain that they feel. There are famous people, we all have read about them, who were very unhappy, very deeply unhappy.

The illusion has been removed from them that the future will complete them, because surely they have everything already. How can the future complete me? I can't think of anything else.

And when you arrive there, you can go into despair and drugs, and so just to dull the pain, or you suddenly see the fiction of the self, that the entire culture is immersed in, and tells you this is how it is. And you suddenly see this is not, and then you might become interested in going beyond that. Going beyond a conceptualized me in the head.

And you realize that happiness on that level cannot be found. The illusion of happiness, yes, many times you will think, there it is, I have it now. I'm complete.

I'm getting married tomorrow. All my shares have gone up by 100%. I'm complete.

Or I've become a master at this or that, playing the violin, the computer, the greatest computer wizard in the world. I have abilities that nobody else has. I can throw a ball better than anybody else.

And so they pay me millions just to throw this ball once a week. And everybody thinks I'm the greatest. I'm the great example to everybody.

They construct an identity for me out of the ability to throw this ball. And I buy into that for a while. I actually believe that I am the greatest ball thrower.

And it's myself. And then after a while that wears off because it's a fiction. It's a conceptualized entity in the head.

And the fact that it is in millions of other heads doesn't change the fact that it's a delusion. A fiction. So the pursuit of happiness is undertaken by the conceptualized entity, the me.

It is seeking more of me. Amazing. That is one level of consciousness.

That is the level of consciousness that has dominated the planet for as long as humans can remember. Since recorded history and far beyond that. And it is a dangerously dysfunctional state in many ways.

Because that neediness expresses itself in many ways that create enormous amount of suffering. To others around you and to yourself. The need for more is the need for having an enhanced sense of self.

And that is not only personal, it's collective too. When that same mindset becomes a collective mindset, the me becomes an us. That's even more mad than the personal.

And it creates dreadful suffering. It has done so throughout history. The need of nations and religions and tribes to enhance their sense of identity through, strangely enough, being in conflict with others.

They are actually seeking conflict. You can see it whether you look at this on a personal level or whether you look at it on the level of the collective. There seems to be the need to be in conflict with something or someone.

If there were not this need, why would human history look the way it is? Look at the 20th century. Hell.

Created on a planet that potentially is a paradise. Humans create their own hell. And they do it collectively and they do it on a personal level.

There are many humans, not just in places where there is a shortage of food. They create hell in many different ways, even in so-called prosperous countries. If you look into the individual human being, many of them carry their own heaviness, their own hell inside.

Their relationships at work. And they might look happy on the surface. So much suffering.

So much suffering on the planet. Human created suffering. So the entity, the conceptualized me, is condemned to seeking more.

It's condemned not to be happy, not to be at ease. The structure of that mind-made self does not allow it. So unhappiness is actually built into the structure of the egoic mindset.

It is not ultimately to do with the content of your life, the reasons why I am unhappy. They are interchangeable. So there is the need for more to enhance me.

The me that is never complete. The story of me that hasn't quite worked the way it was supposed to work. Up till now.

There are not many humans who feel that the story has gone very well indeed. The story of me. And if there are some, all you have to do is wait a little.

And then the incompleteness returns. The sense of incompleteness. And people believe this is their personal problem.

Everybody else seems to be okay except me. This is built into the very structure of that conceptualized identity. It's need for more.

It's need for conflict in order to enhance its separate sense of existence. This is the me and this is the other. Now I need to get a strong sense of me if I can be in conflict with something or someone.

It enhances my sense of self. Or if I can take something away from another, in my delusion I believe that that will also enhance my sense of self. That could be just a thought form that I am trying to take away from somebody through making a remark that diminishes the sense of self of another person.

I question anything that that person identifies with as not good. Your car is no good. This dress would look good on your sister.

Little remarks. They are unconsciously designed to diminish another person's sense of self. They don't know what they are doing.

And they believe if they can diminish somebody else's sense of self, they have enhanced their own sense of self a little bit. All that it means is the illusion of me has grown a little. So all you have enhanced is the illusion.

But to the illusion it feels great for a little while. And so it can become extremely greedy.

The need for more is incessant.

We see that the same egoic entity becomes collective in a corporation. We've read about these things recently. And we were surprised to see how greedy these big corporations are.

Their whole reason for being seems to be to accumulate more. Perhaps in some cases the people at the top didn't even forgot what they manufactured. And it didn't matter anymore what, except we need more, more.

So there is the need for more to enhance me. The me that is never complete. The story of me that hasn't quite worked the way it was supposed to work up till now.

There are not many humans who feel that the story has gone very well indeed. The story of me. And if there are some, all you have to do is wait a little.

And then the incompleteness returns. The sense of incompleteness. And people believe this is their personal problem.

Everybody else seems to be okay except me. This is built into the very structure of that conceptualized identity. It's need for more.

It's need for conflict in order to enhance its separate sense of existence. This is the me and this is the other. Now I need to get a strong sense of me if I can be in conflict with something or someone.

It enhances my sense of self. Or if I can take something away from another, in my delusion I believe that that will also enhance my sense of self. And that could be just a thought form that I'm trying to take away from somebody through making a remark that diminishes the sense of self of another person.

By saying, I question anything that that person identifies with as not good. Your car is no good. This dress would look good on your sister.

Little remarks. All these, they are unconsciously designed to diminish another person's sense of self. They don't know what they are doing.

And they believe if they can diminish somebody else's sense of self, they have enhanced their own sense of self a little bit. All that it means is the illusion of me has grown a little. So all you have enhanced is the illusion.

But to the illusion it feels great for a little while. And so it can become extremely greedy. The need for more is incessant.

We see that the same egoic entity becomes collective in a corporation. We've read about these things recently. And we were surprised to see how greedy these big corporations are.

Their whole reason for being seems to be to accumulate more. Perhaps in some cases the people at the top didn't even forgot what they manufactured. And it didn't matter anymore what, except we need more, more.

So a greedy entity is simply a magnification of that mind pattern. So let's not fall into the trap of saying there are a few, all these directors, they are evil. No, they are just in a position to be more greedy than others.

And so the same mind pattern operates on all levels. It becomes the terrorist. What does he do?

How can somebody kill hundreds or thousands of people, even himself or herself? What is going on in here? And people are at a loss to understand what are they doing?

Well, it's very simple. They live in and through a conceptualized entity which to a large extent is in their case collective. It's a collective me based on their conditioning, their religion, their upbringing, their belief systems, their story, the collective story of us.

And they don't know it's a story the way they interpret reality. It is the truth to them. They are totally identified with those thoughts that make up the self.

Complete identification with thinking. Self-identification with thinking. So you have a collective conceptualized entity and us.

And that entity has its own version of reality which isn't recognized as a version of reality. It is reality to that entity. And that entity then, you've already deadened yourself to the deeper aliveness that is there underneath all those mind movements.

Underneath the conceptualized me. The deeper consciousness that is not conditioned. The dimension that is in every human being underneath the conceptualized sense of self that is conditioned form, thought forms.

Underneath that, this is the redemptive factor in human existence. Underneath that is a dimension of consciousness that we could describe as unconditioned, vast. But they don't know that.

The terrorist certainly doesn't know it. And as yet, most humans don't know it, but more and more are waking up to it now. The terrorist is so deeply identified, and that's only an extreme manifestation of the same that's everywhere.

So deeply identified with the conceptualized that the entire identity is derived from those mind movements. He's already dead to the deeper aliveness within him or her. And then when you live through a conceptualized sense of self, you manufacture a conceptualized identity for everybody else.

You impose mental labels on other people and groups of people. You call them something. A word, a set of words.

And to you that is the reality of those human beings. There are mental labels. There are thought forms that you impose on another.

You can do it to an individual or to a group. And once you have deadened yourself, you are no longer relating to another human being. You don't even see them anymore as human beings.

You are totally trapped in mind. Totally trapped in thought. And thought is an abstraction.

You impose an abstraction on the sacredness and aliveness of another human being. And that is what you relate to. And then you've basically already killed them.

Their aliveness is not there anymore. You don't know it. The next step can easily be physical violence.

And you will not know what you are doing. You are operating in the realm of mental abstraction. And you are reducing the world to that.

And you are making... You love your enemies, not in the sense of Jesus. You love your enemies.

You love having enemies in that mindset. The terrorist loves having enemies. He doesn't love his enemies, but he loves having enemies.

Because they enhance his sense of self. The us. So all these remove America.

And in many countries, collective identity would suddenly dissolve. Who are we now? Without those on whom we can project something.

The enemy is gone. Within America, because the same structure operates in everyone, when Russia ceased to be the enemy, one could sense a little bit of sense of loss in certain circles. What are we doing now?

We've lost our main enemy. They even made a humorous film about that. Where the president of the United States gets together.

He's seeking re-election. And he gets together with an advisor and says, We need an enemy. Come on.

And since it's a humorous film, they come up with Canada as the enemy. The most unlikely enemy. They manufacture it and it works.

So the need for an enemy to enhance one's sense of self is very great in the collective. It happens in Germany, National Socialism. The same egoic entity which became collective.

It's a very dangerous entity on all levels. And they ended up with the whole world became their enemy. Great.

Now we know who we are. Who are you? Well, Germans.

That's who we are. A concept in the head. A conceptual entity.

It's a dangerous thing. Very dangerous thing. And on a personal level, it operates in the same way.

And that's been going on for so long. How does it operate on a personal? Who is your enemy?

It doesn't have to be a person. Or a group of people. The enemy can be a place.

A situation. Wherever you are. Something you complain about in your head.
